The official population figures released in 1980 show a population of 31 million, but Ethiopian officials report the population is now more than 40 million. Its history goes back more than 4,000 years, and the Old testament of the Bible records the visit of the Queen of Sheba of Ethiopia to Jerusalem.

Its high plateaus and rugged mountains make it all but impossible to build and maintain roads in many sections of the country. Officials tell us that more than one-half the population of Ethiopia live more than one-half day's walk from the nearest road. Less than 10 percent of the population has access to electricity.

Throughout its history Ethiopia has been plagued by periodic droughts. There is considerable soil erosion caused by overgrazing and high population density. The current drought is reported to be the most severe drought of this century.

Reports from the United Nations show Ethiopia to be one of the poorest countries in the world. Eighty-six percent of its population is dependent on subsistence agriculture for their livelihood. This bit of background information about the country helps you to understand the current situation in the country.

The current military government took over control of the government when Emperor Haile Selassie was dethroned in September 1974. The present government is anti-United States and pro-Soviet Union. The Soviet Union supported Ethiopia in its war with neighboring Somalia during 1978 and 1979 and they have not forgiven us. The present government controls all the political life in Ethiopia. It is a centralized, planned economy based on Socialist principles with the Soviet Union as a model. During the past 10 years Mengistu has eliminated all organized opposition to his leadership, using many of the same tactics Stalin used during his early days in the Soviet Union.

You might say the world discovered Africa and particularly Ethiopia in January 1984 when worldwide television began showing on the evening news pictures of starving people, especially children, in the refugee camps in Ethiopia and Sudan.

As of July 1, 1985, almost one-half million metric tons of United States grain has been allotted for the famine victims in Ethiopia under the Food for Peace Program. The United States is the largest contributor, but there is also a broad base of support coming from most of the industrialized countries of the free world.

In late June I was a witness to this international cooperative effort when I and two other American citizens from Colorado were privileged to travel more than 500 miles over the drought area in a Soviet M-I-8 helicopter piloted by a crew from the Polish Air Force and accompanied by the Polish ambassador. They were delivering food to drought victims who could not be reached by other means of transportation.

We saw C-130 planes operated by the British Royal Air Force carrying 16 tons per load dropping U.S. grain to drought victims. The Royal Air Force had four C-130s and the West German air force had three C-130s participating in the food distribution system. The Belgians and the Swiss air force also were providing planes and/or helicopters for the system. We were told this was the first time that members of the armed forces of NATO countries had participated with members of the armed forces from eastern bloc countries in a joint project like this.

The U.S. Embassy reports that more than 10 voluntary and charitable organizations from many countries are participating in the famine relief programs in Ethiopia. We were impressed by the cooperative spirit and willingness to help one another that existed between the leaders of the many groups we visited that are working in Ethiopia. The objective appeared to be how can we save more lives and not who will get the credit.

During the past 18 months millions of lives have been saved by this massive effort to get food and medicine to the famine areas in Africa. The problem is getting the food to the people in a country that has limited railroads and almost no highway system. You can get the food to the port but how do you move it to the people who live several hundred miles from the port in rugged mountainous area?

Many lives have been saved but many more will die before this crisis is over. Many are nomads who have followed their livestock over those hills for centuries. Now their livestock are gone—what do they do? One of the Ethiopian government officials told us he had read about the droughts we had experienced in the United States. He said he had read "The Grapes of Wrath," and he knew how the people of the United States had moved and changed their way of making a living because of drought.

Two former colleagues of mine—Edward Rau, an attorney from Denver and Elmer Reed, a retired U.S. Department of Agriculture employee of Denver—and I made a 16-day inspection tour of the drought areas of Kenya, Ethiopia and Sudan. We attempted to contact officials of all the major private groups, such as CARE, Catholic Relief Service, Church of World Service, International Red Cross, World Vision, Save the Children, and others. We also contacted international organizations such as the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) and the World Food Program (WFP).

The three countries we visited received a major portion of the famine aid going to Africa from the United States. Ethiopia has received the most publicity, but many believe the famine has affected more people in Sudan than it has in Ethiopia. Kenya had its worst drought in history in 1983 and 1984, but the rains came to Kenya in the Fall of 1984 and Kenya will harvest a good crop in 1985. It still has many problems. It has the highest rate of increase in population of any country in the world—more than 4 percent. This rapidly expanding population means serious trouble ahead for that government.

The rains in Ethiopia and Sudan have been very spotty or non-existent. Officials estimate that another one-half million people will die of starvation in these countries during the next six months despite massive efforts to get food to them.

We returned to the United States with renewed appreciation of our nation and its system of government—a nation that can provide food and other basic necessities for its citizens and much of the world. We returned with increased appreciation for those U.S. citizens we met who were assisting those desperate people in the refugee camps and out in the villages in the famine area. They are willing to risk their future health to serve their fellow men. They deserve our support and appreciation.

If readers of this report have not contributed to African relief through their favorite charitable organization, I hope they will consider it. For those who have contributed I say thank you and God bless you.

(Andrew J. Mair, a consultant living in Fort Collins, was a delegate to the United Nations World Food Conference in Rome in 1974. He has been deputy assistant secretary for international affairs and commodity programs in the Department of Agriculture and coordinator of Food for Peace in the Department of State.)●

ACID RAIN

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, acid rain is a matter of great concern to Americans in many parts of the Nation, and also to the Senate.

In upstate New York, acid rain is an especially severe and critical problem. Mr. Louis Greppo, a member of the Adirondack North Woodsmen, recently made some very forthright and sensible remarks on the subject at a public forum in Amsterdam, NY.

Mr. President, I ask that Mr. Greppo's statement be printed in the RECORD, and I urge my colleagues to note the concerns of such a conscientious New Yorker, for they are of great importance to all of us.

The statement follows:

NEW YORK STATE AND THE ACID RAIN TRAGEDY

Our great state has paid the highest price in this environmental tragedy. We have lost some of our most beautiful and wild trout ponds in our beloved Adirondacks, and we are seeing our great forest preserve denuded by this acid fallout. It hurts more because New Yorkers are today celebrating the centennial of our unique Adirondack Forest Preserve, which generations of New Yorkers have seen fit to protect from any internal or external degradation now only to see it attacked from an enemy many hundreds of miles away. Others might wonder why we get so upset over a few dead fish. Well, these dead fish just happen to be wild brook trout, legislated the State Fish. They are an indicator of a healthy environment, and they are an integral part of our wilderness system in the Adirondacks.

What to tell our children when the magnificient spruce forest of the high peaks are gone? How will we answer them when they ask us what it was like to fish a wild mountain pond for native Adirondack Brook Trout? Who will explain to them that the reason the haunting cry of the loon no longer can be heard in the North Woods is because none of their forefathers had courage enough to develop a national strategy to clean up the air? We needed cheap energy—"the next generation can worry about the environment."

I hope we will never have to explain to our children and grandchildren that we just couldn't get our act together on this acid rain question. I pray that we can leave our children a world cleaner than the one we were born into. Senator Moynihan tried way back in 1979 by introducing the Acid Precipitation Act (S. 1754) which became law in 1980 and created the Acid Precipitation Task Force to coordinate a 10 year federal research program on acid rain.

Unfortunately, although several acid rain bills have been introduced in both the House and Senate over the past six years, we still have no national acid rain legislation which will control sulfur emissions and thus help put an end to the acid rain tragedy. Senator Moynihan has been one of our biggest supporters in Washington in trying to develop and pass an acid rain bill, but he can't do it alone—we must let the nation know that although the Northeast is being impacted the worst thus far, the forest, lakes, streams, and fishlife of the entire nation and our neighbor to the north, Canada, are suffering from acid rain. We must help Senator Moynihan point out to the administration and to Congress that the answer to the problem must be a national answer.●

THE LATE DR. C. HENRY KEMPE

● Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I stand before my distinguished colleagues to pay tribute to the late Dr. C. Henry Kempe, whose pioneering efforts in the service of children and families affected by child abuse have established him as a true American hero.

Although his many accomplishments are unknown to most Americans, they have changed the lives of thousands of children in need. I hope that by publicizing Dr. Kempe's significant contributions, I shall not only pay proper respect to him but also make the public more aware of the importance of the fight against child abuse and neglect.

Dr. Kempe dedicated over 25 years of his life to the cause of abused and neglected children. In 1958, he was instrumental in the founding of the Child Protection Team, one of the first of its kind, at Colorado General Hospital in Denver. In 1972, with a $1,800,000 grant from the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation, the Child Protection Team became the National Center for the Prevention and Treatment of Child Abuse, which in 1981 was renamed the Kempe Center in honor of Dr. Kempe.

But Dr. Kempe's accomplishments did not stop there. Throughout his career, one of Dr. Kempe's major goals was to treat the cause of child abuse as well as the symptoms, and in 1959 he developed individual therapy programs for abusive and neglecting parents. Not content to rest on his laurels, he instituted the Lay Therapy program in 1967, using nonprofessionals to support and befriend abusive parents. In the same year, Families Anonymous was created as a self-help support group with professional facilitators for abusive and neglecting parents, and the sexual abuse research and treatment program was expanded in 1981 to include adult male offenders, adolescents, couples, and mothers of children in therapeutic preschool.

In addition to sponsoring numerous symposia on child abuse and neglect, Dr. Kempe, in conjunction with the National Center, wrote, edited, and published a host of books, articles, journals, and instructive films in order to disseminate information on this important, yet until recently overlooked, problem. Some of the titles published are "Helping the Battered Child and His Family," "Sexually Abused Children and Their Families," both of which were coedited by Dr. Kempe, "Abuse and Neglect: The International Journal," which now has five volumes, and "Region 8 News," a quarterly newsletter distributed to 5,000 subscribers free of charge in Colorado, Montana, North Dakota, South Dakota, Utah, and Wyoming. Dr. Kempe's own book, "Child Abuse," is a seminal work on the subject and is translated into 13 languages.

Mr. President, what I have said so far is only the tip of the iceberg. The late Dr. Kempe's achievements are truly too numerous to mention. In order to do him justice, I ask unanimous consent that a more complete chronology of the Kempe National Center's accomplishments be placed in the RECORD at this point.

Despite Dr. Kempe's death, the National Center for the Prevention and Treatment of Child Abuse and Neglect continues to study and treat the problem of child abuse. The center has recently merged with CHILDHELP, U.S.A. In order to increase its ability to reach abused children and their families. Now renamed CHILDHELP Diagnostic and Treatment Center, it continues to provide a treatment team made up of professionals from pediatrics, psychiatry, developmental psychology, social work, and early childhood education. Ongoing treatment services include individual psychotherapy, marital therapy, and group therapy, often in conjunction with other programs at the Kempe Center.

Among these additional programs is the therapeutic preschool, which began at the Kempe Center in 1974. At the preschool, children who have experienced sexual abuse, physical abuse, neglect, or were failure-to-thrive infants receive individual help in the form of play therapy, developmental stimulation, and speech and language therapy. What is truly remarkable about this school is that there is no tuition; the program is supported entirely through private foundation moneys.

Another specialized assistance program is the Adolescent Perpetrator's Network, geared toward juvenile sex offenders. Its purpose is to provide professional help in order to prevent today's juvenile offenders from becoming tomorrow's adult abusers of children.

The Kempe Center provides consultation and training for those interested in the general field of child abuse. This training takes the form of professional education, workshops and seminars, symposia, and a scholars-in-residence program. By educating and training a new generation of researchers and citizens concerned about child abuse, the center extends its benefits into the future.

Mr. President, I thank you for this opportunity to honor an outstanding citizen. I hope that Dr. Kempe's success serves to inspire others to aid in the fight against child abuse.

Mr. President, I ask that the list of selected events of the C. Henry Kempe National Center for the Prevention and Treatment of Child Abuse and Neglect be printed in the Record.

The material follows:

SELECTED HISTORICAL EVENTS OF THE C. HENRY KEMPE NATIONAL CENTER FOR THE PREVENTION AND TREATMENT OF CHILD ABUSE AND NEGELECT/DENVER, CO

IRS REGULATIONS BACKLOG

● Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, there is a growing backlog in Internal Revenue Service tax regulation writing projects which Congress has created by its efforts at tax reform in the past 10 years. As of June 30, 1985, the IRS had 453 regulations projects outstanding, some dating back to 1970. These regulations are necessary to explain complex Tax Code. They allow taxpayers to interpret tax laws in terms of their own returns, and to know what tax preparation procedures will and will not pass an IRS audit. Every time that Congress revises or adds to the Nation's tax laws, we pile more regulation writing projects on the IRS. In terms of tax simplification, we are digging ourselves deeper and deeper into a hole.

The effects of this backlog on the tax system, the taxpayers, and on the national economy are serious. Tax laws are always difficult to understand. Without these regulations, they may be close to impossible to decipher for the average citizen. Today there are already many attorneys who specialize not in tax law in general, but in a specific part of the tax system. Even these lawyers find it difficult to keep up on new developments in taxation. With a major tax bill enacted by Congress every 2 or 3 years, it is exceedingly difficult to maintain a clear picture of the tax system. Furthermore, the constant state of flux of the system renders long-term economic planning nearly impossible for the citizen and the professional alike. A good investment under present law may become a disaster a few years into the future. I find it difficult to imagine that either the economic or the social goals of tax legislation will be realized in such a situation. We must first tame our current system of taxation before any efforts at reform and simplification will succeed.

Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a table summarizing the current status of IRS regulations. It would also be timely to reprint in the RECORD a 1983 statement by the Colorado Society of Certified Public Accountants which pointed out in forceful terms, serious unsettling effects on the business economy caused by continued tax law changes, which I submit for the RECORD.

The material follows:

Subject: Problems of continuous modification of the Internal Revenue Code.

BACKGROUND

During the thirty-year period from 1939 to 1969, tax legislation was essentially limited to the Internal Revenue Code of 1939, the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, and the Tax Reform Act of 1969, with no other major or significant pieces of legislation.

The past decade has seen a tremendous increase in tax legislation with passage of:

The Employment Retirement Income and Security Act of 1974.

The Tax Reduction Act of 1975.

The Tax Reform Act of 1976.

The Tax Reduction and Simplification Act of 1977.

The Revenue Act of 1978.

The Energy Act of 1978.

The Crude Oil Windfall Profits Tax Act of 1980.

The Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981.

The Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982.

In addition, many technical corrections acts and other less significant tax legislation have been enacted during this same period.

This volume of legislation has created an enormous backlog in the regulation writing process, as there were approximately 450 projects waiting completion at the Department of Treasury as of December 31, 1982. The regulation writing process is further slowed by the lack of a group specifically assigned to and engaged only in regulation writing within the Treasury Department.

The legislation as well as its attendant problems of implementation has resulted from attempts to cope with the changing budgetary, political and social goals of the 1970's and 1980's. However, the continuing tax law changes have an unsettling effect on today's business environment and foster the perception that the existing tax system lacks stability and fairness. Many taxpayers find it increasingly difficult to engage in long-range planning because the associated tax consequences are unpredictable. Because of the increasing technical complexities created by constant revisions of the Internal Revenue Code, professional tax advisors find it more difficult to provide tax advice in a form which can be understood and used by their clients in connection with their financial and business planning. A few recent examples of this are:

The Accelerated Cost Recovery System (ACRS) enacted by ERTA was signed into law in August, 1981, yet was effective for assets placed in service after December 31, 1980. Many fiscal year taxpayers had closed their books, updated their property and equipment ledgers and filed their Federal income tax returns. The passage of ERTA created the need for these taxpayers to amend their income tax returns, thereby incurring additional expense as well as taking time away from their daily operations.

The recently enacted Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982 contains 23 different effective dates, 14 of which are effective for periods either beginning or ending before the date of enactment.

As a result of the complexity of present law and the interaction of various code sections, technical corrections acts are required almost immediately after new legislation is passed to correct for unintended results. For example, the use of fiscal years by some newly formed "S" Corporations had to be eliminated from the Subchapter S Revision Act of 1982 by the most recent Technical Corrections Act.

Many have voiced the opinion that the present system be abolished in favor of a "flat rate" tax. The "flat rate" tax proposal is to some extent a result of the increased complexity of present tax law and the belief that the assessment of income taxes should be simpler. A flat rate tax would basically put all taxpayers in the same tax bracket. In its purest form, no deductions or credits would be allowed and all income would be subject to the same tax rate. It would be equivalent to a national sales tax that probably could be filed on a "postcard" return. The original United States income tax law enacted in 1913 was basically a flat rate tax system.

Proposals for the flat rate tax have varied from its purest form to modified versions which include personal exemptions, deductions for such items as charitable contributions and mortgage interest, and surtax charges. There has been a wide range of tax rates and surtax charges proposed, including rates somewhere between 10 and 20 percent and proposals to structure the flat rate tax as an alternative method of tax computation.

RECOMMENDATIONS

On the problem of adverse effects to taxpayers resulting from continuous modification of the Internal Revenue Code, the Federal Taxation Committee of the Colorado Society of Certified Public Accountants reached the following conclusions:

The process of formulation of proposed legislation amending the Internal Revenue Code should be modified, as necessary, to incorporate the following:

(a) Procedures be established whereby proponents of amendments to the Internal Revenue Code (whose principal purpose is to promote a particular social objective, or respond to a political interest) be required to demonstrate that other alternatives to amending the Code have been considered and provide an explanation in the form of a report to Congress of why such other alternatives are not appropriate to accomplish the objectives of the proposed law changes;

(b) Proponents of amendments to the Internal Revenue Code be required to show the contribution of the proposed changes to simplification of the Code, simplification of related compliance (i.e., tax return reporting) and enforcement; and

(c) Establish requirements that Committee Reports which accompany new tax legislation reflect the deliberations which have occurred on the matters outlined in (a) and (b).

If a "flat rate tax" system is considered, it should first be the subject of extensive study on whether this system will accomplish its objective of tax simplification, and whether a satisfactory definition of "income" subject to a "flat rate tax" can be developed.

If additional Federal revenues are required, they be raised by adjusting present tax rates. Adjusting tax rates versus making technical changes to the Internal Revenue Code as means of raising additional revenue will contribute to increased confidence of taxpayers that their current financial decisions will have predictable future tax consequences.

In its discussions on regulation writing by the Treasury Department, the committee reached the following recommendation.

The Department of Treasury establish a permanent group responsible for promulgating regulations. This group should not be available for other activities. In addition to Treasury Department personnel, the group should comprise representatives of industries or taxpayers affected by the Regulations, at the earliest possible stage in the process of their formulation.●

REPORT OF NATIONAL AVIATION HALL OF FAME

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, as a Member of the Senate representing the National Aviation Hall of Fame, once again it is my pleasure to submit the latest report to that body. I ask that the material be inserted in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

The report follows:

NATIONAL AVIATION HALL OF FAME

REPORT ON EXAMINATION OF FINANCIAL STATEMENTS FOR THE YEARS ENDED DECEMBER 31, 1984 AND 1983

[Accountants' Report]

To the Board of Trustees,
National Aviation Hall of Fame, Inc.,
Dayton, Ohio.

We have examined the balance sheets of the National Aviation Hall of Fame, Inc. as of December 31, 1984 and 1983, and the related statements of revenue and expenses, changes in fund balances and changes in financial position for the years then ended. Our examinations were made in accordance with generally accepted auditing standards and, accordingly, included such tests of the accounting records and such other auditing procedures as we considered necessary in the circumstances.

In our opinion, the financial statements referred to above present fairly the financial position of the National Aviation Hall of Fame, Inc. as of December 31, 1984 and 1983, and the results of its operations and the changes in its financial position for the years then ended in conformity with generally accepted accounting principles applied on a consistent basis.

NOTES TO FINANCIAL STATEMENTS

1. Summary of Significant Accounting Policies

The Corporation was created by an Act of Congress, Public Law 88-372, July 14, 1964, to honor outstanding persons in the field of aviation. The Internal Revenue Service has confirmed the status of the Corporation as a tax-exempt public foundation.

The inventory of "Enshrinee Album" books is valued at the lower of cost or market with cost being determined by the first-in, first-out method.

Furniture, fixtures and equipment are recorded at cost when purchased or at estimated values when received as a donation. Depreciation is computed on the straight-line basis over the estimated useful lives of the assets.

Donated materials other than collections are recorded at their estimated value at the date of receipt. No amounts have been reflected in the statements for donated office space and services as no objective basis is available to measure the value of such services. Donated office space consists of an office and storage provided by the City of Dayton. Donated services consist of time donated by the Board of Trustees for the Corporation.

Biographical research and Enshrinee Album Programs resources are restricted by the donor, grantor, or other outside party for operating the biographical research program, and are deemed to be earned and reported as revenues of the operating fund when the Corporation has incurred expenditures in compliance with the specific restrictions. Such amounts received but not yet earned are reported as restricted deferred amounts.

2. Collections

The Corporation has acquired by purchase or through donations, various models, books and other memorabilia relating to the field of aviation since its founding. Because the value of these items are not readily determinable and they can be considered inexhaustible items, the Corporation has not capitalized them. The value of objects acquired by gift for which the Corporation can make a reasonable estimate is reported as gifts in the statement of revenue, expenses and changes in fund balance.

3. Fund Balances

The capital expenditure fund is intended to provide funds for the purchase of a facility for the Corporation. The Board has directed that all donations received from enshrinees or their families and income earned from investments applicable to capital expenditure fund be added to this fund. Additions to the fund amounted to $4,633 and $4,292 in 1984 and 1983, respectively. Cash is periodically transferred to a separate property account and, currently, it is invested in a certificate of deposit.

In 1981, the Board of Trustees established the Founders Fund for special projects undertaken by the executive director of the Corporation. The Board authorized the transfer of these funds to the undesignated fund furing 1982.

4. Employment Contracts

The Corporation contracts with James W. Jacobs & Associates, Inc. and John C. Dussault on an annual basis to provide consultation and professional services to maintain operations, expand membership, sponsor events and any other services required by the Corporation. James W. Jacobs & Associates services were charged to biographical research in 1984 and management fees in 1983. John C. Dussault services were charged to management fees in both years.

5. Reclassification

Certain amounts in the 1983 financial statements have been reclassified to conform to the 1984 presentation.●

THE ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF MRS. MILEY BUSIEK

● Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, I wish to bring to the attention of my colleagues the accomplishments of one of my constituents, Mrs. Miley Busiek, of Dallas TX. Mrs. Busiek's design of a family of eagles will appear on the gold bullion coin which will be minted in accordance with one of the provisions of this legislation.

When discussion of a gold bullion coin began many years ago, Mrs. Busiek recognized that the tiny space on the surface of a solid gold coin could carry a powerful message about the values, traditions, and strengths of our country. Using her experience as an artist and sculptor, she set out to create a coin design which would honor "our families, senior citizens and young people" as well as sending a "timeless message of hope and strength, unity and optimism for the future that is our great heritage and an example for the entire world."

Mrs. Busiek has testified before both the House and Senate Banking Committees on her coin design. Her design has been enthusiastically endorsed by a bipartisan cross section of political organizations, civic and religious groups and distinguished citizens; including the chairman of the Dallas County Young Democrats and the Dallas County Young Republicans, the Boy Scouts of America, the Catholic Diocese of Dallas, the Jewish Federation of Greater Dallas, the dean of the Dallas Theological Seminary, and many others. Dallas Cowboys coach Tom Landry echoes the sentiments of these organizations when he writes that:

We, as a nation, have a wonderful opportunity to show our concern for, and pay tribute to, the American family, senior citizens and young people. The coin design portrays symbolically a people's concern for a vital segment of our society. The residents of my state can point with pride to the sculpting and design work of Mrs. Busiek, and the nation will benefit when the new gold bullion coins are minted with a design which is beautifully symbolic of America's spirit and values.●

DOMESTIC STEEL WAGES AND INTERNATIONAL COMPETITIVENESS

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, for too long, the complex relationship between wages and international competitiveness has been ignored. In the steel industry, for example, some have sought simplistically to explain declining U.S. competitiveness as a product primarily of excessively high U.S. labor costs. A recent study by Robert Lawrence and Cohn Lawrence entitled "Manufacturing Wage Dispersion: An End Game Interpretation," however, disputes this conventional argument.

The Lawrences argue that the steel industry's difficulties did not originate with labor costs, but with outside economic conditions. Increased international competition, lower domestic demand for steel, and more domestic competition from minimills enhanced labor's short-term bargaining position with management during the 1970's. This is because management lacked the credible threat of investment in labor-saving productivity improvements to withstand labor's demands at this time. Management was left with a simple choice: Reduce production and lose money or increase wages so that production could continue uninterrupted. Management rationally responded by choosing the latter.

By the 1980's, though, economic conditions had changed the power relationship considerably. Simply put, everything had gotten much worse. A decade of unfair foreign trade practices, combined with a lower demand for steel, made not only credible but inevitable the threat of plant closures and layoffs. Wages suddenly stopped increasing.

The conclusion, then, is that the steel industry's problems are not due to high wages. In fact, the opposite may be true; that is, the increase in domestic steel industry wages may be the result of declining U.S. international competitiveness. If the Lawrences are correct, we should stop blaming union greed for declining international competitiveness, and concentrate more on the unfair international environment in which American steel industries are now forced to conduct business.

Mr. President, the Lawrences though-provoking study is a welcome addition to the dialog on steel issues. I do not agree with all the study's conclusions, but its fresh approach offers us a new way at looking at the relationship between labor costs and international competitiveness. I ask, therefore, that the following article from the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette summarizing the study be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

WAGES DIDN'T CAUSE STEEL'S ILLS, STUDY SAYS

(By James O'Toole)

WASHINGTON.—While many analysts have cited high labor costs as a prime contributor to the decline of the nation's steel industry, a new study suggests that steel workers' wage increases through the 1970s were a result rather than a cause of the industry's ills.

This seemingly paradoxical effect is described in "Manufacturing Wage Dispersion: An End Game Interpretation," an article published this month by Cohn Lawrence of Columbia University and Robert Lawrence, a fellow of the Brookings Institution.

They theorize that decisions by management in response to economic conditions outside the control of labor resulted in a short-term strengthening of labor's bargaining position through the 1970s.

The authors start by examining why steel workers' wages increased by 37 percent relative to wages in general through the 1970s—a period when demand for steel remained relative flat. Under traditional economic theories, management would have been expected to be able to resist such a climb in its labor costs during slack demand.

The Lawrences argue, however, that the wage experience of the steel industry defined traditional assumptions because business conditions robbed management of one of its traditional bargaining tools—the alternative of making large-scale investments in new labor-saving plants and equipment.

"By the early 1970s," the Lawrences state, ". . . it became increasingly obvious that the construction of new integrated steel facilities in the United States was not a viable proposition. It was cheaper to build such plants in newly industrialized countries or to build mini-mills in the United States. These judgments were shared by expert analysts, participants in the stock market, and, as revealed by their behavior (if not their statements), steel management."

But while major new investment in steel plants was economically questionable during the decade, the paper argues it was still profitable to operate existing plants. Thus, the article states, "management [lacked] the credible threat of investing in new, more capital intensive plants or shutting down the old plants."

Labor, according to this theory, was thus in a position to reap part of the revenue that, under better industry conditions, would have gone toward investment in capital. The steel industry, in this analysis, became a cash cow for both labor and management through the 1970s. For management, the milking process was exhibited in part by diversification out of the steel business.

"By 1982, with its acquisition of Marathon Oil," the Lawrences observe, "U.S. Steel could be more accurately called U.S. Oil."

For labor, the milking came in the form of climbing wages.

Robert Lawrence, in an interview, said that neither labor nor management was necessarily conscious of the direction is was headed in throughout the 1970s.

"I don't think the individual union leaders necessarily understood why their power increased, but they did find that they could get higher wages without job losses."

Those conditions persisted until the early 1980s, when continued deterioration of the steel industry restored to management the power to resist union wage demands. They describe this shift as the second stage of steel's "end game."

After successive recessions in 1980 and 1982, conditions to the industry were so bleak that even existing plants could not be operated at a profit. Management once again had a credible counter to union demands, in the form of plant shutdowns and massive layoffs. The result was the 1983 industry-wide agreement that reduced steel worker wages by 9 percent and the numerous plant-by-plant concessions made by workers in the first half of the decade.

"Many observers have suggested that the high U.S. steel wages explain the decline in competitiveness of the U.S. steel industry," the Lawrences conclude. "In our view the reverse is more nearly true: the decline in competitiveness explains the rise in steel wages."●

COSPONSORSHIP OF S. 1393

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to cosponsor S. 1393, legislation to provide for a study of the use of unleaded fuel in agricultural machinery. This bill addresses an issue of extreme concern to the farmers in my State, and I commend my colleagues, Senator ABDNOR and Senator NICKLES, for their leadership on this issue.

This bill simply asks that the EPA and USDA take a thorough look at the effect of a leaded gasoline ban on the agricultural community. In cosponsoring S. 1393, I certainly do not want to imply that I oppose the goals of EPA's proposed phasedown of lead in fuel. The health and economic benefits of this phasedown are clear.

However, S. 1393 does not alter EPA's proposed phasedown. It simply requires that EPA and USDA study how these regulations will affect farm machinery. If this bill becomes law, the results of this study would be submitted to Congress no later than January 1, 1988. Neither a reduction in lead content below the 0.1 gram per gallon phasedown level nor a total lead ban could be imposed until 3 months after the report is submitted.

It is essential that both EPA and USDA thoroughly examine the effects of a ban on leaded fuel before allowing any regulation to go into effect which could require farmers to replace expensive equipment. It has been estimated that equipment replacement costs could run as high as $90,000 per farm. We should be sure that we examine all ways in which we can meet EPA's phasedown objectives without forcing farmers to replace costly tractors, combines and other machinery earlier than would otherwise be necessary.

I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this legislation.●

FEDERAL DEDUCTION FOR STATE AND LOCAL TAXES

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, a statement by Mayor Thomas C. Aposporos of Poughkeepsie, NY, was read by Mr. Joseph Chiseri, budget director of that city, at a recent town meeting I hosted. Mayor Aposporos' thoughts on the subject of the Federal deduction for State and local taxes are especially compelling and intelligent ones, and I commend them to the Senate's attention.

Mr. President, I ask that Mayor Thomas Aposporos' statement be printed in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

The statement follows:

STATEMENT BY MAYOR THOMAS C. APOSPOROS IN SUPPORT OF DEDUCTIBILITY OF STATE AND LOCAL TAXES

THE ISSUE

The deductibility of state and local taxes from Federal taxable income has been a part of the Federal Tax System since its inception in 1913. The legitimate concern for the growing federal deficit and the desire to reform and simplify the federal tax code are now making deductibility an issue. Those concerned about maintaining equity between taxpayers by taxing only disposable income should oppose the repeal of deductibility. Combined with the effect deductibility has on the revenue raising ability of local governments, this issue is of concern to the City of Poughkeepsie. We agree that the federal deficit must be reduced and that the tax code needs to be revised in the interests of fairness and simplicity. Neither tax equity nor good tax policy, however, would be served by repealing or reducing the value of deductibility.

THE CASE FOR RETENTION

The clearest and most common sense argument to support deductibility is that individuals should not be taxed on a tax. Nothing makes this argument less valid today than when the federal income tax was originally enacted. The key words are "ability to pay". Deductibility makes the tax system more equitable by ensuring that an individual's tax burden is based on the ability to pay. It is as simple as that.

Deductibility also enhances the revenue raising ability of states and localities, and justifiably so. Taxpayers receive, in effect, a federal rebate relative to their marginal income tax rate for every dollar paid in state and local taxes. In economic terms, this reduces the price of state and local government services. This obviously makes revenue raising a bit easier. Under a repeal of deductibility, it is uncertain whether many state and local governments would be able to raise revenues required to maintain services. The National League of Cities reports that it is estimated that the repeal of deductibility would result in a decrease in state and local revenues of $12.4 billion, based on 1982 data. This at a time when massive cuts in federal domestic programs are being considered which will cause localities to assume additional burdens.

Deductibility plays a role in narrowing interstate and intercity tax differences. This is a benefit in that it tends to reduce the incentive for businesses and individuals to migrate from one jurisdiction to another in search of the optimal tax situation.

Additionally, state and local governments receive the benefits of deductibility without the interference in state and local decision making and priority setting, as opposed to grant-in-aid programs which attach strings to the aid.

Contrary to the claims by opponents of deductibility that only wealthier taxpayers in higher tax brackets will benefit, analysis of past data indicates that middle income groups are the recipients of a majority of the benefits. The NLC reports that based on 1982 data, over 61% of the benefits of deductibility went to taxpayers who itemized and had income under $50,000. Almost 90% of the benefits went to those who itemize with income under $100,000. Those who argue that deductibility benefits only itemizers ignore the fact that the standard deduction represents deductions which a typical taxpayer in a particular tax bracket would take if he/she itemized. Thus, consideration is given to the value of deductibility in establishing the standard deduction.

Opponents of deductibility state that it is unfair that the largest states and cities with the highest per capita income and tax burdens benefit the most. We would argue, however, that this illustrates the equity and fairness of the concept of deductibility. Those paying the most taxes and the heaviest burden receive the most benefits. The benefits are targeted more rather than less equitably among states and cities.

CONCLUSION

We in the City of Poughkeepsie feel that deductibility works. Repeal would result in double taxation and studies indicate that the ability of state and local governments to raise revenue would be adversely affected. Revenue systems would be impacted at a time when we are being asked to assume heavier burdens. The concept of deductibility is no less valid now than it was in the early 1900's. The City of Poughkeepsie opposes any efforts to eliminate or reduce the deductibility of state and local taxes. Deductibility should be retained.●

REMARKS OF LT. GEN. WILLARD PEARSON, USA (RETIRED), VALLEY FORGE MILITARY ACADEMY

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, we are all aware that educating our young people is one of the highest priorities this Nation must maintain if we are to remain strong and retain our position of leadership throughout the world.

A very important element of our overall educational system is that of the military academies around this country that train our future leaders in all the services. One such institution is the Valley Forge Military Academy and Junior College, a school which, since 1928, has turned out over 13,000 graduates who have become leaders of industry, the professions, public service, and the military. A roll-call of the alumni of this exceptional academy would certainly read like a "Who's Who."

I would like to share with you, Mr. President, a speech dealing with the history of the Valley Forge Military Academy which was delivered by Lt. Gen. Willard Pearson, USA (retired), on April 30, 1985, which attests to the exceptional history enjoyed by the Valley Forge Military Academy, and I ask that his speech be printed in full in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The speech follows:

Fellow members of Newcomen and guests: There have been many glowing accolades paid to Valley Forge Military Academy and Junior College over the years. This evening's affair, however, given by such a prestigious organization as The Newcomen Society honors our Board of Trustees, staff, faculty and our proud corps of cadets. We are deeply honored by your presence on our campus here this evening.

In making an after dinner speech I have been advised that one should be brief, be accurate, and then be seated.

Ladies and gentlemen, I promise you that I shall be as brief as possible this evening—no matter how long it takes me.

Although most of my life has been spent as a professional soldier, I recognize that the first line of defense of our democracy—as well as the destiny of our great nation—lies not in our armed forces but in the character and education of our youth. According to Aristotle, "All who have meditated on the art of governing mankind are convinced that the fate of empires depends upon the education of their youth."

It is fitting that this institution, which first opened its doors in 1928, borrowed its name—Valley Forge—from a nearby Army encampment, commanded by General George Washington. Valley Forge was not the site of any famous battle. Washington's Continental Army spent a very bitter winter there. When that Army departed, it left behind for all of us a spiritual legacy of perseverance, courage and sacrifice. Valley Forge was not a military victory of arms; it was a "Triumph of the Spirit".

Speaking of George Washington reminds me of the remarks heard by a chaplain several years ago when he saw a very reluctant new cadet being brought onto the campus by his father. Upon departing the father said to his son: "If Valley Forge was good enough for General Washington, it's good enough for you."

It is also fitting that the motto on the school's shield, "Courage, Honor, Conquer," became a symbol for its very existence. Within four months of its founding in a converted hotel building in Devon—a nearby community—the school burned to the ground in a midnight blaze. The military efficiency of the staff and cadets averted any loss of life or injury, but most of the uniforms, books and personal possessions of those involved were lost.

Within a year of that setback, the Great Depression struck and private schools became an unnecessary luxury for many families.

Despite that rocky beginning Valley Forge survived—a feat credited to its founder and first superintendent, Lieutenant General Milton G. Baker. General Baker is cited as a leader of imagination, drive and energy, whose high standards demanded the best of everyone. He had a dream of founding a military school. He borrowed the money for the first building and recruited the initial corps of cadets and faculty.

When he saw his dream go up in smoke, General Baker found temporary housing for his 125 cadets, and within four days moved the school into its present site, a former boys' school with three dilapidated buildings.

General Baker, who incidentally was a member of The Newcomen Society, continued as the superintendent of Valley Forge for the next forty years, a period which saw the school enhance its national and international reputation for excellence. It was also a time of unprecedented expansion as the school and college grew from three to 84 buildings on a 125-acre campus.

This growth, in part, created another crisis for Valley Forge. During the late '60s and early '70s an anti-military sentiment mushroomed in this country due to the unpopularity of the Vietnam War. Cadet enrollments dropped drastically creating fiscal problems and deferring maintenance on the school's plant and facilities. A number of military schools throughout the country were forced to close their doors, merge with other schools, or suffer the extreme pangs of economic distress.

This was the situation in 1973 when I was appointed superintendent. Drastic action had to be taken. We initiated a program called "Operation Bootstrap" to reduce expenditures:

First: We froze wages for staff, faculty and employees at their current levels but did provide some merit increases.

Second: We restored to competitive bidding for all purchases and limited those to essential items only.

Third: We reduced the number of employees by reorganizing and reassigning responsibilities.

It was a real belt-tightening program but it produced results. The school's debt of $1.3 million was paid off in six years, thereby eliminating $81,000 in annual interest payments. We have not borrowed money from the bank for the past five years. As a result, interest income increased nearly ten-fold from $15,000 in 1973 to over $135,000 last year. Endowments, which were zero twelve years ago, are now nearing the million dollar mark and earning over $70,000 annually in interest.

We owe much of this fiscal success to our alumni and friends. Twelve years ago cash contributions for 1972-73 were less than $170,000. In the last four years cash contributions from our supporters have exceeded a half-million dollars in each of those four years. This progress would have been impossible without the generosity of the alumni, parents and friends of Valley Forge.

We are now debt free and operating on a cash basis. This has been achieved within our free enterprise competitive economy.

We have resumed across-the-board wage increases for officers and staff. We increased benefits such as insurance and hospitalization and offered grants to members of the faculty studying for advanced degrees or special education. We have also provided funds for memberships in professional organizations and maintained a generous subsidized housing program for most of our staff and faculty.

The bottom line for evaluating our accomplishments, however, is our 13,000 alumni and the successes they have achieved. Valley Forge graduates have left these halls of learning to become leaders of industry, the professions, public service and the military. A roll call of alumni reads like a "Who's Who."

What's the principal reason for the achievements of the men of Valley Forge? I believe this can be attributed to the cadet resolution and our stated mission. The mission is:

"To educate young men fully prepared to meet their responsibilities—alert in mind, sound in body, considerate of others and with a high sense of duty, honor and courage; and to foster love of God and country, gentlemanly qualities and high moral standards."

Valley Forge accomplished this mission through the values founded on military discipline—that is, recognition of authority and acceptance of responsibility. It is a method that has made Valley Forge preeminent among military schools and colleges and admired for the quality of its educational attainment. Our goal is to strengthen the spiritual and moral underpinnings of our cadets so that they, as mature adults, will improve the quality of our institutions, our professions and our society.

One of the most important aspects of the education of our youth, and yet often the most neglected, is that of developing wholesome beliefs, attitudes and goals in life. The Valley Forge faculty has assumed a greater obligation than simply teaching facts, figures and imparting technical knowledge. Their goal is to educate the whole man—mentally, physically, socially and spiritually—and to teach him to organize his time; to study; to think; and to communicate. Of greater importance, however, is teaching him to adapt to today's changing world without sacrificing those changeless values which develop strength of character, foster love of flag and country, and lead to honorable success.

We believe the highest purpose of education is the development of character. Over a hundred years ago Herbert Spencer, that great English philosopher, wrote: "Education has for its object the formation of character." Later President Theodore Roosevelt remarked, "To educate a man in mind and not in morals is to educate a menace to society." Dr. Steven Muller, currently the president of Johns Hopkins University, said: "Universities are turning out highly skilled barbarians because we don't provide a framework of values of young people who more and more are searching for it." In other words the need is to integrate the moral with the intellectual education of our youth.

The Valley Forge code of ethics establishes moral values as a basis for decision making and exemplary conduct. Also, each cadet must memorize and observe the Cadet Resolution to live by high ethical standards of conduct and behavior. The Cadet Resolution reads as follows:

"My goal in life is to achieve honorable success in my profession and to become a citizen of the highest integrity in my community. To this end, I resolve that:

Honesty and Integrity in thought, word and deed shall characterize my relationships with others.

Excellence shall be the hallmark of my endeavors.

Respect and consideration for all persons and their property shall be my resolve.

Strength of character shall be my objective as I strive to achieve greater self-discipline and the highest physical, mental, spiritual and moral development at Valley Forge.

Responsibility shall be my watchword, both in my obligations to others and in my commitment to my own objectives and ideals.

Remembering that noble thoughts inspire noble deeds, I shall aspire to a life of honorable service."

As one can see, the Cadet Resolution challenges each cadet to develop his full potential. His great satisfaction will come from his own exacting performance which will enhance his self-confidence and self-esteem.

Valley Forge has had a number of credos over the years. In the beginning it was, and still is for that matter:

"From the embattled fields of Valley Forge went men who built America. From the training fields of Valley Forge go men who will preserve America."

We have shortened that to a four-word saying: "Developing Tomorrow's Leaders Today."

We also have an unofficial credo which states: "Send us your boy and we will return to you a man."

Our four major educational goals are to motivate young men to acquire those habits and traits of character leading to academic excellence and leadership of the highest integrity.

Valley Forge is a fully accredited, nonprofit institution, with an annual budget of more than $7 million. We have a middle school—grades 7 and 8; a four-year preparatory school—grades 9 through 12; and a two-year junior college. The preparatory school prides itself on the high percentage of college acceptances of its graduates, which was 95 percent last year. The junior college boasts of an equally high rate of transfers to the junior year in leading four-year colleges and universities.

Teachers and cadets here have the advantage of a 65,000-volume library, a computer center, the latest equipment for science courses, language laboratories, a reading/testing and skills center, guidance department, and extensive athletic facilities.

Enrollment, which is sought on a quality but not on a quantity basis, holds steady in the 650 to 700 student range.

Cadets this year, incidentally, come from 26 states and 25 foreign countries. This diversity of backgrounds and cultures contributes to an international education and gives added breadth and character to our school and college.

We are proud of our achievements in academics. Both the academy and junior college were recently reaccredited by the Middle States Association of Colleges and Schools. This year Valley Forge has been selected as a semi-finalist in a survey to determine the nation's top fifty private schools. The survey, known as the "Exemplary Private School Identification Project," is conducted by The Council for American Private Education with a grant from the U.S. Department of Education.

A talented and dedicated faculty gives our program strength and vitality. Valley Forge has sixty-three full-time professors and instructors and another fifteen who are part-time. This provides for a 10-1 student-teacher ratio. We also have an added educational bonus for the cadet by providing extra instruction at the end of the school day. Mandatory supervised study periods are held from 7:30 p.m. to 9:40 p.m. five earnings each week.

There are many extras in a Valley Forge education, the most significant of which is leadership training. Cadet officers in the self-governing corps of cadets acquire practical experience in leadership and managership at an early age. The ROTC program augments this leadership training as do the many extra-curricular activities and athletic programs at Valley Forge.

The Academy's ROTC program has received annually the Department of the Army's "Honor School With Distinction" designation. This permits Valley Forge to nominate three graduates each year to the U.S. Military Academy and the U.S. Naval Academy, and five to the U.S. Air Force Academy.

An active center for the Study of Character Education has been established on campus to foster the teaching of morals and ethics as part of the regular curriculum. The center has developed a textbook for teachers on character education and will soon publish a book, entitled Values and Virtues, containing the thoughts of leading experts on the subject. These internationally-known advocates of character education have addressed the faculty and staff and held seminars with the cadets. The purpose of this program is to stimulate, motivate and inspire the cadets to emulate those individuals who have made important contributions to improving the quality of our society. In 1981 our character education program was awarded the George Washington Medal by the Freedoms Foundation at Valley Forge.

Augmenting the regular character development program is mandatory attendance at Sunday chapel services which reinforces the spiritual development of each cadet as taught by his parents at home.

The campus chapel is known as the Alumini Memorial Chapel of St. Cornelius the Centurion. St. Cornelius was a Captain in the Roman Army who was converted to Christianity and died a martyr.

The chapel was dedicated in 1950 by General George C. Marshall. It has a seating capacity for 1,500 persons for the regular nondenominational services. Noted persons from all walks of life have been guest speakers at chapel services.

Athletics also contribute to our character development. We provide our cadets with sixteen varsity sports, junior varsity competition and an intramural program. This allows everyone the opportunity to meet the challenges of athletic competition at his desired level. Sportsmanship, teamwork, fair play and individual pride are the prime objectives of our athletic program.

Athletic facilities include football, baseball, soccer and rugby fields; indoor and outdoor swimming pools; three gymnasiums with eight basketball courts and weight rooms; nine tennis courts; a quarter mile track; a five-lane bowling alley; an indoor 12 point rifle and pistol range; an archery range and an indoor riding arena for equitation and polo games. We have a stable of thirty horses to support our equitation and polo programs.

Valley Forge owns an airline, a Cessna 152, which is used to train young pilots. Twenty-five cadets were enrolled in the flight training course this year. Eight have soloed and one has received his private pilot's license. Initial instruction starts in a special class room on campus equipped with flight simulators, and continues at a nearby airport.

Other facilities here at the Forge include our laundry, tailor shop, a health center manned by an on-call physician, two certified physicians' assistants, and several nurses; and a magnificent student union building, Mellon Hall, named for its donor, the late Richard King Mellon, a Pittsburgh financier and philanthropist.

In addition to our equitation and polo programs, Valley Forge annually holds a Grandprix which brings the country's leading horses and riders to the campus to compete in a jumping competition of Olympic quality. This event, sanctioned by the American Grandprix Association, will be staged next Sunday, and riders will compete for $30,000 in prize money. Proceeds benefit the school's development and scholarship funds.

This brings us to another special event. You are all invited to return to Valley Forge tomorrow as my guests to observe our annual Loyalty-Law Day ceremony. Loyalty-Law Day—designated annually by the President of the United States—is the day we reaffirm and express our loyalty to this great nation in which we live and to the laws which govern it. In Russia—on the other hand—May 1 is the day the Soviets parade and demonstrate their military might.

At Valley Forge we observe Loyalty-Law Day by honoring a great person who has rendered distinguished service to our country. The award is named for Bob Hope, a great American who has given a lifetime of service to our country by entertaining our armed forces around the world in peace and in war. Bob Hope will be here personally to present the award we named for him—The Bob Hope 5-Star Civilian Award—to honor citizens for outstanding service to America.

The award this year will go to Mr. J. Willard Marriott, Sr., founder and chairman of the board of the Marriott Corporation. He served as chairman of two Presidential Inaugural Committees and was executive chairman of the Honor America Committee which organized a huge patriotic celebration in Washington, D.C. on Independence Day in 1970.

The ceremonies start at 5:00 p.m. In addition to seeing Bob Hope and Mr. Marriott, you will have the pleasure of witnessing the precision marching of our corps of cadets to the stirring music of our band in a regimental review.

The presence of these two great Americans on our campus, Bob Hope and Mr. Marriott, makes Loyalty-Law Day a most meaningful day at Valley Forge. Their presence will serve to motivate and inspire our cadets to follow in their footsteps and render honorable service to our country in whatever profession they elect to follow.

Bob Hope received the first award in 1975 in recognition of his dedication to bringing humor and laughter to millions of Americans and particularly to our service personnel, in war and peace, at home and abroad. Past recipients of the honor were: President Reagan; U.S. Senators Barry Goldwater and Strom Thurmond; Generals Lyman L. Lemnitzer, Alexander M. Haig, Jr. and William C. Westmoreland; and Ambassadors Clare Boothe Luce and Walter H. Annenberg.

We have been proud to honor these distinguished Americans, and to have been host to a number of other notables over the years, including Dwight D. Eisenhower. The late president visited the campus three times, including a weekend stay when we dedicated Eisenhower Hall in his honor. Eisenhower Hall is our elegant officers' dining facility.

And now, a personal message, if I may.

In a way you might call this evening "My Swan Song." I will be seventy years of age shortly after the end of this school year, and our Board of Trustees has decided they should seek new and younger leadership. It may be time for a change for the long-range benefit of the school and college.

Our Board of Trustees has evolved from a local constituency into a highly professional group of talented executives from various professions and businesses nationwide as well as internationally. I am grateful to the Board for their tremendous encouragement, support and guidance which has made my task here easier and more pleasant. I am certain that whoever replaces me will also be as fortunate in his relationship with the Board.

The announcement of my pending retirement has brought nearly a hundred messages from far and wide congratulating me on my leadership role here. I deeply appreciate those words of praise and shall cherish and sentiments.

As the superintendent, assisted by an outstanding staff and faculty, I consider our major achievements to have been:

Restoration of the school's fiscal soundness.

Improvement of student quality and the overall academic and military programs.

Establishment of the Center for the Study of Character Education.

The publication of a textbook, Values and Virtues, which outlines Valley Forge's Character Education Program.

The observance of Loyalty-Law Day and awarding of the Bob Hope 5-Star Award to distinguished Americans.

Organization of the Valley Forge Grandprix now in its eighth year.

The passage of congressional legislation awarding ten 2-year Department of the Army ROTC scholarships yearly to each of the six military junior in the United States.

Finally, the passage of congressional legislation authorizing second lieutenants commissioned in the military junior colleges to be eligible for active duty training with the reserve compenents.

Ladies and gentleman, may I conclude by saying, you have honored Valley Forge Military Academy and Junior College with your presence tonight. We are pleased to have so many distinguished guests on our campus. Please come back to see us—you will always be welcome.●

NEW TECHNOLOGY AND THE FUTURE OF STEEL

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, encouraging information on new technology and the future of the steel industry was presented by David Cantor on July 22, 1985, in testimony before the House Subcommittee on Investigations and Oversight.

After first exploring the background to the current crisis in the steel industry, Mr. Cantor addresses the crucial question of how well the U.S. steel industry is adjusting to changes in the steel market. He finds that U.S. steel producers are rapidly modernizing due to increased competition at home and abroad. He adds that modernization is being energetically pursued with the most sophisticated technologies being employed.

More sobering, though, is the news that, despite the sustained effort by U.S. steel producers to adjust to increased competition, low world demand for steel and unfair foreign trading practices persist, making adjustment a tough process. Nevertheless, the steel industry should be commended for the extent to which it has modernized.

Those of us in the Congress have an obligation to do what we can to help them through the difficult process which remains.

Mr. President, Mr. Cantor's testimony in the House deserves our attention too, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The testimony follows:

PREPARED TESTIMONY—HEARINGS ON NEW TECHNOLOGY AND THE FUTURE OF STEEL

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee: My name is David Cantor. I am a Specialist in Industry Economics in the Economics Division of the Congressional Research Service. I appreciate very much your invitation to participate in these hearings, and the opportunity to share with you the result of my analysis of the steel industry.

Many claims are made, Mr. chairman, that the current difficulties facing the steel industry are grounded in management decisions of the past. We hear that the industry overbuilt capacity. We are told that the industry took advantage of its market power and was slow to innovate and modernize. The industry itself tells us that it erred in allowing costs to rise in an almost unbridled way. No longer is the industry dominated by a small group of integrated producers that enables it to dictate price and quantity in the steel market. It now includes a new breed of steel-makers, and "minimills", that have become a significant force for competition in the declining or at best stagnant steel market. They and foreign steel producers that sought overseas markets for themselves, have created a highly competitive market environment. Thus, the integrated segment of our industry, which was virtually the only supplier in the U.S. steel market in the past, is unable to utilize its capacity efficiently and profitably. More important, perhaps, the industry finds itself hard pressed financially to undertake those efforts that could conceivably shore up its ability to meet its competition head-on and with reasonable prospects for success.

My research and analysis of developments in the steel industry suggest to me that the fundamental problem of the industry is the adjustment to changes that have occurred in the U.S. steel market. While, in the past, we economists would characterize the structure of the steel market as an oligopoly—a market where only a few sellers supply the product, today, the steel market is highly competitive. Thus, while management decisions relating to price and investment could be made largely independent of the combined market forces of supply and demand in the past, today they are driven by those market forces.

I would suggest, also, that, even in the past, when the industry faced relatively little competition from abroad, from competing materials, and from new entrants into the industry, America's steel industry was to a degree an innovator in developing and implementing new and more efficient processes to make steel. It could innovate, funding its investment from revenues generated in the oligopolistic market that it dominated. In the present market environment of competition, it continues to be an innovator in adopting new technologies for steelmaking. Thus, while the evidence may support the thesis that the steel industry has not simply sat back and allowed itself to fall behind with respect to technical innovation, the questions today are the adequacy of its efforts in the past, and its ability to make the additional investments necessary to survive—the minimal goal of any seller even in the theoretically ideal, purely competitive market.

THE POST-WORLD WAR II PERIOD TO 1980

Mr. Chairman, strong claims are made that management decisions of the past may be responsible for the steel industry's dilemmas of today. In particular, let me address the question of overcapacity. If the steel industry overbuilt its capacity in the years and decades following World War II, those decisions resulted in part from federal government policy. Analysts—both those regarded as critics of the industry (Donald Barnett and Louis Schorsch, for example) and those viewed as sympathetic to it (Father William Hogan, for example)—agree on this point. President Truman proposed in his State of the Union Message in 1949:

"(Legislation) to authorize an immediate study of the adequacy of production facilities of materials in critically short supply, such as steel; and if found necessary, to authorize government loans for the expansion of production facilities to relieve such shortages, and furthermore to authorize the construction of such facilities directly if action by private industry fails to meet our needs."

The industry disagreed, contending that the outlook for steel demand did not justify expansion. History is on the side of the industry. In 1951, America's steel industry had about 105 million tons of capacity. Yielding to government pressure, it expanded capacity to about 136 million tons by 1960, at an annual rate of growth of about 2.9 percent. Virtually all of this added capacity was in the form of open-hearth furnaces, which replaced the obsolete Bessemer furnaces. In this same period, U.S. steel demand, while fluctuating in response to changes in the business cycle, actually declined at an annual rate of about −0.8 percent. Although excess capacity was created in the industry, the major steel producers did not hold down prices, which rose at an annual rate of nearly 6 percent.

Let me cite one more example of the effect of government policy on the expansion of steel-making capacity in the United States. In 1954, Bethlehem Steel Corporation attempted to acquire the facilities of Youngstown Sheet and Tube Company. Bethlehem wanted productive capacity in the midwest to serve the growing automotive and appliance markets. The Department of Justice opposed the acquisition on antitrust grounds, a decision that was upheld in the courts in 1958. As a result, and in order to penetrate the midwest steel markets, Bethlehem built in the early 1960s the first large "greenfield" plant constructed in the United States since 1952, its plant at Burns Harbor, Indiana. Let me note that, while government policy may have influenced the expansion of capacity in this case, the decision to build Burns Harbor brought with it one of the first large-scale installations of what has become the predominant steel-making process in the world today, the Basic Oxygen Process. Thus, government policy may have coincidentally contributed to technological innovation and modernization of America's steel industry.

Major expansion of steel-making capacity came to an end by 1960, because of lack of growth in demand and the absence of government pressure to expand steel-making capacity. In the 1960s, steel capacity grew by about 8 million tons, at an annual rate of about 0.6 percent. In this same period, demand grew at a rate of about 3.1 percent per annum. Prices continued to rise in this decade.

Then, we come to the 1970s. In the first half of this decade, there was a substantial net increase in total industry capacity to about 180 million tons. But there are several reasons for this. First, domestic steel demand was rising from about 100 million tons in 1969–70 to over 120 million tons in 1973. Second, we begin to detect the strong presence of the "minimills" into the market; these are the relatively small companies that produce steel from scrap metal in electric furnaces. More than two-thirds of the 12.5-million ton expansion of electric furnace capacity took place in the "minimill" segment of the industry from 1972 to 1975. Furthermore, from 1975 on, virtually all of the growth of electric furnace capability took place in the "minimills".

A third reason for the expansion of steel capacity in the first half of the 1970s is that the large integrated steel companies were engaged in the process of modernization. In particular, the integrated companies were ridding themselves, of outmoded and obsolete capacity. Between 1972 and 1975, the industry closed down nearly 20 million tons of relatively inefficient open-hearth capacity, replacing it with 15 million tons of the more efficient Basic Oxygen capability.

While expansion of capacity reached its peak in the mid-1970s, it declined thereafter. For all intents and purposes, the capacity reduction of about 15 million tons in the last half of the 1970s was the result of the continuing process of modernization, namely the elimination of excess open-hearth capability, and the emergence of a declining trend in steel demand. Electric furnace capacity grew by about 5 millions tons, mainly in the "minimill" segment of the industry. Basic Oxygen capability was cosntant at about 96 to 97 millions tons. The most important development in the last half of the 1970s was the closing down of more than 20 millions tons of inefficient open-hearth furnace capability.

The post-World War II era provides examples of modernization other than replacing the obsolete steel-making processes of the past—Bessemer and open-hearth. The integrated steel companies were active in this modernization process. In 1967, U.S. Steel Corporation commissioned the first continuous caster in the United States for its Gary, Indiana works. National Steel and McClouth Steel installed continuous casters in 1968 and 1969.

In the 1960s, America's steel industry was active in developing the process for the direct reduction of iron ore (DRI). Among these efforts were those of Armco, which built and operated a pilot plant in Kansas City, Missouri in 1966 and later, in 1972, a full-scale commercial plant in Houston, Texas. Two other DRI plants were built in the early 1970s: the Midland-Ross plant in Portland, Oregon and the Georgetown Steel plant in Georgetown, South Carolina. None of these DRI ventures proved to be economically viable, however, owing to the sharp increases in natural gas prices in the late 1970s; the DRI process used natural gas as a basic energy input. Be that as it may, these examples indicate that the U.S. steel industry was clearly experimenting with, developing, and implementing new productive processes in the decades gone by—although the extent to which it made technical progress may have been influenced by its market structure.

Before leaving the past, Mr. Chairman, it is important to point out that the oligopolistic structure of the steel market permitted the dominant firms in the industry to adopt pricing strategies other than those of the competitive market place. In particular, the claim is made that steel companies engaged in what economists label, "administered pricing". That is, price is determined by costs to which a percentage mark-up is added. This is the conclusion of Dr. Zoltan Acs in his recently published study of the steel industry. It is almost taken for granted by one of the industry's most prominent critics, Dr. Robert Crandall. Indeed, though this strategy is becoming increasingly difficult to implement in today's market, it has become the norm on which analysts base their analyses of the industry: for example, the Congressional Budget Office (CBO) estimated the price effects of a steel import quota using an equation in which input costs were explanatory variables. In a market where sellers can exert a significant influence on supply, an administered pricing strategy might be considered a prudent business decision. But when the structure of the market changes, this pricing strategy gives rise to the problem of not being able to compete on the basis of price.

This is why we hear one steel industry executive after another confess that they allowed costs to run rampant as recently as the early 1970s. Perhaps, they permitted costs to rise so sharply, because they did not recognize that the market structure was changing, and the industry did not recognize the need to adjust to these changes. In testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee on July 1, 1983, David Roderick, the CEO of United States Steel Corporation, stated:

"Clearly, during the 1970's, it (labor costs) ran amok. Incidently, I am not, you know, banging the steelworkers for this. Keep in mind that we steel companies signed those contracts, so this is joint bargaining. We did this together. We did not do it very well, in my opinion. We got each other into trouble."

Dr. Acs indicates that demand was a minor factor in influencing price, and that costs of production—mainly, those of labor (which were negotiated with the United Steelworkers on an industry-wide basis)—were dominant in explaining steel price behavior. The point is that, in the past at least, the steel industry could accept higher costs of production, passing them through to buyers, because the structure of the market it served was an oligopoly, where competition from other sellers at home and abroad and from other materials was not a significant concern, and where price could rise above the point at which the market would clear.

THE STEEL MARKET TODAY

Mr. Chairman, if I were to use one phrase to describe the steel market today, it would be "adjustment to competition": competition for market share in a stagnant or declining market; competition with the "minimills"; competition with competing materials; and, competition with imports. This competition has been very tough on the integrated segment of the industry at least, although even the "mimimills" are experiencing difficulty in the marketplace. Indeed, the Barnett-Schorsch study of the steel industry is aptly titled—Steel: Upheaval in a Basic Industry.

First, the market for steel is stagnant. For about the past decade, demand for steel has fluctuated around the 100 million ton level. U.S. steel demand reached a high point of nearly 117 million tons in 1978; its low point was about 76 million tons in 1982. In 1984, U.S. steel demand wa about 98 million tons, and forecasts of future demand by Data Resources, Incorporated suggest that steel demand will be at levels of about 100 million tons through the rest of this decade.

Steel demand has not responded to economic growth. One reason for this is the emergence of substitute materials—especially, plastics and aluminum. Indeed, during the 1970s and into the 1980s, a significant drop occurred in the so-called steel intensity of the economy; that is, the ratio of steel input to real Gross National Product. My analysis of trends in steel intensity indicates that it fell by 22 percent in the 1970s, and by another 14-15 percent in the first half of this decade. The downsizing of cars and the increased use of lighter weight materials in cars and construction help to explain this structural shift away from steel. The only bright spot in this analysis is that the date imply that further declines in steel intensity are likely to be very modest. The point is that steel demand is not likely to rise significantly.

At the same time, we have significantly more sellers in this stagnant market. The large integrated companies clearly dominate in terms of capacity: according to data compiled by Acs, the seven largest companies have over 110 million tons of capacity, but there are also at least 60 "minimill" companies with expanding capacity. These "minimills" have been extremely succussful in penetrating the market for structural products. In 1975, electric furnace output, a reasonable surrogate for "minimill" activity accounted for 20 percent of total U.S. steel production; by 1984, they accounted for about 35 percent of the nation's steel output. Their emergency as a force in the industry makes the steel market more competitive, effectively requiring the integrated companies to adjust to the changes in market structure.

Why are they so successful? One, they are small. They do not have to make the investments in blast furnaces and large steelmaking furnaces that the integrated companies must make. Two, they specialize at least for the present in a small range or products. They do not have to have different rolling mill complexes. Three, they are located close to their markets. Thus, their customers incur lower transportation costs than they would if they bought from larger but more distant mills. Four, many employ non-union labor. Thus, they avoid some of the high labor costs and work rules that the unionized integrated companies must operate under. Five, there is some evidence that they benefit from local government assistance: at least one of the most prominent "minimill" companies, Nucor, obtained a substantial amount of its financing through industrial revenue bonds.

But even the future of the "minimills" is debatable. A recent article in Iron Age, a respected trade journal, reported that the traditional market for "minimill" products may be saturated. The article quotes Kenneth Iverson, the CEO of Nucor, as saying:

"In the past, the primary competition for mini-mills was foreign suppliers and integrated producers. Over the last three or four years, this has changed so that the primary competitors today are other minimills—and I expect that to continue into the future."

While praising their accomplishments, the American Iron and Steel Institute observed in its 1985 annual report:

"But now, minimills face the problems of growing maturity. Their financial success is based on high volume sales at low per ton profit margins. But economic growth in some traditional minimill markets seems to be slowing, and as they try to move into higher value products, they find themselves competing for a larger share of still depressed markets."

Furthermore, the "minimills", being scrap-based, are likely to encounter significant problems of quality control, should they expand their product line into flat-rolled products. The uniformity of the quality of the raw material inputs is more important in the latter than in the structural and bar products that "minimills" now produce.

The integrated companies compete not only with other industries and the "minimills" for a share of the stagnant steel market, but also with foreign imports. In 1984, the United States imported steel from over 50 countries. Our steel imports represented over one-fourth of the domestic market. There is some indication that foreign steel companies—in Taiwan, for example—built new capacity to capture overseas markets. Even today, new steel mills are being built in third-world countries: Nigeria and Pakistan recently opened or are close to completion of their new steel mills; Venezuela is constructing a 4.8 million ton mill, which, according to a Forbes magazine article, will produce steel to earn foreign exchange. Despite our industry's efforts to modernize, the steel industries of most other countries are newer than our industry, embodying state-of-art technology. Labor costs overseas are a fraction of ours. Even with the import restraint expected as a result of the President's steel program, foreign producers could expect to hold 20 percent of our market.

The integrated steel industry has attempted to respond to the sluggish marketplace for steel and to the competition it faces at home and abroad. Father Hogan discusses the efforts of the major companies to adjust to the market in his book, Steel in the United States: Restructuring to Compete. I addressed the industry's efforts in my report, America's Steel Industry: Modernizing To Compete; with your permission, I submit this report for the record. Essentially, I found three elements to the steel industry's modernization efforts:

1. Rationalization of existing capacity;
2. Adoption of currently available state-of-art technology; and
3. Research and development of new technologies for steel-making.

Clearly, in a smaller market, a critical element of modernization is the elimination of old and obsolete plant. We saw that the industry was engaged in this effort in the 1970s. Perhaps of greatest long-term promise, we observed that the integrated industry replaced some of its older outmoded capacity with more modern plant. Indeed, let me cite some of the data developed by Barnett and Schorsch on the age of steel plants in the United States and Japan; I think this data will put to rest the idea that our plant is "ancient" and, thus, unable to compete. On average, our steel-making furnaces are about 2 years older than those in Japan; our continous casters are about the same age. Where we lag behind is in the product rolling mills: our mills are from 4 to 10 years older than those in Japan.

Our industry has moved forward vigorously to install state-of-art technologies, although not as aggressively as in other countries. From 1981 to 1983, we has a positive rate of growth of continuously cast output, while most other countries had negative growth rates. In this period, a period marked by severe recession, our steel industry constructed or commissioned more than 16 continuous casters. In 1984, nearly 40 percent of our steel output was continuously cast, nearly double the share in 1980; as a result, the industry is making headway in catching up with foreign producers in the use of this technology.

Companies are planning to install new direct reduction processes using coal, thereby bypassing the coking and blast furnace operations. Wily Korf recently announced plans to install this process in his Wallingford, Connecticut plant. Weirton Steel, formerly part of National Steel, has similar plans, and is seeking funding from the Department of Energy to proceed with them.

Smaller, incremental changes in technology are being installed in steel-making operations. New ladle refining systems are in place in Armco's Ashland, Kentucky plant; U.S. Steel Corporation is installing such a system at its Fairfield, Alabama plant.

LTV Corporation is engaged in a joint venture with Sumitomo Corporation to install a state-of-art electrogalvanizing mill at its Cleveland works. Again, in spite of the stagnant market, we find continued evidence that the industry is installing or willing to install current state-of-art technology to enhance its ability to produce steel of high quality and in competition with imports.

The modernization effort does not stop here, however. The steel industry in collaboration with federal agencies is engaged in research and development efforts to find even more efficient ways to produce quality steel products. You know of the sensor research being undertaken at the National Bureau of Standards. This effort, if successful, would permit the industry to monitor more precisely the quality of the steel as it moves through the various stages of production: from molten metal to ingots to semifinished shapes to final products. Similarly, U.S. Steel Corporation and Bethlehem Steel Corporation have joined together with the Department of Energy to develop processes for near net shape casting. This process, if successful, would permit the industry to produce slabs one-fourth the thickness of conventional slabs; these thinner slabs would require less processing than the conventional product, with the result of lower costs.

Thus, we see the industry responding to the forces of competition by utilizing its total plant more efficiently, implementing new processes, and looking forward to still newer developments in steelmaking technology. America's Steel Industry is indeed modernizing to compete.

PROSPECTS AND PROBLEMS IN THE FUTURE

Mr. Chairman, as I look back upon the recent and not-so-recent history of the steel industry, I am impressed by the fact that it has continually engaged in a modernization process. Up to the 1970s, it could undertake this effort in a more comfortable business environment: the "minimills", substitute materials, and competition for relatively more modern foreign industries were not major forces affecting it. But, as we know from the experience of just the past few years, all of these factors have created a major change in the steel industry's business environment; they have thrust it into a highly competitive market.

To survive in this market, integrated steel companies must cut costs. They can do this by developing and installing new processes for making steel. They can do this by eliminating inefficient capacity, replacing it in whole or in part by more modern furnaces and rolling mills. They can attempt to reduce labor costs, and are likely to do so by negotiating work rule changes, lower hourly compensation costs, or both.

The issue is not that the industry will not adopt this strategy for survival in a competitive marketplace; I think it is fair to say that the industry has adopted this strategy. The issue is the adequacy of the effort—particularly in its modernization program. This issue is of interest to Congress, because, when Congress passed the Steel Import Stabilization Act as Title VIII of the Trade and Tariff Act of 1984 (P.L. 98-573), it conditioned any import relief on the industry's reinvestment of its cash flow from steel operations into those operations. Congress and the President were willing to restrict competition in the U.S. steel market for five years, but only if the industry was willing to undertake a modernization program that would enable it to become competitive on its own, one that its former market structure did not require of it.

Mr. Chairman, my analysis of the industry's investment pattern in relation to its cash flow a year ago indicated that the industry was already meeting the requirements of the current law. From 1979 to 1983, the industry invested about 3.5 billion dollars more in steel operations that it generated in cash flow from those operations; over these five years, it invested about 11.5 billion dollars in steel operations, while it generated from operating income and depreciation allowances, about 7.9 billion dollars. While I cannot predict the future investment behavior of the industry, I think it is fair to say that the industry is likely to meet the requirements of the law by investing its cash flow from steel in steel.

But even the industry would agree that the amount of investment necessary to become internationally competitive is far greater than its average annual investment of about 2.4 billion dollars in steel operations in the recent past. President Reagan's Steel Advisory Committee, which functioned from November 1983 to November 1984 with participants from industry, labor, and government, reported that the necessary amount of investment in steel would be in the range of 5 to 5.5 billion dollars per year. (I would note that the Committee's report represented a consensus of the views of its members.) The American Iron and Steel Institute claims that "the domestic steel industry, to maintain 95 million tons of shipments capability in the 1980's, needs to spend about $5.2 billion annually to insure adequate modernization of its facilities." Donald Trautlein, CEO of Bethlehem Steel Corporation, in his testimony before the Senate Finance Committee on June 13, 1985 on the President's tax reform proposal, stated that the industry would fall short of its desired investment goals by about 1.5 billion dollars. Thus, while there is every reason to believe that the steel industry will be in compliance with the law, there is also reason to believe that industry investment would be inadequate for it to become competitive in all markets.

Now, frankly, the industry's estimate of its investment requirements may be inflated. They assume a shipment level of 95 million tons, which implies either a massive surge in demand or virtually no imports. As I have already noted, the demand for steel in the forseeable future is projected by Data Resources, Incorporated to be about 100 million tons per year. The only other possibility is for imports to drop to levels of 5 to 7 million tons, if domestic steel shipments are to rise to 95 million tons; this, too, is improbable. Even if the industry's estimate of capital requirements is too high, it is probably fair to say that they will need substantially more per year than they have invested in steel operations in the recent past.

The industry is likely to encounter great difficulty in raising this capital. Conventional borrowing means interest rates in the range of 13.5 to 16.5 percent today, a premium of from 2 to 5 percentage points above the rate paid by high quality long term borrowers. According to the recent Iron Age report on "minimills", even firms in this segment of the steel industry are experiencing difficulty in borrowing.

Indeed, if the steel industry could borrow at substantially reduced rates of interest, not only would it be able to reduce capital charges, but also it would be better able to implement the results of the research and development efforts going on, and benefit from the lower costs derived from new technology. Consider the following optimistic scenario. I recently estimated that a 3.5 percentage point reduction in the interest rate paid by steel companies could lower costs by about 14 dollars per ton just owing to the change in the rate. In addition, if the companies borrowed to install a continuous caster, total costs of production could be reduced by still another 35 dollars per ton.

Among options for generating the capital the industry says it needs to modernize other than conventional borrowing in the capital markets, there is the possibility of more joint ventures with foreign investors. Note, if you will, the purchase of a 50-percent interest in National Steel by Japan's Nippon Kokan Steel Company. There are other examples as well. Nisshin Steel (Japan) has a 10-percent equity interest in Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Company. LTV Steel has a joint venture with Sumitomo Steel (Japan) at its electrogalvanizing plant in Cleveland, Kawasaki Steel (Japan) is providing some of the capital to refurbish the Fontana plant of California Steel Company. Canadian steel companies have invested heavily in some of our "minimill" companies: Chapparall and Raritan River Steel. Joint ventures with foreign steel companies emerge as a real possibility for generating capital.

Another option is to finance modernization by executing what amounts to lease-purchase agreements. Bethlehem Steel Corporation is doing just this in order to acquire its two continuous casters at Burns Harbor and Sparrows Point. The Austrian manufacturer of the casters, Voest-Alpine, will receive a payment per ton of steel produced by the casters at the two plants.

Obviously, government could provide some funding directly or indirectly to finance steel industry modernization. To some extent, it is already doing so. There are already various provisions built into our tax code that benefit the industry. The Department of Energy is involved in a collaborative effort with United States Steel Corporation and Bethlehem Steel Corporation to develop a near net shape casting process. The American Iron and Steel Institute and the National Bureau of Standards are jointly engaged in a research and development project to develop sensors to enhance quality control of steel-making. Your Committee authorized expenditures of, I believe, six million dollars by the Department of Energy for steel research, and additional funds for the National Bureau of Standards.

I emphasize these questions of financing modernization, Mr. Chairman, because, whatever the results of the efforts of the scientists and engineers in developing new technologies for steel-making, they translate into a more modern, efficient, and competitive steel industry only if they can be implemented. There is a major difference between technologcal innovation and economic innovation. In the former, new processes may be developed. In the latter, they must pass the tests of economic viability. Thus, in view of the stagnant outlook for steel demand, the existence of excess capacity in the industry today, and the considerable apprehension on the part of the industry regarding the effectiveness of the President's import restraint program, it would not be surprising if the industry implemented new processes with considerable caution.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I address the question of the outlook for employment in the steel industry. Most analysts agree that modernization of the steel industry will not result in a resurgence of employment in the industry. For example, installation of a continuous caster to replace ingot-casting and the milling of ingots into semi-finished shapes would, according to the recent report of the National Academy of Engineering, reduce labor input per ton of steel by about 50 percent. Except that demand for domestic steel would rise, it is unlikley that persons on layoff or displaced owing to plant closings would be able to reclaim their jobs.

Let me share with you a report by my colleague at CRS, Linda LeGrande, that was commissioned by the Subcommittee on Science, Research, and Technology of the House Science and Technology Committee, and that they have authorized me to release to you. LeGrande finds that the level of steel industry employment over the next decade may not fall substantially from present levels. But, she also finds that the composition of the labor force in the steel industry will change significantly in the next ten years. The lower skilled personnel will give way to more highly skilled and educated workers. Thus, another implication of modernization is that the characteristics of the labor force are likely to be very different from today's steel workforce. Even if employment were to stay at present levels, many of those currently employed would not be able to retain their jobs. Mr. Chairman, I submit for the record and consideration of this committee, the report by Linda LeGrande, Employment in the Steel Industry: The Shape of Change.

Mr. Chairman, in closing, I find the steel industry to be one that has demonstrated a willingness to modernize and to commit resources to that effort, and I would expect that to continue. This is, I think, most encouraging, because such an attitude is critical to its meeting the challenges of adjusting to a competitive marketplace. America's steel industry, in spite of foreign competition and overall sluggish or declining demand, appears to be anything but a dying industry. But, Mr. Chairman, I am not deluded into thinking that the steel industry will emerge as it is today from its current struggle to become fully competitive at its present size. There is still much obsolete capacity in place. Grave doubts exist regarding the ability of the industry to finance its modernization. I suppose that the outlook for the industry can best be expressed by an industry spokesman, Donald Trautlein, who closed his address to the American Iron and Steel Institute at its 1985 annual meeting with these words:

"We are taking significant steps forward—and we're determined to take more. A lot of good things are happening—and we are making progress. While our industry may be slimmer by 1[illegible], it will also be a lot smarter, a lot stronger, and a lot more competitive."●

AMENDMENT OF THE MERCHANT MARINE ACT OF 1936

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report S. 1522.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1522) to amend section 607 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, to ensure consistent use of funds made available for capital construction of vessels, and for other purposes.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I object to further consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection having been heard, the bill will be placed on the calendar.

REMOVAL OF INJUNCTION OF SECRECY

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, as in executive session, I ask unanimous consent that the injunction of secrecy be removed from the Vienna Convention for the Protection of the Ozone Layer (Treaty Document No. 99-9), transmitted to the Senate by the President of the United States on September 4, 1985.

I also ask that the treaty be considered as having been read the first time; that it be referred, with accompanying papers, to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed; and that the President's message be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There being no objection, the message was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith, for the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, the Vienna Convention for the Protection of the Ozone Layer. The report of the Department of State, the final act of the conference that adopted the Convention, and an environmental assessment and finding of no significant impact are enclosed for the information of the Senate.

The Convention provides a foundation for global multilateral undertakings to protect the environment and public health from the potential adverse effects of depletion of stratospheric ozone. The Convention addresses this important environmental issue primarily by providing for international cooperation in research and exchange of information. It could also serve as a framework for the negotiation of possible protocols containing harmonized regulatory measures that might in the future be considered necessary to protect this critical global resource.

The Convention, which was negotiated and adopted under the auspices of the United Nations Environment Programs [UNEP], will be an important step toward protecting and enhancing public health and the quality of the global environment. The United States played a leading role in the negotiation of the Convention. Expeditious ratification by the United States will demonstrate our continued commitment to progress on this significant environmental issue.

I recommend that the Senate give early and favorable consideration to the Convention and give its advice and consent to ratification.

RONALD REAGAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, September 4, 1985.

SOUTH AFRICA

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I want to thank my colleagues for their vote today. I hope that we will not invoke cloture on Wednesday. It will be a close vote because I think now, as I have indicated, it is not the punishment of South Africa. Someone is trying to punish Ronald Reagan. I think that test ought to be met in the same spirit that we have tried to work out an accommodation on South Africa. The President has made a dramatic gesture, not just symbolic, but a real effort to meet Members of Congress more than half way, in fact nearly all the way, in fact probably too far to suit some Members of the Congress, some in both parties. I hope that by Wednesday we can agree that the best course to follow would be to postpone further consideration of the conference report on the antiapartheid bill until some future time so that we can all determine what happens in the interim, not only in South Africa internally, but whether or not the administration, the present administration, the Reagan administration, carries out its commitment under the Executive order, as I have no doubt that it will.

ORDERS FOR TUESDAY

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 2 P.M.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today, it stand in recess until 2 p.m. on Tuesday, September 10, 1985.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF CERTAIN SENATOR

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I further ask unanimous consent that following the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, there be special orders in favor of the following Senators for not to exceed 15 minutes each: Senator COHEN, Senator MATTINGLY, Senator SYMMS, and Senator PROXMIRE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I further ask unanimous consent that following the special orders just identified there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 3:30 p.m. with statements limited therein to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS UNTIL 2 P.M. TOMORROW

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, there being no further business to come before the Senate, I move, in accordance with the order just entered, that the Senate stand in recess until 2 p.m. on Tuesday, September 10, 1985.

The motion was agreed to; and, at 5:34 p.m., the Senate recessed until tomorrow, Tuesday, September 10, 1985, at 2 p.m.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate September 9, 1985:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

Patricia Mary Byrne, of Ohio, a career member of the Senior Foreign Service, class of Minister-Counselor, to be Deputy Representative of the United States of America in the Security Council of the United Nations, with the rank of Ambassador.

Alan Lee Keyes, of Maryland, to be an Assistant Secretary of State, vice Gregory J. Newell.

Natale H. Bellocchi, of New York, a career member of the Senior Foreign Service, class of Minister-Counselor, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Republic of Botswana.

Michael Sotirhos, of the District of Columbia, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Jamaica.

Jean Broward Shevlin Gerard, of New York, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Luxembourg.

Clyde D. Taylor, of Maryland, a career member of the Senior Foreign Service, class of Minister-Counselor, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Republic of Paraguay.

Roger Kirk, of the District of Columbia, a career member of the Senior Foreign Service, class of Career Minister, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Socialist Republic of Romania.

Robert G. Houdek, of Illinois, a career member of the Senior Foreign Service, class of Minister-Counselor, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Republic of Uganda.

Malcolm Richard Wilkey, of Texas, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plentipotentiary of the United States of America to the Oriental Republic of Uruguay.

INTER-AMERICAN FOUNDATION

Elliott Abrams, of the District of Columbia, to be a member of the Board of Directors of the Inter-American Foundation for a term expiring September 20, 1990, vice Langhorne A. Motley.

THE JUDICIARY

David A. Nelson, of Ohio, to be U.S. circuit judge for the sixth circuit vice a new position created by Public Law 98-353, approved July 10, 1984.

James L. Ryan, of Michigan, to be U.S. circuit judge for the sixth circuit vice George Clifton Edwards, Jr., retired.

Stephen V. Wilson, of California, to be U.S. district judge for the central district of California vice a new position created by Public Law 98-353, approved July 10, 1984.

Alan H. Nevas, of Connecticut, to be U.S. district judge for the district of Connecticut vice a new position created by Public Law 98-353, approved July 10, 1984.

David Sam, of Utah, to be U.S. district judge for the district of Utah vice Aldon J. Anderson, retired.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Stephen M. McNamee, of Arizona, to be U.S. attorney for the district of Arizona for the term of 4 years vice A. Melvin McDonald, resigned.

William A. Maddox, of Nevada, to be U.S. attorney for the district of Nevada for the term of 4 years, vice Lamond Robert Mills, resigned.

Patrick M. McLaughlin, of Ohio, to be U.S. attorney for the northern district of Ohio for the term of 4 years vice J. William Petro.

Roger Hilfiger, of Oklahoma, to be U.S. attorney for the eastern district of Oklahoma for the term of 4 years, vice Gary Loy Richardson, resigned.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR

Dennis Miles Kass, of New York, to be an Assistant Secretary of Labor, vice Donald L. Dotson.

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH AND HUMAN SERVICES

Ronald E. Robertson, of Virgnia, to be General Counsel of the Department of Health and Human Services, vice Juan A. del Real, resigned.

ADMINISTRATIVE CONFERENCE OF THE UNITED STATES

Marshall Jordan Breger, of the District of Columbia, to be Chairman of the Administrative Conference of the United States for the term of 5 years, vice Loren A. Smith.

CONSUMER PRODUCT SAFETY COMMISSION

Carol Gene Dawson, of Virginia, to be a Commissioner of the Consumer Product Safety Commission for a term of 7 years from October 27, 1985. (Reappointment)

ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION AGENCY

Lawrence J. Jensen, of Virginia, to be an Assistant Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, vice Jack E. Ravan.

Jennifer Joy Manson, of Virginia, to be an Assistant Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, vice Josephine S. Cooper, resigned.

EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT

M. Alan Woods, of the District of Columbia, to be a Deputy United States Trade Representative, with the rank of Ambassador, vice Robert Emmet Lighthizer, resigned.

FEDERAL EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT AGENCY

James P. McNeill, of Maryland, to be an Associate Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, vice Fred Joseph Villella.

FEDERAL MARITIME COMMISSION

Edward V. Hickey, Jr., of Virginia, to be a Federal Maritime Commissioner for the remainder of the term expiring June 30, 1986, vice Alan Green, Jr., resigned.

Francis J. Ivancie, of Oregon, to be a Federal Maritime Commissioner for the remainder of the term expiring June 30, 1987, vice Robert Setrakian, resigned.

GENERAL SERVICES ADMINISTRATION

William R. Barton, of Virginia, to be Inspector General, General Services Administration, vice Joseph A. Sickon, resigned.

NATIONAL SCIENCE FOUNDATION

Craig C. Black, of California, to be a Member of the National Science Board, National Science Foundation, for a term expiring May 10, 1990, vice David V. Ragone, term expired.

Charles L. Hosler, of Pennsylvania, to be a Member of the National Science Board, National Science Foundation, for the remainder of the term expiring May 10, 1988, vice John H. Moore.

SECURITIES INVESTOR PROTECTION CORPORATION

Roger A. Yurchuck, of Ohio, to be a Director of the Securities Investor Protection Corporation for a term expiring December 31, 1987. (reappointment)

U.S. ADVISORY COMMISSION ON PUBLIC DIPLOMACY

Herbert Schmertz, of New York, to be a member of the U.S. Advisory Commission on Public Diplomacy for a term expiring April 6, 1988. (reappointment)

Edwin J. Feulner, Jr., of Virginia, to be a member of the U.S. Advisory Commission on Public Diplomacy for a term expiring July 1, 1988. (reappointment)

E. Robert Wallach, of California, to be a member of the U.S. Advisory Commission on Public Diplomacy for a term expiring July 1, 1988. (reappointment)

U.S. INTERNATIONAL TRADE COMMISSION

Anne E. Brunsdale, of the District of Columbia, to be a member of the U.S. International Trade Commission for the term expiring June 16, 1993, vice Veronica A. Haggart, resigned.

DEPARTMENT OF HOUSING AND URBAN DEVELOPMENT

Richard H. Francis, of Virginia, to be President of the Solar Energy and Energy Conservation Bank, vice Joseph S. Bracewell.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Raymond D. Lett, of Virginia, to be an Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, vice C.W. McMillan, resigned.

Raymond D. Lett, of Virginia, to be a member of the Board of Directors of the Commodity Credit Corporation, vice C.W. McMillan.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

Winston Lord, of New York, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the People's Republic of China.

U.S. INSTITUTE OF PEACE

Sidney Lovett, of Connecticut, to be a member of the Board of Directors of the U.S. Institute of Peace for a term of 2 years expiring January 19, 1987 (new position).

John Norton Moore, of Virginia, to be a member of the Board of Directors of the U.S. Institute of Peace for a term of 4 years expiring January 19, 1987 (new position).

Richard John Neuhaus, of New York, to be a member of the Board of Directors of the U.S. Institute of Peace for a term of 2 years expiring January 19, 1987 (new position).

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

James W. Spain, of California, a career member of the Senior Foreign Service, class of Career Minister, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Democratic Socialist Republic of Sri Lanka, and to serve concurrently and without additional compensation as Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Republic of Maldives.

51-059 O-86-9 (Pt. 17)

NATIONAL FOUNDATION ON THE ARTS AND THE HUMANITIES

Helen Marie Taylor, of Virginia, to be a member of the National Council on the Humanities for a term expiring January 26, 1990, vice Mary Beth Norton, term expired, to which position she was appointed during the recess of the Senate from June 29, 1984, until July 23, 1984.

DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Charles A. Trabandt, of Virginia, to be a member of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission for a term expiring October 20, 1988, vice Georgiana H. Sheldon, term expired.

U.S. INSTITUTE OF PEACE

W. Bruce Weinrod, of the District of Columbia, to be a member of the Board of Directors of the U.S. Institute of Peace for a term of 2 years expiring January 19, 1987. (new position)

IN THE AIR FORCE

The following officers for appointment in the U.S. Air Force to the grades indicated, under the provisions of section 624, title 10 of the United States Code:

To be major general

Brig. Gen. Stuart E. Barstad, [redacted] FR, U.S. Air Force, Chaplain.

To be brigadier general

Col. John P. McDonough, [redacted] FR, U.S. Air Force, Chaplain.

IN THE ARMY

The following-named Army Medical Service Corps officer for appointment in the U.S. Army to the grade indicated under the provisions of title 10, United States Code, sections 611(a) and 624:

To be permanent brigadier general

Col. Walter F. Johnson III, [redacted] Medical Service Corps, U.S. Army.

IN THE NAVY

The following-named officer for appointment as Vice Chief of Naval Operations pursuant to title 10, United States Code, section 5085:

To be vice chief of naval operations

Vice Adm. James B. Busey IV, [redacted] /1310, U.S. Navy.

The following-named officer having been designated for command and other duties of importance and responsibility within the contemplation of title 10, United States Code, section 601, for appointment to the grade of admiral while so serving:

To be admiral

Vice Adm. James B. Busey, IV, [redacted] /1310, U.S. Navy.

The following-named officer, under the provisions of title 10, United States Code, section 601, to be assigned to a position of importance and responsibility designated by the President under title 10, United States Code, section 601:

To be admiral

Adm. Lee Baggett, Jr., [redacted] /1110, U.S. Navy.

The following-named officer, under the provisions of title 10, United States Code, section 601, to be assigned to a position of importance and responsibility designated by the President under title 10, United States Code, section 601:

Adm. Ronald J. Hays, [redacted] /1310, U.S. Navy

The following-named officer, under the provisions of title 10, United States Code, section 601, to be assigned to a position of importance and responsibility designated by the President under title 10, United States Code, section 601:

To be admiral

Vice Adm. James A. Lyons, Jr., [redacted] /1110, U.S. Navy.

The following-named officer, under the provisions of title 10, United States Code, section 601, to be assigned to a position of importance and responsibility designated by the President under title 10, United States Code, section 601:

To be admiral

Vice Adm. Arthur S. Moreau, Jr., [redacted] U.S. Navy.

The following-named officer, under the provisions of title 10, United States Code, section 601, to be assigned to a position of importance and responsibility designated by the President under title 10, United States Code, section 601:

To be admiral

Vice Adm. Carlisle A. H. Trost, [redacted] /1120, U.S. Navy.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

IMPACT OF OIL MERGERS SEEN

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1985

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, we are continuing to see the troubling ripple effects of the current wave of giant oil mergers. A recent article which I am inserting in the RECORD reports that one of the parties to a merger is selling off some of the assets it acquired in an effort to pay off part of the enormous debt resulting from the merger.

Among the concerns raised about the giant oil mergers has been their impact on credit and the debt structure of the industry and the possible adverse consequences for exploration for new reserves. Events such as those reported in the article appear to lend support to the arguments of those who questioned the viability of the companies resulting from the mergers.

The broader lesson to be learned here is that we should stop rushing through approval of these mergers without adequate review and consideration of the consequences. My bill, H.R. 2777, is designed to improve procedures for consideration of oil mergers so we can be assured of a more deliberate approach.

GULF REFINERY IN SOUTH PHILADELPHIA FOR SALE, CHEVRON SAYS

(By Andrew Cassel)

Chevron Corp. is seeking buyers for its Gulf Oil refinery in South Philadelphia and up to 2,000 service stations in the region, company officials confirmed yesterday.

Several major U.S. oil companies and foreign-owned concerns have expressed interest in the 370-acre facility that employs nearly 800 workers, although no "serious negotiations" have taken place, Chevron officials said.

Chevron is putting its East Coast properties into a package that it hopes will sell quickly and help pay part of the company's $14.1 billion debt, which it took on in the 1984 merger with Gulf Corp., officials said.

In addition to the refinery, the package would include adjacent gasoline terminals, oil-storage "tank farms" and about half the 4,000 Chevron and Gulf gasoline stations from Maine to Virginia.

Whoever buys the properties would own "a balanced company that could continue operations as an ongoing buisness," said Orvis Larsen, a Chevron executive who heads an East Coast task force for the company.

Larsen insisted that a sale is only one of several options being considered by Chevron. But he said the company has told prospective bidders it would be willing to tailor a package to suit their needs, adding or subtracting gas stations or other properties to help speed a sale.

"The main driving force behind what we're doing is reduction of our debt," Larsen said. Chevron began offering information packages to prospective bidders about three weeks ago, he said.

The package would include enough gas stations and wholesale supply contracts to handle the refinery's output, which can equal 175,000 barrels of oil per day.

"The marketing assets included would move a volume of produce that's just about equal to the production of the refinery," Larsen said.

Chevron has sold a number of former Gulf properties, including an oil refinery in Louisiana and gasoline stations in the Southeast. The company was near a separate $2.2 billion agreement this week to sell its Gulf Canada Ltd., subsidiary to the Reichmann family of Toronto, but the buyers pulled out at the last minute, forfeiting an $18 million deposit.

Among the reported bidders for Chevron's Southeastern properties last year was Kuwait's government-owned oil company, which industry observers said is interested in obtaining an outlet in the United States for its crude oil. Larsen said some of the prospective bidders for the East Coast properties are from overseas, but he declined to identify them.

Industry experts said that Dutch oil trader John Deuss, who last month agreed to buy the Arco refinery in South Philadelphia from Atlantic Richfield, was examining the Chevron/Gulf properties.

"There's a lot of speculation about Deuss looking at it," one oil industry official said.

Other industry observers doubted that Deuss, who is paying $420 million for Arco's refinery, terminals, pipelines and more than 500 gasoline stations and convenience stores in Philadelphia and New York, could finance another deal of comparable size.

"It would stretch him, unless he bought it for a country like Oman," said one oil trader familiar with Deuss' operations.

Deuss has dealt heavily in Omani crude oil, and is said to have close ties in the Persian Gulf sheikdom.

John Simmons, the retired Arco executive who has been representing Deuss in his dealings in Philadelphia, said he did not know whether the Dutch trader was interested in Gulf's refinery.

"I would be very much surprised if that were the case," he said.

Another source familiar with both Philadelphia refineries said they had different technical strengths and could be operated together without undue duplication.

"They are extraordinarily compatible units," he said.

Unlike most of Arco's stations in this area, which are owned by the company and rented to dealer-franchisees, nearly all of Chevron's stations are owned by dealers or distributors who sell Chevron- or Gulf-brand gasoline under a supply contract with the company.

Gulf stations in this region recently abandoned their widely promoted policy of charging credit-card customers the same price as those who pay with cash. Chevron stations had been charging extra to cover credit-card processing costs, and that policy has been extended to Gulf stations, a Gulf official said.

Arco's sale to Deuss was part of its massive abandonment of the gasoline market east of the Mississippi River and its repositioning as a West Coast rather than a national marketer of petroleum products.

Chevron, which became the nation's largest seller of gasoline after the Gulf merger, is not planning a similar restructuring, officials said.

ROBERT BARTLEY ON TOYING WITH DEPRESSION

HON. JACK F. KEMP

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1985

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, yesterday's Wall Street Journal contains the best analysis I have seen of the dangers which lurk in the current mindless itch in Congress to start a worldwide trade war.

Wall Street Journal editor Robert Bartley's article, "Toying With Depression," explains the remarkable similarities between today and the early 1930's, and points to the need for systemic reforms of trade, finance, and the monetary system—not Smoot-Hawley protectionism.

I commend this article as "must" reading for my colleagues.

The article follows:

TOYING WITH DEPRESSION

(By Robert L. Bartley)

For nearly two generations a remarkable consensus dominated American thinking on foreign trade. Protectionism is bad. There was no debate; everyone agreed, but we have forgotten why. Today Congress is awash in protectionist schemes, and it takes an old man to recall that the lesson was painfully learned.

"Some of us remember the 1930s, when the most destructive trade bill in history, the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act, helped plunge this nation and the world into a decade of depression and despair," President Reagan told a radio audience Saturday. "If the ghost of Smoot-Hawley rears its ugly head in Congress, if Congress crafts a depression-making bill, I'll fight it."

The stock-market crash of 1929 came in the midst of debate in Congress over the tariff; it had spent the year adding item after item to the protection list. In mid-1930 the Smoot-Hawley bill became law, with the highest tariffs in the nation's history. What might have been an ordinary correction—early 1930 showed a recovery in share prices and stabilization in industrial production—turned into the Great Depression. The economy fell until 1933, and fully recovered only with World War II.

ENGINE OF ECONOMIC PROGRESS

After the war, America led the world to a historic open economic order. Following the path set in the Roosevelt administration by Secretary of State Cordell Hull and his reciprocal trade agreements, the international community created such institutions as the Bretton Woods monetary agreement and the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. The long postwar boom dawned. These experiences etched into our national consensus, and in particular into the minds of President Reagan's generation, that free trade means prosperity and protectionism means depression.

Economists have of course made much of this argument since Adam Smith. They find that the principal engine of economic progress is the law of comparative advantage; if each good is supplied by the lowest-cost producer, all will be richer. And the more widely comparative advantage works, the more wealth it creates. By blocking comparative advantage, protectionism hurts those on both sides of a barrier. Such arguments fell on deaf ears when 1,028 economists petitioned President Hoover to veto Smoot-Hawley; after the Depression they were readily accepted.

Economists have of course offered many explanations for the Depression besides Smoot-Hawley. At the time, many economists thought the Depression was caused by some kind of technological exhaustion, a theory that vanished when growth returned. The Keynesians explained the Depression in terms of liquidity traps and accelerators and multipliers, a vocabulary that now seems quaint after stagflation and other things impossible in a Keynesian universe. The monetarists think the Depression was caused by M1, though others find its zigs and zags then as puzzling as those today. Some still see the villain as speculation; in fact, at the 1929 high the Dow Jones Industrials were bid up to a price-earnings ratio of 20—high, but far from a tulip-craze level.

The Depression was nothing if not international, and thus there is also an international interpretation. Indeed, at least to judge by a summer immersion in Depression literature, those who look to the international economy for causes are both numerous and increasingly persuasive. Their explanation is succinctly put by Peter Fearon of the University of Leicester, "The origins of the great slump, which began in 1929, are to be found in the United States, which, by reducing its capital exports and imports of goods, placed an impossible strain, directly and indirectly, upon the world economy."

Sketching the economic landscape on the eve of the Depression is instructive, not to mention eerie:

First, an unprecedented international debt crisis. The U.S., historically a foreign borrower, entered World War I with a net debt of $3 billion. It lent to the allies, and emerged with foreign net credits of some $6 billion, which Britain, France and others planned to repay by collecting reparations from Germany. After the war U.S. bond houses floated issues for Germany, Latin America and others, Mr. Fearon remarks: "During the 1920s several U.S. finance houses changed their tactics from the traditional one of waiting for the borrowers to come to New York to the more aggressive approach of sending out agents in search of potential borrowers. This move led to fierce competition, with many agents urging clients to borrow to the hilt."

Second, a declining price level, especially for primary products. Until 1928, the Federal Reserve kept interest rates low in what was thought of as an easy money policy. But prices were level to slipping, and as usual minerals and food fell most sharply.

Third, agricultural distress. Falling prices brought screams from agricultural states. Whether the actual Farm Belt distress in the 1920s was commensurate with the complaints is in retrospect an open question. Modern and well-financed farms prospered until the Depression itself. But the heavy food demands of the war led to overexpansion, inflated land values and heavy debts for many farmers. As prices topped out, the values collapsed and debts became unmanageable.

Fourth, exchange-rate problems. After the war, nations gradually proclaimed their return to the gold standard, but increasingly declined to follow its rules. The U.S. allowed its price level to decline despite holding nearly 40% of the world's monetary gold reserves in 1921, for example. In what most consider a mistake, Britain returned to gold at the pre-war level, while the franc returned at a lower level. Like the U.S., France gained gold but felt that adjustment was the responsibility only of nations losing gold.

Fifth, a fiscal policy of supply-side tax cuts. Most reviewers of the period take a Keynesian view of fiscal policy, suggesting that too much devotion to a balanced budget helped cause the Depression or at least inhibited its cure. To supply-siders, the important feature of the 1920s was the remarkable series of tax cuts promoted by Treasury Secretary Andrew Mellon. Attacked by some as sops to the rich, the cuts were accompanied by the 1920s boom.

For the U.S. this landscape was rosy—gains in production, a stock-market boom, lower prices, lower taxes, a balanced budget, a strong dollar—the Roaring '20s. Then the Depression burst forth.

The internationalist writers—Charles Kindleberger, Mr. Fearon, Heywood Fleisig—find its first signs in a drop in U.S. lending abroad during 1928 and 1929. Frightened by the stock-market boom, the Fed tightened in 1928. U.S. loans abroad dipped, while foreigners poured more funds into the U.S. A drop in the flow of capital from the U.S. put further pressure on weak foreign economies. With the capital account flows drying up, the only way other economies could earn dollars to buy American goods or service American-held debt was through trade. To sustain the international economy, in other words, the U.S. had to import.

Instead, the path to trade protection opened in the waning days of the 1928 campaign, when presidential candidate Hoover promised to call a special session of Congress on agricultural relief. It quickly became apparent that this meant raising the tariff, which Joseph Schumpeter described as the "household remedy" of the Republican Party.

In December Rep. Willis Hawley's Ways and Means Committee announced public hearings on a tariff revision, and his call was not limited to farm goods. As the bill passed the House in May, was heard by Sen. Reed Smoot's Finance Committee and reached the Senate floor in September, more and more industries climbed on the bandwagon. After more months of haggling, the conference committee accepted the highest tariffs in either bill. President Hoover, consoling himself with the observation that it contained authority for the executive branch to change the rates administratively, signed the bill into law.

U.S. imports, $5.9 billion in 1929, fell to $4.4 billion, $3.1 billion and $2.1 billion in the next three years. With the capital account closing and imports declining, U.S. exports necessarily fell, and retaliatory tariffs abroad further advanced the cycle. Trade closed around the world. With the austerity policies of the Bruning government, deflation was particularly severe in Germany, where Hitler assumed full power in 1933. One writer, Goronwy Rees, says that Smoot-Hawley "convinced Japanese public opinion that American policy would not tolerate the legitimate expansion of Japanese trade," and Japan turned back to conquest instead.

Clearly the Smoot-Hawley tariff was a colossal blunder, but just as clearly it was but one mistake in a series. Was it the decisive one? The financial and psychological causes often offered for the Depression seem somehow inadequate; so deep and persistent a collapse seems to call for an explanation based in the real economy, for example trade in goods and services blocked by protectionism. But because Smoot-Hawley didn't become law until nine months after the stock-market crash, it has not usually been considered the cause of the Depression.

But quite plausibly it was the cause after all, in light of Jude Wanniski observation that the market crash came precisely as congressional maneuvering made it clear the tariff bill would go beyond agriculture. We now know that the stock market does anticipate events in just such a way, and Mr. Wanniski also finds other correlations: The market broke with news of the special session and with House passage of the bill, and stabilized in early 1930 on the hope of a presidential veto. Both stocks and commodities broke sharply as soon as Hoover announced he would sign the bill.

Even if Smoot-Hawley was not the cause, it certainly played a leading role in the ongoing contraction. When it passed, stocks were still above 1928 levels, for example. But as the international accounts closed down, the world economy choked.

GHOST OF SMOOT-HAWLEY

In the largest sense, the Depression was caused by the interaction of political and economic events. What is troublesome is to see the same politico-economic scenario working itself out today: International debts, falling primary prices, agricultural distress, an end to foreign lending, and now rising clamor for protection. No one intends to write another Smoot-Hawley, of course, but no one intended to write the first one. Once the notion of protection was let loose by Hoover's special session, more and more protection was claimed by special interest after special interest. As Mr. Kindleberger put it, "The congressional rabble enlarged protection from agriculture to primary products and manufactures of all kinds."

With some 300 protectionist bills now before Congress, we are indeed seeing the ghost of Smoot-Hawley. If we toy with protectionism, we will be toying with another depression. But at least a 74-year-old man is around to remember, throwing an ironic cloak over "the age issue." In facing the protectionist threat, we are singularly lucky to have an old and experienced President who lived through it the last time.

INFORMING THE PUBLIC

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1985

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, earlier this year the Office of Management and Budget proposed regulations which would substantially curtail the amount of information about our society which is collected and made available by the Federal Government. The Subcommittee on Employment and Housing of the Committee on Government Operations, which I chair, held hearings on this matter and these hearings confirmed my view that the proposal as originally made would be a disaster for the intellectual, political, and economic life of our country, because of the extent to which it would curtail in forum debate.

I was pleased to read, during our recess, an article by a very distinguished economist, Prof. Carolyn Shaw Bell of Wellesley College, documenting the harm this proposal would do. I ask that Professor Bell's article from the August 13 Boston Globe be printed here.

INFORMING THE PUBLIC

(By Carolyn Shaw Bell)

A proposed regulation from the Office of Management and Budget threatens this paper, its readers and anyone who cares about any public issue. Dump sites for hazardous waste, the seatbelt bill currently being considered, jobs lost to low-wage countries or the impact of exit polls on voting behavior are issues only because facts about these conditions exist.

The OMB regulation proposes to restrict, severely, the public availability of information collected from the public and paid for by taxes on the public. Federal agencies now collect information needed to carry out their congressionally assigned tasks. For example, every employer must report on a quarterly basis wages and Social Security taxes paid for every employee. From such reports figures on total taxes paid, number of people covered, type of employer, and so on, have routinely been published. But from now on, if may not happen.

Language in the proposed regulation says, "Agencies would have to show that information dissemination activities were essential to their missions," and of course the Social Security Administration does not need to publish these figures to keep accounts for people.

The Globe regularly publishes the Department of Commerce figures on international trade, exports and imports. Most people have read about the number of millionaires who pay no income tax, reported by the IRS. Asbestos and lead poisoning became known as public dangers after the National Center for Health Statistics had published, year after year, data on the causes of deaths. The figures are collected to help these agencies carry out their congressional missions, but all three could function without sharing this information with the public. If the OMB proposal were in effect none of these facts would be "essential" and they would not, therefore, be provided.

The regulation also requires that information be disseminated only by "imposing user charges where appropriate" and with "maximum feasible reliance on the private sector." Today agencies commonly issue press releases describing key points in their new information. TV, radio and the newspapers can report this news and interested parties can buy the complete reports. And since many public libraries and those at colleges and universities receive government documents and periodicals almost everyone can learn about all the information. How will this change?

Libraries with limited budgets will not be able to pay for everything they now receive and probably many reports will be discontinued because they are not cost-effective. Perhaps the news media will pay to subscribe to press releases; the prices charged for government publications will rise because of fewer buyers.

But some users would pay, and willingly. Publishers and consultants can now buy, very cheaply, computer tapes of federally-collected statistics, repackage them in glossy almanacs or directories and sell "their" information for high prices. Under the new regulation, such, volumes will become far more profitable, because the agency reports now available to knowlegeable users may no longer exist.

Much existing information is so taken for granted it is difficult to imagine doing without it. A local committee can plan housing for the elderly with accurate numbers from the Department of Housing and the Bureau of the Census. Advaocates for or against repealing the state income surtax have plenty of figures from the Treasury Department.

But such groups will be reduced to using rhetoric and opinion instead of convincing information if the OMB proposal goes into effect. The regulation proposes that the private sector take over many of the surveys and data collection programs now managed by federal agencies, and sell their information rather than releasing it generally.

The private sector has no particular interest in collecting all the useful information, only that which can be profitably marketed. The private sector need not design objective programs to collect complete figures on a regular basis.

Instead, controversy will sponsor the publication and collection of information by those lobbying for one side or another. Evidence about air pollution malnutrition or prison brutality can be produced to whip up fears or to reassure readers. State and local figures on employment, street crimes or recreational facilities can be collected and disseminated to bolster the political aims of the private-sector organization producing the data.

Only government is charged with the public interest and the general welfare. Government-collected information is widely available to dispel ignorance so that the public can make informed choices.

The full impact of the proposed regulation is still unknown. Only one brief public hearing has been held. And most people will discover, too late, how harmful the regulation is.

OMB insists no censorship is planned nor any denial of the public's right to know. But it has also made no real attempt to let people know about the proposal, nor campaigned for a wide range of comment, nor alerted potential users. Presumably it is not "essential" to the mission of OMB that information be disseminated about the proposed regulation. The threat is real, and everyone has a stake in the outcome.

NATO AND THE PUBLIC

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1985

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, in November 1984, the North Atlantic Assembly Committee on Civilian Affairs, which I chair, published a report on the need for a more effective NATO information service. The report was prepared by my friend and colleague, the committee's general rapporteur, Dr. David Clark.

I believe the report to be particularly apropos in light of any adverse affect the West German spy scandal may have had on public opinion of NATO. If the people knew more about NATO then they would be better able to assess problems confronting it. It is important that the general public understand the importance of NATO, and of course, the continued crucial role that, our friend and ally, West Germany plays in that organization. The Atlantic Alliance is much more than bombs and bullets; it is concerned with keeping the peace and legitimate East-West dialog.

Dr. Clark's report offers some excellent suggestions as to how NATO can better communicate its message to the public. I am inserting excerpts from the report for my colleagues' perusal. I can make available a complete copy of the report for anyone who is interested.

NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY, COMMITTEE ON CIVILIAN AFFAIRS, GENERAL REPORT ON THE PUBLIC AND THE ALLIANCE

SUMMARY

The Rapporteur aims at identifying the difficulties in communication between the public and NATO, and at suggesting ways of solving them.

I. The State of Public Opinion

The aims of the Alliance are not well-understood by the public. Since the fear of a war has increased in all Alliance countries, and since nuclear war would be utterly catastrophic, the flexible response strategy has not answered public concerns, especially as opposition to nuclear weapons has increased in the last few years. The Rapporteur's assertion is that deterrence rests largely on public support, and that a consensus on the Alliance therefore has to be re-established.

The defence will of citizens has a direct bearing on defence spending, since parliaments have to vote appropriations. At a time when the nuclear threshold should be raised, for strategic as well as public reasons, the public passivity over defence is a matter of concern.

National differences and party-political approaches have also accounted for a lessening of the consensus on the Alliance.

II. Issues Affecting the Public

Three problems have been detrimental to the comprehension of Alliance strategy by the public. The fact that NATO has based its policy on a nuclear response means that any change of vocabulary by the United States is misunderstood in Europe. Conversely, the fact that a large majority of the US public is determined to support the use of US troops if Western Europe were to be attacked is not known.

A clearer association between the Alliance and national survival is also needed. People can more readily understand the necessary demands that are made of them if they can see that their own survival as a national entity relies upon the perpetuation of the Alliance.

The public's dissatisfaction can also be noticed in the discrepancy between some elements of the Alliance's strategy, and relatively new problems, such as the safety of supplies or the need for a European pillar of the Alliance.

III. A New Information Structure for NATO

The Rapporteur describes the present information structure of NATO, based on purely national responsibility. He advocates a more positive approach in each member-country, with the emphasis being placed on variety, by setting up bureaus which would operate through the organizations existing in each country, such as political parties, trades unions, interest groups, etc. The example of the EEC is a case in point.

In NATO itself, the Committees dealing with information should be upgraded and their role in presenting communiques increased. NATO has to realise that information has become a vital part of the Alliance's strategy, since its credibility relies very largely upon it.

1. Governments in democratic countries have to take decisions, even when they are unpopular, but they cannot do so against the wishes of their electorate, when these are expressed by a vote. Furthermore, it is difficult to pursue policies which are contrary to the public mood. However, "public opinion" is much more elusive concept than the electorate, which is a reality expressed by the vote. We are therefore torn between the two extremes: on the one hand, democratically-elected leaders have to take public feelings into account, if only out of prudence, whereas, on the other hand, these cannot be identified clearly. The instruments for measuring support for policies are not perfect, and we are left with an impressionistic approach.

2. What a politican can do, however, is to try to identify problems as he sees them with the help of whatever tools he can find, and offer suggestions for meeting them. In this respect, your Rapporteur should like to express his thanks to those colleagues on this Committee who have sent him results of opinion polls in their countries on the subjects he will be addressing in this report.

3. It is necessary, when dealing with opinion issues, to caution against some misunderstandings. First, it is useful to distinguish between the public as a whole and the leaders, or opinion formers, who are better informed than the general public and share some of the vocabulary and concerns of the decision-makers. Although some of the examples in this report will relate to leaders' positions, if only because of their influence on public opinion as a whole, the report will focus on the attitudes of the public itself. The second caveat arises from the difficulty of comparing results of opinion surveys, especialy on an international basis. Methods vary from country to country, the questions are not strictly the same, and even the same words can bear different connotations. Your Rapporteur would therefore wish to be particularly careful, drawing general conclusions only insofar as they represent visibly a basic framework. Moreover, your Rapporteur would like to underline that opinion surveys seem to him to be one of the means of studying public positions, but that they should be treated with caution. The recent controversy in the Federal Republic of Germany over the drafting of different polls on missile deployment, which induced very varied answers, is a case in point. (1)

4. It is undeniable, however, that politicians and experts consider that public opinion, even in the realm of international policy, is playing an increasingly important role. Even the real politician "par excellence", Dr. Kissinger, argued for his controversial plans to reshap NATO on the basis of the challenge to the Alliance by the "peace movement" and "key segments of public opinion".[32] Democracies cannot ensure their own defence if voters, and their representatives, drag their feet at every proposed amendment to the defence structure. The most compelling reason for this is, of course, financial, although other considerations also have a bearing on it. This is not to say that the general public should determine policies, especially in comparatively abstruse areas such as international affairs and defence. It simply has to be noted that the public now takes part in the discussion of policies in these areas, and that the democratic nature of our regimes implies that this participation will have consequences in terms of budgetary constraints, and of the practicability of the available choices when decisions have to be made. In other words, governments' freedom to act will be more limited. The public will set a framework which will determine the boundaries of policy-making. Governments have some means of influencing the public, but they have to be concious of the change in public attitudes if they want to lead the citizens rather than to be confronted by public opinion.

I. The state of public opinion

6. Without attempting to describe public feelings as thoroughly as if this report were an academic survey of public opinion in our sixteen countries, your Rapporteur would like to try and describe the underlying trends that account for the awkwardness of public reactions to government policies. Three conclusions emerge: public doubts over the effectiveness of NATO strategy are on the increase, the defence will of citizens is decreasing, and national differences may lead to misunderstandings within the Alliance.

(A) Public doubts

7. Fear of war has increased very noticeably over the last few years. Indeed, the prospect of war is considered more likely now than it was a few years ago. According to a survey in the Federal Republic of Germany, 24 percent of people seem to think that a world war is likely in the next twenty or thirty years,[3] and that in a country which is obviously one of the most central in terms of East-West relations. In the United States, the likelihood of armed conflict is assessed even higher than in Europe, as shown by the testimony given by Mr. Wood, Gallup's Vice-President, to our Committee in Washington on 17 November 1983. According to a State Department testimony to the Committee (24 September 1984), US teenagers are twice as worried as their elders by the prospect of a nuclear war, which 50 percent of them believe is likely before the year 2000. In Canada, 53 percent of respondents thinks that "hostile attitudes between the US and Russia will escalate into a third world war".[4] These feelings have to be analysed in the wider context of the "unthinkability" of war in the nuclear age. As last year's General Report made clear, citizens now envisage war as being so totally destructive that its very prospect is unthinkable. The image of nuclear confrontation relates to nothing known. The very concept of prospective warfare has therefore altered dramatically, from the comprehensible vision of something that should be conjured up by a steady effort, to the obscure prospect of total annihilation of civilization and society. It is not for us to pass a judgment on this vision, which we have to accept as a fact of contemporary life. Indeed, the very concept of nuclear deterrences is based upon such a vision, and as such has been popularised by governments and politicians.

8. The coincidence between the unthinkability of war and the increase in its assumed likelihood has a consequence in that the greater people's belief in the possibility of an all-out war, the more likely they are to be sympathetic to the "peace movement". In West Germany, the only group where a majority of those sampled think that a world war is likely, is that group sympathetic to the "Green" Party.[5] It is also true, conversely, that in France the assessment of the possibility of war is comparatively low, as is the refusal of military means, and of the Alliance.[6] Policy makers must therefore redefine the bases for their call to citizens. The traditional appeal to effort and unity cannot be accepted when the choice seems to be between suicide and surrender.

9. Probably the most noticeable factor in this context is the very rapid shift in the perception of the comparative strengths of the US and the USSR. In West Germany, the assumption of equality between them has given way to a feeling of Soviet superiority whereas in France, the Netherlands, Norway and Belgium, opinion was divided over the issue in 1982, after having united on a vision of rough parity.[7] As a consequence, the effectiveness of NATO under threat is now in doubt. This is true of public confidence on NATO's ability to defend Western Europe, and even more so of its capacity to prevent an attack (the concept of deterrence).[8] This has had little effect, as yet, on the perception of the necessity for the Alliance,[9] but it has already had very serious consequences on the credibility of NATO's strategy. Missile deployment is an example, but more generally the flexible response, which has been the base of the Alliance's posture for over two decades, is visibly affected by this disbelief, as well as being one of its causes.

10. Whatever the merits of the dual-track decision, one of the reasons for the strong opposition to its implementation has been the feeling that deployment was sensed as increasing the threat to the public more than its protection. Politicians who opposed the missile deployment, as well as the "peace movement", have always mentioned the increased risk to civilians as one of the causes for their opposition. This discrepancy between general political attitudes and reaction towards deployment is only a sign of fear. In the theory of deterrence, one of the functions of nuclear weapons is to ensure stability through security. The fact that a large proportion of the people opposes them, conflicts with the sense of security which is a basis for security itself. Your Rapporteur does not wish to analyse the conditions of missile deployment, now a fact of the past. However, it remains a most spectacular example of the spreading of insecurity in public mentality. There are technical reasons why this has been the case: in particular, the delay between the dual-track decision and deployment was too long, as the originator of the decision, ex-Chancellor Schmidt, himself vouches. It nevertheless constitutes a sign that not enough attention has been paid to public sensitivities. This was especially damaging because deterrence (as opposed to defence), has to rest on continuous support by the public. As an abstract concept, based both on the feasibility of a devastating response and on the presupposition that an attack can be prevented by that very prospect, deterrence rests at least partly on the degree of support it enjoys among citizens. Your Rapporteur therefore considers it essential that more attention should be paid, by military and civilian leaders, to public consequences of Alliance decisions. Unpopular decisions may be necessary, and should therefore be taken, but it must be stressed that the nature of deterrence, which implies the credibility of a possible response to an agression, makes it essential for governments to convince their citizens. Imposing decisions without reference to them should be avoided as much as possible.

11. This is even more true when military strategy is supposed by many people to increase the threat rather than to diffuse it. In the Federal Republic, for example, a survey conducted by EMNID shows that 50 percent of respondents think that missiles increase the threat, whereas only 17 percent think that they increase security (19 percent think that neither is correct). Although the technical validity of this poll has been debated, it is confirmed by findings in Germany on the level of opposition to deployment, and also in other countries.[10] In Denmark, in 1982, 28 percent of respondents thought that American missiles stationed in Western Europe "increase the probability of attack on Western Europe", as against only 39 percent who thought they "constitute a greater protection", whereas 33 percent thought the matter had no importance, and 26 percent did not know.[11] Your Rapporteur does not mean that these reactions are correct, he asserts that no policy is sustainable in the long term that refuses to take them into account, although it would be wrong to think that policy should follow the whims of public opinion. The logic of deterrence is such that it has to take society as a whole into account, whereas traditional defence was best left to specialists, under elected governments' control. As the Germans say, defence has now become "total", in that its consequences involve all aspects of society. A "total defence" cannot ignore a dialectical relationship between decisions and citizens: the public has become an active factor in policy-making. The burden of the proof that defence is effective rests on governments, since they have to put their message across to their publics if they want to achieve credibility.

III. A NEW INFORMATION STRUCTURE FOR NATO

(A) The present structure

39. The political organisation of NATO is by no means a supranational body. Information about defence and foreign policy is a national prerogative of each member country. Hence there is no NATO information policy as such. NATO has an information directorate (NATIS), the role of which is to assist the governments in their information task. NATO, in its political role, is an instrument of close cooperation. For NATIS to be entrusted with a task, therefore, the NATO Council—a body of 16 Ministers, deputized for by 16 Ambassadors—has to instruct NATIS to carry it out. The NATO Council only takes decisions unanimously. The NATO Secretariat cannot therefore launch an information campaign, or present the case for NATO in any country, when agreement has not been reached among all the sixteen nations on a political level. In practice, the NATO Council is a diplomatic body, with Ambassadors as a collective head and less senior diplomats manning its functions in different committees. Diplomats are not generally trained to take the public aspect of diplomacy into account. This is certainly one of the reasons why NATO public information has been poor.

40. Another aspect of NATIS is that its officers, called "liaison officers", are appointed by their national governments and are solely reponsible for information in their home country. One consequence of this is that, if a member government refused to appoint a liaison officer, for example for domestic reasons, no information at all can be sent to the country. In many respects, however, this would be the situation when information is most needed. This is at present the case with Spain, where a referendum is supposed to be held on NATO membership in 1985, and where NATO as an organisation cannot put its case forward to the public. This is of course a mere consequence of the fact that governments are solely responsible for information about national defence. It would be detrimental to the defence effort if NATO could address citizens in a manner which was not consistent with the government's message.

41. In practice, therefore, NATIS is a body meant for implementing decisions taken by the NATO Council and its Committees. As a result of that, when NATIS is asked to prepare short draft communiqués, fit for the press and the public, a compromise has to be reached, and as a consequence, the final text is long-winded or complicated. This is reflected in the public image of NATO.

42. On its own, NATIS can produce documents which have to be approved by the Council, but they cannot be circulated in member countries through channels other than the Ministries of Foreign Affairs and/or MoD's. NATIS also has a financial problem in that its resources are very limited, thus reflecting the low priority given to information by NATO. The Scientific Division of NATO, the role of which is largely public-relations oriented, although towards a very limited section of society, is provided with a budget which is six times as high as that of NATIS. Why should the information structure of NATO, dealing with the public and the press as a whole in sixteen countries, be considered six times less important than NATO's scientific undertakings?

43. The result is that NATO is not properly understood by the public. It has the image of a bureaucratic monolith, which it is not, and of a purely military body, which is also untrue. Its information policy has two defects: it apparently gives a very one-sided image of defence, which cannot appeal to all sides of the public, and it is also largely ineffective in that it does not reach many people. This is no reflection upon the quality of the personnel, but rather a matter of structure and of resources.

(B) Informing the public in member countries

44. The foremost need is to reach the public. This has to be done directly in member countries. The message put forward should be based on the contribution to peace that NATO has made and intends to make. The role of the Alliance in creating a framework for negotiations with other countries has to be stressed. The necessity of the Alliance for each nation's independence is also a central part of NATO's message, and has to be underlined, perhaps at the expense of the claim for Alliance unity. National differences have to be recognised, especially as they are the Alliance's greatest attraction when compared to the monolithic nature of the Warsaw Pact.

45. Variety, however, also exists within member countries. Sympathy for different political parties is in many cases the single most important factor in the diverse attitudes of citizens towards defence. This has to be taken into account.

46. Your Rapporteur has been impressed by the effectiveness of the EEC information machine in his country. The structure of the European community is more integrated, and therefore it would be easier to take a unified approach. However, the EEC's information policy has been varied because it has been realised that this was the key to success. Indeed, it seems as if a different message had been delivered in each country, and indeed to each group in each country. The party structures have been utilised in order to put the EEC's message across to the different sides of the public. NATO should set up bureaux of information in each Alliance country which would accept them.

54. More generally, NATO must give a more open image of itself. A certain amount of secrecy is necessary in the military field, but the outsider's view of NATO is that it is an obsessively secretive organisation. Many more facts could surely be made available to journalists. The NATO Council should think of a review of the classification system of NATO documents. It is quite extraordinary to see that some of NATO activities which are relevant to civilians, and cannot function properly without the public being made aware of them, such as civil emergency planning for example, are so little-known.

55. Parliamentarians should be encouraged to play a vital part in the field of public communication. Much more data could be made available to those of us who follow these issues closely, and that as a matter of course. This could have a very effective role, as Committee work in national parliaments, as well as questions to governments and positions taken by parliamentarians in their local and national parties, could then reflect some of NATO's concerns and plans. Voluntary organisations also constitute a most important element in this respect. Parliamentarians should play a role in reviving them in some of our countries. In present circumstances, Norway and Denmark stand out as nations where Friends of NATO and Home Guards play an effective role in spreading our message among the population, especially among young people. The report of the Sub-Committee on the Successor Generation deals with these matters in greater detail, and your Rapporteur only wishes to refer members to it. However, he should like to underline the utility for parliamentarians to take an active interest in the setting up or improvement of voluntary bodies.

THE JESUIT TRADITION LIVES ON AT GONZAGA HIGH SCHOOL IN WASHINGTON, DC

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1985

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, the teaching tradition of the Society of Jesus is world renowned. This Jesuit tradition is alive—and burning bright—within a few blocks of this Capitol at Gonzaga College High School, 19 I Street, NW.

There, under the remarkable leadership of Rev. Bernard Dooley, S.J., the school's president, and Rev. Leonard Martin, S.J., its headmaster, 734 boys of all races, backgrounds, and religions grow intellectually, physically, but, above all, spiritually into men.

A Gonzaga student develops in 4 years from a boy to a "Man for Others." That is the key, Mr. Speaker. Gonzaga High School in the spirit of Ignatius Loyola, the founder of the Society of Jesus, producers men who care about others.

To all this I can give very personal testimony. Our son, Michael, is a graduate of Gonzaga, class of 1979.

In concrete testimony to the special character of Gonzaga College High School, the Washington Post recently ran a series of three front page articles about the school, its students, its graduates and its goals. All who love Gonzaga swelled with justifiable pride as its successes over formidable odds were detailed in the lengthy articles.

In June, a good friend of mine, John J. Delaney—a Gonzaga alumnus—delivered the annual Kohlman address to graduates of Gonzaga's class of 1985. I know what an honor this was for John because I had the opportunity to deliver the Kohlman address a few years ago.

John, whose sons also attended Gonzaga, in his remarks went to the heart of what this outstanding school stands for and why Gonzaga-trained men—"Men for Others"—are needed in America today more than ever before.

I insert Mr. Delaney's remarks at this point in the RECORD:

GONZAGA COLLEGE HIGH SCHOOL KOHLMAN ADDRESS

Graduation is a passage to be cherished and remembered. The graduation speech, on the other hand, is a sausage. It tends to be lengthy, lacking in meat and above all, forgettable. The most memorable graduation speech that I ever heard was given by columnist Art Buchwald at Georgetown University in 1979. Speaking for his generation, Mr. Buchwald's simple message to the next generation was:

"We've got our oil.

You go find your own oil."

The message I bring you today as you graduate from Gonzaga is also a simple one, but unlike Mr. Buchwald's obviously facetious remark, it is a message of reconciliation. It is Gonzaga's message—to be "men for others." It was first presented to you when you entered these halls as freshmen four years ago. It is a challenge that has been set before Gonzaga students in one form or another since 1821. It finds its roots in the 16th Century prayer of Ignatius Loyola, the founder of the Society of Jesus:

"Teach us, good Lord . . . to give and not to count the cost. . ."

In order to understand that challenge, it is first necessary to understand Gonzaga and why it is singularly qualified to make such a demand upon her sons. So today I would also like to share with you some reflections about this school, its history and spirit, and about you, the Class of 1985, and your role in its past and future.

Thirty-five years ago, like you, I sat in this historic pre-Civil War church as a member of the graduating Class of 1950. I remember little about what was said that day. But I do recall that it was a time of mixed emotions—happiness and nostalgia mixed with a dab of anxiety as we prepared for "life after Zag." I specifically remember my mind wandering back to a few years before when as a freshman I took that first walk up the wind-swept alley by St. Aloysius; observing the grated windows; the smokestacks; the cat walks; the only school in the county it seemed where the "back door" was actually the "front door."

It all contributed to an architectural style which perhaps could best be characterized as "Early American Alcatraz." Many times in those early days I would ask myself, "What is a nice little Chevy Chase boy like me doing here?" Gradually, however, like so many others, I was swept up in the Eye Street scene and the unique spirit that has always been "Gonzaga." And on that long-ago graduation day, as my wandering mind returned to the present, I was extremely grateful that my life had been touched by this place.

But "wait" you say. "We know all of that. We, too, have lived the Gonzaga story. Indeed, for us, that story has been one of virtually unparalleled success. Why belabor us with these meanderings?

It is a fair question. The Class of 1985 has not only lived the Gonzaga story, it has helped to bring this school to new thresholds of greatness. Its successes in academics, extra-curricular activites and athletics are a source of immense pride for the entire Gonzaga family. Yes, members of the Class of 1985, Gonzaga is indeed on a roll. Like a phoenix, it has literally risen from the ashes of this city and returned to its long held place of prominence. New and refurbished facilities abound. Applicants in unprecedented numbers seek admission. The Eagles fly high.

Why then is it necessary to reflect on Gonzaga and its challenge to all of us to become "men for others?" What is the significance of such reflection when we look about us today and see what the school and the Class of 1985 have achieved?

The answer, I submit, lies in another question—a question that is crucial. Is it possible that Gonzaga's successes will blur our vision of what this school has stood for? Are we in danger of forgetting the "men for others" theme that generations of Gonzagans have heard through the years?

It is appropriate to ask these questions today, precisely because success does not often breed introspection. High tide covers over the shoals. Gonzaga's right to challenge us to be "men for others" does not spring from a background of prestige and wealth; from being an institution solely for the rich and powerful. Just as Christianity finds its credibility in Christ's suffering, just as steel is forged from fire, Gonzaga's challenge finds its legitimacy in a lineage of deprivation, born of a commitment to serve all segments of society.

As we bask today in the warm glow of success, we must not forget that there is and always has been another Gonzaga, a Gonzaga which struggles to survive. To be sure there have been triumphs along the way. But between these triumphs and even during them, Gonzaga's 164-year history is in essence a crucible. It was thus from the very earliest years of its existence as a small seminary on F Street. It was thus for decades following the relocation of the school to what is now Kohlman Hall in 1871. In that first year on Eye Street, only 70 students showed up for classes. The discouragement over the school's plight is revealed in the pages of the History of Gonzaga's first one hundred years, wherein it is stated that Eye Street in 1871 was "little more than a praire." The writer goes on to observe: "There is the quiet of peace, and there is also the quiet of death; the tranquility of Gonzaga, during this, its first year in the new site, looked dangerously like the latter."

But we need not return to prior generation or the last century to know and understand this other side of the Gonzaga story. We need only go back to 1968, the year in which many of you were born. It is a lifetime for you, but really only a brief stroke in history's brush. The tragic events of 1968 seared the very fabric of our country and have left their imprint even to this day. They were to present Gonzaga with perhaps the greatest crisis that it has ever faced.

It has been said that this world is divided into "givers" and "takers." All good men and most great men are givers—willing to risk failure, to make sacrifices, to do what is right for their fellow man. Christ was such a giver. Gonzaga's leaders throughout the decades, beginning in 1821 with its founder, Father Anthony Kohlman, and continuing to the present day with our beloved president, Father Bernard Dooley, have been givers. Their spirit of giving has been reflected in the institution itself.

To recall 1968 in the life of Gonzaga is also to recall the lives of two men, each of which in its own way is interwined with that of Gonzaga. Each of these men was a "giver." Each was a "man for others." Each was to fulfill his destiny in 1968.

One was Aloysius P. McGonigal, a humble Jesuit priest. Al McGonigal taught at Gonzaga as a scholastic in the late 1940's. He was a tough little man, barely 5½ feet tall. He ran the bookstore with an iron hand. He also used to conduct what was known as the "Volunteer Saturday Morning Latin Class." You didn't have to attend the Volunteer Saturday Morning Latin Class—unless of course you wanted to pass Latin. I remember how we used to complain about having to come down to school on Saturday mornings. We groused about Al McGonigal's hard-nosed attitude and insensitivity. Later, of course, following our years at Gonzaga, would come the realization that if anyone was insensitve, we were; that Al McGonigal did not have to give up his Saturday mornings for us, but that he did so—he made this sacrifice—in order to help up.

I lost track of Al McGonigal after leaving Gonzaga, but nearly 20 years later in 1968, I had occasion to read about him again. The Vietnam War was raging and the terrible Tet offensive was underway, especially around the City of Hue. Father McGonigal was serving in the army as a chaplain at the time. His own unit was safely behind the lines, several miles from Hue. But he learned that the units under fire at Hue were without a chaplin. So Al McGonigal took the risk and went to Hue—a place where he didn't have to be. And it was there, as an unarmed chaplain, that Al McGonigal made the ultimate sacrifice in service to his fellow man. Today, if you visit that simple but haunting Vietnam Memorial on the mall next to the elipse, you will find the name of Al McGonigal inscribed there: a small but fitting memorial to one who was truly a "man for others."

The second man of whom I speak is Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., a humble minister who was also to encounter destiny in 1968, on an April evening in Memphis, Tennessee. Dr. King went to Memphis because the sanitation workers there on strike for a decent wage and they needed help. They were among the forgotten people at the bottom of society's ladder. They were powerless. They had no voice. So Dr. King rearranged his schedule and went to Memphis—and from there to eternity.

Martin Luther King's message was the message of what a "man for others" ought to be. In accepting the Nobel Peace Prize, Dr. King said: "I refuse to accept the idea that the 'isness' of man's present nature makes him morally incapable of reaching up for the 'oughtness' that forever confronts him."

In a television interview a few weeks before he died, Dr. King again reminded us of what being a "man for others" is all about, when he said: "It's not the quantity of one's life that counts. It's the quality. It's not how long you live that matters, but how well you live."

Just as Christ did not have to go to Calvary, and Al McGonigal did not have to go to Hue, Martin Luther King did not have to go to Memphis. But each went because there was a need for him to go—a need to take a risk in order to serve his fellow man. They were "men for others."

Few who were alive in 1968 will ever forget the impact of Dr. King's death. Doubt pierced the very soul of this nation. There was even doubt about the essential unity necessary for survival of a nation so beset by a widening gulf of misunderstanding between black and white, rich and poor, young and old. the cities—those vital core areas of Ameria—were especially scarred, physically and psychologically. To analogize from "Less Miserables," the cities are the conscience of a nation. They are where its people and problems come together and confront one another. But after the events of April 1968, people, businesses and institutions were departing the cities of America in a tidal wave, leaving wastelands of despair, ruin and poverty in their wake. Washington, D.C., the capital of our nation, was no exception.

It was thus, with the death of Martin Luther King, Jr., and its terrible aftermath that the indescribable spirit of Gonzaga—that basic sense of decency that prevades here—was to undergo its severest test and emerge to enjoy its finest hour as an example for the nation. If the cities are the conscience of a nation. perhaps it is not overreaching to claim that Gonzaga is the conscience of the City of Washington, or at least the conscience of the Jesuits of the Maryland Province. For while America writhed in despair about its cities and the headlong rush to suburbia continued, Gonzaga—to its everlasting credit—stayed in the very heart of the nation's capital. The Jesuits took a risk, because they preceived that the need to continue to provide a quality education for young men from all over the metropolitan area was greater than ever.

That risk was not without its price. In the years following 1968, enrollment dropped precipitously. Deficits arose. The school's small endowment disappeared.

In 1971, Gonzaga bravely celebrated its Sesquicentennial—the 150th year of its existence. One of the highlights of that celebration was the Dramatic Association's memorable production of "Camelot." But despite all the noble effort and the brave front, the tranquility of death once again hung over Gonzaga, as it has one hundred years before. Once again Gonzaga was standing alone on the prairie. Like Camelot, its days seemed numbered. That great shinning experiment of the Jesuits—to operate a college preparatory school in the heart of the Nation's Capital, to which boys of all backgrounds could come and learn together—seemed doomed to failure.

But somehow, Gonzaga persevered with its commitment. Few will ever fully understand the day-by-day sacrifices of the Jesuits and the Gonzaga family in living out that commitment. Some of those who lived it are among us today. They sit before you in this sanctuary. They sit behind you with your families and friends. They sit above you in the choir loft. But for their efforts and the efforts of hundreds of others, none of us would be here today to celebrate the achievements of the Class of 1985.

Wolf Von Eckart, the noted urban planner, on the editorial page of the Washington Post in 1973, described Gonzaga's decision to stay in the City of Washington as "almost defiant." But stay Gonzaga did. Now in 1985 we begin to see fulfillment! Gonzaga's vision is at last being shared by others across the land. More and more people and institutions are beginning to understand that mankind's problems are not resolved by running away. New office buildings and hotels have sprouted up around Gonzaga. Cities throughout the country are coming to life again.

That, gentlemen, is why Gonzaga has earned the right to challenge each of us to be a "man for others." She has suffered and she has persevered.

I truly believe that if Christ, or Martin Luther King, Jr., or Al McGonigal were here today, they would say to Gonzaga "Well done." But they would also say to the Gonzaga family that we cannot rest; that much work lies ahead. All we need do is look around us to see that this is true. Problems of social justice, drug and alcohol abuse, poverty and housing, to name but a few, are still unresolved.

It is really bizarre in a way. We live in Washington, D.C., the capital city of the United States and the Free World. Our daily lives are involved with perhaps the only high school in the country that is situated in the very shadow of the Capitol building itself. We can virtually reach out and touch it. How many times have we walked or driven down North Capitol Street and seen that magnificent dome glistening in the sun or the moonlight? How many times have we thought about it as the symbol of hope and justice for all freedom-loving people? And yet, a mere turn of the wheel into the driveway next to St. Aloysius confronts us with a different reality—the reality of hunger, addiction and hopelessness, embodied in the lines of men who daily seek help and solace at the Horace McKenna Center in this very building.

What must one do to be a "man for others"? Time does not permit an extended response here. But the time will come for all of you—and for some it may come often. It came many times for Horace McKenna, who walked these halls with us until just a few years ago. It came for Joe Kozik in the early 1950's when a young black student went out for Gonzaga's football team, and Joe had to decide whether to drop the player or be forced to cancel scheduled games with a number of D.C. public schools. The City's school system was segregated in those days and black and white kids were not permitted to play against one another. Although the young man offered to quit the team, Joe would have none of it. The games were canceled and Gonzaga made several trips to Pennsylvania to fill out its schedule that year.

While it is difficult to describe what one must do to be a "man for others," or to recognize the moment when it comes, it is safe to say that in a world where life has little value; where what a person possesses seems more important than what a person is; where today's fads are mistaken for tomorrow's foundations; where the grotesque is often adulated and virtue is often scorned; that being a "man for others" will likely not be an easy task. Yet Gonzaga still insists that we try.

How is this relevant to the Class of 1985? It is relevant because in the long run you will decide whether Gonzaga will continue to exist; whether the education offered here is worth the commitment of effort and resources to pass on to future generations. In a compelling address delivered at the Father-Son Communion Breakfast a few weeks ago, Dr. Samuel Alston Banks, president of Dickinson College, reminded us that Gonzaga is a "markedly endangered species." Dr. Banks is correct. But Gonzaga has survived and will survive because it is an institution which has never lacked the courage to place its resources, its heart and indeed its soul on the line to attempt to do what is right.

In the final analysis, "Gonzaga" is people—the students, faculty and staff, alumni, parents and friends who have believed in it and supported it down through the years. Without the support of these people—your predecessors—there would be no Gonzaga. There would be no Class of 1985.

In the second verse of the Alma Mater there is an exhortation to Gonzaga to march on through the centuries and to reach ever on unto eternity. Today Gonzaga asks for your help in fulfilling that mission. In a few moments when you receive your diplomas, will you be merely graduating from Gonzaga, or will you be leaving it for good? When you sing the Alma Mater for the last time as a student and walk out of this church, will you be walking away from the life of this school or will you be walking beside it on its long march into eternity?

Gonzaga waits hopefully for your answer.

VIETNAM VETERAN IS A HERO

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1985

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, in my capacity as a Member of the House Veterans' Affairs Committee I have had the chance to meet with hundreds of Vietnam veterans from many States in our Nation. Naturally, many of these men and women have been from my own State of New Jersey and more specifically from the First Congressional District which I have the privilege of representing in Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that the following article from the Courier-Post newspaper be included in the RECORD. It is a story about the courage and dedication of John Caffaro who is a Vietnam veteran. I am proud to say that he is also a constituent of mine and I commend his exploits to the attention of my colleagues. John's bravery and desire to help his fellow man should make us all very proud of these many men and women who are now finally receiving the recognition they so richly deserved.

VIETNAM VETERAN RESCUES WOMAN AND PROVES POINT

(By Bernie Weisenfeld)

MOUNT LAUREL.—A man who administered first aid to a woman trapped in a smoking automobile here Thursday night told rescue workers he was a Vietnam veteran who "wanted to show that Vietnam vets can do good deeds."

The man who gave medical aid, Pennsauken resident John Caffaro, two years ago helped save a 12-year-old boy from drowning in a swimming pool.

"A lot of people are putting down the Vietnam vets," said Caffaro, 35, a decorated veteran of the Southeast Asia conflict.

"If there's a liquor store held up and they find out it's a Vietnam vet, there's a big article about it. But when somebody does something good it's hardly ever shown it's a Vietnam vet.

"See, we are good people.

"I'm strong on Vietnam vets. We do produce some good in the community," said Caffaro, whose military service medals include a Navy Cross and three Purple Hearts.

Caffaro pulled his pickup truck to the side of the road and helped rescue workers at the scene of a two-car accident about 9 p.m. on Route 73 here, said fire marshall Charles Everett.

"I've never seen anything like this. The guy did one terrific rescue job," said Everett. "He obviously had some training."

The fire marshall said Caffaro put a neck brace on a female passenger who was trapped in a burning car, slid her out of the vehicle and administered "various splints and bandages" until paramedics arrived.

"We have trouble getting volunteers for our rescue squad and this guy just stops along the road—he doesn't belong to anything—and he does a great job," said Everett. "He said being a Viet vet he just wanted to prove they can do good things, that there are Vietnam veterans who do good deeds and they're not all junkies and murderers."

Caffaro said he served with the Marine Corps in Vietnam from 1967 to 1969 as a sniper and helicopter door gunner and was trained in emergency medical aid.

"When the Tet offensive was going down, there was quite a bit of first aid to be given," he said. "The biggest thing knocked into our heads in the Marine Corps was teamwork. If you only have one medic between 50 men and some of the guys are wounded, you just jump in and do it."

Caffaro said he later served with ambulance squads when he lived in Williamstown and Glendora.

Township police identified the two drivers involved in the collision as Bonnie Lee Scarfo, of 462 Hickory Lane, Carneys Point and Francis E. Callahan, of 19 Camden Ave., Voorhees.

Everyone said rescue workers had to use the Jaws of Life to separate the two vehicles.

No further details of the accident were available from police.

A nursing supervisor at Garden State Community Hospital in Evesham said Callahan and Scarfo were treated and released at the hospital.

Scarfo, contacted at home yesterday, said she recalled little about the accident or those who helped her afterward. She said she was the driver trapped in her car.

"There were a lot of nice people there. I was pretty well out of it," Scarfo said.

According to Everett, Caffaro did not stay at the accident scene long after paramedics arrived.

"He was like the Lone Ranger. He just came then disappeared. I didn't get a chance to talk to him like I would have liked," he said.

Caffaro said as soon as the local ambulance squad arrived, he got back in his truck and left. "It's their territory. It's their profession. Another person being in the way gets to be a hinderance."

In May 1983, Caffaro helped a lifeguard pull a drowning 12-year-old Louisville, Ky. boy from a swimming pool of a Mount Laurel motel where Caffaro worked as a chef.

"I just like helping people out when they are in trouble," he said yesterday.

THE 100th ANNIVERSARY OF THE R.R. RAGETTE INC.

HON. JOSEPH J. DioGUARDI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1985

Mr. DIOGUARDI. Mr. Speaker, I rise to bring to the attention of this body the proud history of R.R. Ragette Inc., Realtors, which will be celebrating its 100th anniversary on September 22. The people of R.R. Ragette have given dedicated and committed service to homeowners in Westchester County through three generations of the Ragette family. The success of the Ragette firm can be attributed to its professionalism, integrity, and commitment to uncompromising service. For 100 years, R.R. Ragette Inc., Realtors has enjoyed a tradition of achievement, receptivity to contemporary marketing methodology and superb service to both customers and clients.

The R.R. Ragette firm now has four Westchester offices located in Bronxville, Scarsdale, Bedford, and Eastchester, which is the home of their main office. In February 1985, the Ragette firm, in affiliation with Housatonic Valley Insurance, announced the opening of their newest branch—Housatonic Valley/Ragette Inc.—in New Milford, CT.

The firm has a fine record of public service, and is committed to the welfare of the people of Westchester County. The firm established the R.R. Ragette Community Service Award, a scholarship grant to graduating seniors at seven Westchester high schools. The firm also collected food for Ethiopian children at each of our branch offices and matched, dollar for dollar, the value of food collected, had a blood drive, presented free seminars on real estate, and sponsored family concerts in Eastchester, Scarsdale, and Bedford Village. The firm believes this public service is the responsibility of the business community, and therefore has continually "given back" to the people of Westchester who have made them successful.

Committed to the same tenets that have led the Ragette firm to success for a century, President Ralph E. Ragette has had a prestigious career of service to his community and to his profession. In 1977 Mr. Ragette was honored as realtor of the year by the Westchester County Board of Realtors, of which he was president. In addition to his dedicated service as realtor, Mr. Ragette has been involved extensively in community politics. He began his political career in 1947 as chairman of the finance committee of the city of Mount Vernon. He was elected to the city of Mount Vernon's Board of Aldermen, (city council), in 1953 and served for 12 years in that capacity. During this period he served as acting mayor of Mount Vernon. In 1968, Mr. Ragette was elected supervisor of Mount Vernon, and served in this position for 2 years. From 1983 until the present, Mr. Ragette has served on the board of governors, commercial and investment division of the New York State Association of Realtors. He is also the chairman of the housing council of the New York State Association of Realtors. This impressive list of service to the community only highlights Mr. Ragette's productive career.

In 1979, Mr. Ragette's son, Ralph Richard, joined the firm as treasurer, and is presently the executive vice president. Ralph Richard Ragette demonstrates the qualities of leadership that will take the firm into their next century of growth and success. Schooled in marketing methodology and corporate psychology, Ralph R. reflects 20th century goals, attitudes, and insights.

I would again like to commend the firm for its long history of service to the Westchester community and hope that the firm continues to reach ever greater heights of professionalism and competence.

THE DEFICIT DILEMMA

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1985

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, I am genuinely outraged by the sham budget resolution passed by the House on the eve of August vacation. The numerical gimmickry and budgetary tomfoolery contained in that document make it worthy of inclusion in the Guiness Book of World Records as the world's most fraudulent budget. It is certain that had a captain of industry produced a similar budget for a Fortune 500 company, the hue and cry from liberals in this body would have been deafening. A congressional investigation would no doubt have followed with the poor capitalist being subjected to the collective wrath and holier-than-thou attitude of the liberal keepers of the national morality. Indeed, the capitalist might even face a jail term.

I therefore rise today to sound a few alarm bells and to urge my colleagues to ignore the sham budget resolution and use the remaining appropriations bills to really reduce spending. Given America's precarious foreign trade imbalance, rapidly expanding money supply, and still high real interest rates, it is imperative for continued economic growth that we enact serious spending reductions in fiscal year 1986, and that we keep reducing spending in the out years.

However, if the House of Representatives is not prepared to seriously attack extravagant and excessive Government spending, then I have made it much easier for the President to do so. As many of you well know, I have recently made available to the President a letter, signed by 147 Republican Members of the House, pledging to uphold a Presidential veto of any budget-busting spending bill. This shifts the balance of power in the budgetary battle more toward the President and I urge him to use the veto generously if it is needed.

I would like to submit for the historical RECORD the following article, which I authored, on the deficit and the havoc it can cause the economy. Excerpts from this article have appeared in the New York Times, the Washington Times, the Chicago Tribune, Human Events, and the Los Angeles Herald Examiner, among others.

THE DEFICIT DILEMMA

(By Robert K. Dornan)

Embarrassment in the economics profession is understandably widespread. Despite their warnings that continued large deficits would "crowd out" private borrowing and drive interest rates higher, interest rates have fallen to their lowest level in years, with the likelihood of further reductions in the coming weeks. This development, coming as it did in the midst of the House-Senate budget negotiations, prompted one Capital Hill economist to claim that, "It completely undercuts the whole deficit-reduction drive." In other words, it takes the pressure off Congress to enact spending cuts.

If the budget that just passed is any indication, and it clearly is, then that nameless economist was right. Why risk political hot water by cutting special interest programs when interest rates are falling? This type of attitude, undoubtedly shared by many of our elected representatives, is disturbing because it assumes that the only danger of large deficits is high interest rates. Nothing could be further from the truth.

Conventional economic theory suggests that large deficits—in and of themselves—raise prices, output and interest rates while depressing capital formation. However, there is no empirical evidence to support any but the last of these propositions, which should be reason enough to cut the deficit.

Most credible economists rightly maintain that inflation and interest rates are a function of monetary policy, not fiscal policy. Therefore, instead of blaming the President for high interest rates, we should be pointing a finger at Paul Volcker. While this might make those of us who have strenuously objected to Fed policy feel better, it does not mean that the deficit is less of a problem.

In the past, continued overspending by the federal government has put pressure on the Federal Reserve for monetary expansion. Economist James Solloway of Argus Research Corp. has recently shown that Fed has again started to monetise more of the debt than it should. Mr. Solloway sees the huge increases in the national debt each year—caused by continued large budget deficits—obscuring a sharp acceleration in the rate of growth of the monetary base and, in turn, the money supply. A prolonged acceleration in the monetary aggregates will eventually result in significantly higher inflation rates, with a probable attendant rise in interest rates (after all, interest rates are directly related to the actual, as well as the expected inflation rate).

What is most frightening about this scenario is that even though the Fed has been monetizing the debt at an increasing rate, it seems unable to significantly reduce interest rates. (Interest rates, after inflation, are still at 8 percent, high by historical standards). As Mr. Solloway says, "This is eloquent testimony to the damage that can be inflicted by large budget deficits."

Another major factor to consider is that the deficit has been caused by excessive government spending. As long as the rate of growth in government spending continues to out-pace the growth of the economy, the government will absorb a growing proportion of national output. Putting a larger share of the GNP into the hands of the government will eventually restrict economic growth. Are we a nation prepared to accept a growing government sector and slower growth? I expect not. But that is precisely what might happen if the recent good news about interest rates is interpreted in the wrong way.

Deficits do matter, there can be no denying that. However, they matter in ways different than those assumed by the keepers of the conventional economic wisdom, whose faces become redder with each discount rate cut. (Indeed, some still don't get it. The Washington Post recently editorialized that not reducing the deficit would "increase the chances that interest rates will rise this Fall, at a time when the economy is slowing down." They may be right, but if they are it will be for all the wrong reasons.) Given that taxes are generally higher than they were five years ago, despite the so-called "massive" Reagan tax cuts, the current deficit simply tells us that there is something wrong with our spending habits. We should listen and not let some apparent discrepancy in economic theory divert us from our chosen path of spending cuts.

Why fool ourselves? The deficit is a serious problem, but it is not insurmountable. All that is needed to bring the deficit under control is the political will, or backbone, to strengthen fiscal discipline and restrain the relentless pressure from special interest groups for increased government services.

But alas, it was not to be. The Congress completely caved in when confronted with the choice of a responsible budget or a month-long vacation. It seems schmoozing it up with the special interests back home was more important than providing for the general welfare of the country. And whose welfare gets provided for is something Congress can be very particular about (it is almost exclusively for those folks who can be counted on to show their appreciation on election day).

President Reagan stated after Congress finally agreed on a budget for fiscal year 1986, "It marks only a beginning, not an end." In my view, it hopefully marks the beginning of the end of the budget process.

Two things have become quite obvious, even with the passage of a so-called budget. The budget process is the problem, not the solution; and a veto strategy may be the only way to achieve serious deficit reductions this year.

The "budget process", if it can be called one, has merely served to confuse the financial markets and has bred a sort of "budgetary terrorism" that is holding the economy hostage. If there is one thing that sets the nervous nellies in the financial markets on edge, it is uncertainty. Unfortunately, the only thing the congressional budget process genuinely seems to be good at generating is uncertainty.

It is no accident that the most spectacular growth in deficits has occurred since 1974, the year the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Act was passed. The Act placed strict limitations on the President's power to control spending and was supposed to simplify the budget process while enabling congressional planners to get a long-range view of the economy.

But instead of simplification, we got a lexicon of budgetary mumbo-jumbo: spend-outs, reflow estimates, concurrent resolutions, stop-gap bills, and meaningless five-year projections. By any reasonable standards, the Act has been an utter failure.

Indeed, the sight of Congressmen rushing into late-night sessions to push through appropriations bills or to provide temporary funding to keep the government running for a few more days has become all too commonplace (the current budget compromise, agreed to two and one-half months after the statutory May 15th deadline, is a perfect example). The outcome has been a stream of sloppy legislation—usually written by anoymous, unelected congressional staffers—which only makes it all the more apparent that a serious effort must be undertaken to streamline the process.

Despite the havoc that congressional budget shenanigans play with the financial markets, there are many of my colleagues who still fervently believe in the "budget process" and who are committed to making it work. This stubborn faith in a system that has produced only confusion is no mystery. It is simply a matter of Congress jealously guarding the additional power it was able to wrest from the Presidency in 1974—a much weakened Presidency at that.

The present Congress is not capable of looking after the finances of the country in a responsible manner. In the recent past, it has consistently appropriated money beyond its own budget limitations. It is now in the throes of doing so again.

Congress will soon hand President Reagan a batch of appropriations bills for fiscal year 1986 that, judging by his own statements, should be unacceptable. A quick glance at some of these appropriations bills will show that the Democrats in the House have systematically appropriated funds that exceed the spending levels proposed by the Administration. The bills are loaded with budgetary gimmickry and statistical sleights-of-hand. The bills deny our citizens the responsible spending practices they so resoundingly endorsed in the 1980 and 1984 Presidential elections.

The public has spoken, and the public has been ignored. Consider the following.

Item: House Democrats claim that federally assisted housing programs in the 1986 appropriations bill for the Department of Housing and Urban Development have been frozen at the FY85 level. They are, in fact, $1.7 billion over the 1985 level.

Item: The House Agriculture Committee asserts that the new obligational authority has been reduced by $1 billion below the Administration's request, and $4.2 billion below the 1985 enacted level. In fact, the bill is almost $8 billion over the President's budget.

Item: The Treasury, Postal Service and General Government Appropriations Bill is $1.2 billion over the Administration's request.

Item: The appropriations bill for the Interior Department is $720 million more than last year's appropriation, and $2 billion over the President's budget request for next year.

And so it goes with most of the appropriations bills. Tip O'Neill fiddles while the economy burns.

And all the while, House Democrats claim to be remaining within—or even below—budget levels proposed by the Administration.

In short, the budget resolution just passed—which is much closer to the original House version—is a fraud. It is nowhere close to a budget freeze. Every group and special interest (even the American Association of Retired Persons) indicated that they would accept a small cut if the sacrifice was shared. This uncharacteristic bit of generosity was, however, ignored.

After cutting (some might say gutting) defense, the conference plan does not cut excessive spending where it exists. About 20 percent (19.6) of the cuts come from 68.4 percent of the budget. The remainder come from sleight-of-hand savings such as offsetting receipts ($4.4 billion), allowances ($2.8 billion), and agriculture ($2.3 billion). And the way things look as of this writing, few of the cuts are reconciled.

About the only thing that we can glean from the budget process this year is that substantial deficits will remain in the out years because there are few program terminations. Programs not eliminated, like weeds, have a way of growing back in election years to become even healthier than they were before.

The lack of spending cuts will then put enormous pressure on those of us who have pledged not to raise taxes to raise them. Republicans may well find themselves caught between a rock and a hard place as they contemplate $200 billion deficits against the negative effects of a tax increase.

It is also highly likely that official forecasts of the deficit for fiscal years 1986-1990 will be revised dramatically upward later this year because the Administration's, and hence the Congress', economic assumptions are far too optimistic.

To combat democratic irresponsibility and budgetary terrorism, and to make real progress on the deficit reduction front this year, a new strategy is called for: A VETO STRATEGY.

To encourage President Reagan to us his veto power, I recently made available to President Reagan a letter bearing the names of 147 Members of Congress who have pledged their votes to sustain presidential vetoes of budget-busting spending bills.

Because this presidential option has been reinforced, the dynamics of power in the funding battle have shifted significantly in the President's favor.

President Reagan may have no choice but to veto appropriation bills if he is to show the Congress and the American people that he was serious when he promised to reduce the deficit without resorting to tax increases.

To date, President Reagan has been particularly reserved in his use of the veto, even though history shows us that some of our most successful Presidents have used the veto extensively. Convincing the President to use his veto power may be difficult. In fact, President Reagan only used the veto an average of ten times a year during his first term, and only five times to kill spending bills, none of which were after 1982.

Last year, for instance, Congress failed to pass a budget Resolution until October 1, well after most appropriations bills had already been passed and sent to the President. The President had vowed to veto any of those bills that exceeded his budget request. But when they reached his desk, he did not veto one of them.

But this time the stakes are high; the options narrow. The President must either revert to the destructive tax increases he has pledged to avoid, risk allowing a fiscally irresponsible Congress to drive us into bankruptcy, or exercise control over the orgy of government spending by using the constitutional power given to him—The Veto.

I undertook the effort to secure the 147 signatures of congressmen to make it easy for the President to look Congress straight in the eye and say: "Enough!", unsling his veto gun, and blast away.

The President's spending priorities were endorsed in an historic 49 state electoral landslide. Despite all the fanfare accompanying the budget resolution notwithstanding, those Presidential commitments to reduce spending have now been challenged by a Congress with a dismal record of reckless spending and a chronic incapacity for balancing the budget. Indeed, in recent years, Congress has been lucky to produce a budget at all.

Under the circumstances, Ronald Reagan should use his veto power and, given the ugly alternatives, he may find that the veto power is the only friend he and the American taxpayers have.

ONE MAN'S APARTHEID

HON. WILLIAM (BILL) CLAY

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1985

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, a recent series of utterances by President Ronald Reagan supporting the South Africa regime lead me to wonder whether he is insensitive, uninformed, misled or simply blind to the realities of life as it exists in that haven of bigotry. Mr. Speakes, his press secretary, in spite of his facility for double talk, has found it impossible to cover or explain Mr. Reagan's comments on the status of integrated facilities in South Africa or the statements on South Africa's progress toward dismantling apartheid. Surely the press has kept Mr. Reagan better informed about the situation of this country in turmoil, than did his personal observations in his hometown where he remained unaware that segregation was a fact of life until quite late.

In addition, Rev. Jerry Falwell, a close friend of the President, made disparaging comments about Nobel Peace Prize winner, Bishop Desmond Tutu which were incongruent with the beliefs of most men of the cloth. The weak rationalizations and poor documentation of Reverend Falwell's observations are discussed in two articles about his recent visit to the land of bigotry. One entitled "Sinking to New Lows" and the other is "One Man's Apartheid." I wish to enter the attached articles from the August 27, 1985, Washington Post, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as testimony to the relationship of these two "odd bedfellows."

ONE MAN'S APARTHEID

Finally President Reagan has provided a basis for understanding his relatively relaxed and indulgent view of South Africa. To an Atlanta radio station, he has given a little snapshot of his picture of reality in that quarter. He finds it a place where important progress is being made through the happy incidence of a reformist local government and a persuasive American administration: where blacks really have very little to complain about; anyway the Soviet Union is stirring the pot. No wonder he resists any policy change.

Except it is all—or most of it—quite untrue. From his comments it is evident that the president does not have the foggiest notion of what apartheid is actually about. As Post reporter Glenn Frankel makes plain in today's paper, even in the limited areas where President Reagan points to progress, there is not all that much to boast about. One could hoot at the president for his ignorance if it were not so painful. He altogether omits from his picture, furthermore, any hint of the larger and grosser aspects of apartheid: the humiliation and harassment of the pass courts, for instance, the forced removals, the brutalization of family life. He shows no awareness of the fundamental question of political power—that is, of the disenfranchisement of blacks under the current system and of the quality of repression organized by whites to deny blacks political power. Has anyone told him that a state of emergency is currently in effect and that blacks are being arrested and killed practically every day?

The president did make his ritual use of the adjective "repugnant" to describe apartheid. By what else he said, however, he erased any impression that the system truly troubles him. It was not simply that he was at pains to excuse Jerry Falwell from the burden of his unfair and unfeeling criticism—since only partially retracted—of the Nobel peace laureate, Bishop Tutu. It was the particular explanation Mr. Reagan offered in so doing. South Africa, he said, is "a combination of minorities. There are at least 10 tribal divisions there." This is a painful echo of the official South African rationale for the large structure of apartheid: that blacks are not the rightful citizens of a unitary South African state but are members of distinct tribes who are to be consigned, unconsulted, to separate "homelands."

What Mr. Reagan has said goes far to explain the most objectionable aspect of his approach to South Africa: his stunning lack of moral energy and commitment to the cause of justice. The South Africa he depicts exists only in his mind. But the South Africa the United States must deal with exists on the ground.

SINKING TO NEW LOWS

When the Rev. Jerry Falwell called Bishop Desmond Tutu a "phony," it seemed as if the depths of offensive know-nothingism had at last been plumbed. But President Reagan has gone his unofficial chaplain one better by claiming, in a radio interview, that segregation in South Africa, as we once knew it in this country, has been virtually eliminated.

Falwell's smear was too much even for the racists in his flock, and he sent a telegram to the bishop in which he accused himself of "an unfortunate choice of words." Similarly, after the president had made a remark that compares with President Gerald R. Ford's hapless insistence that Poland was not under communist domination, a flurry of clarifications came from the White House press office.

Falwell, who purports to do the Lord's work, is plainly doing Reagan's. They want to kill sanctions legislation and to rehabilitate the government of South Africa. It is such uphill work it is no wonder that they have been driven to excesses.

They see the current agony as a communist plot. Falwell warns of "a red river of communism" engulfing the country; Reagan thinks "we would be very innocent, naive" if we didn't believe that the Soviets are "stirring up the pot and waiting in the wings for whatever advantage they can take."

The Reagan-Falwell defense team is getting no help from their clients in South Africa. They are being routed on the field of public relations. President Pieter W. Botha combines the charm of a southern sheriff at Selma with the appeal of a Chicago alderman losing a sewer contract. On the other side are the radiant, committed Tutu and Winnie Mandela, a woman of infinite sorrow and dignity.

For weeks, the American people have been regaled by the sight of South African policemen wading into crowds wielding whips, recalling their use by overseers of slaves.

Falwell, a man of infinite brass, is not the least embarrased by any parellel to slavery. In fact, he invoked it in one of the many speeches he has given since he launched his squalid campaign to make mush of a moral issue.

"We were 180 years as a nation before segregation was eliminated here," he said. "Thank God the world was more patient with us than we have been with South Africa."

It is true that the world was tolerant of slavery as a U.S. institution. But the country at last was not and took arms to end it. The Civil War is not an event for which Americans are grateful.

Tutu has done more than any other person on the scene to avert the civil war that sometimes seems inevitable if black Africans—who, despite Reagan's rosy view, cannot live where they want, must carry passbooks wherever they go and cannot vote—are to achieve their liberties. Far from claiming to represent his people, Tutu has humbly—and pointedly—noted that he is amazed that, considering the situation, they listen to him at all.

The South African government and the Reagan-Falwell team do not realize how lucky they are to have him. It is impossible to imagine what horrors would be occurring without his valiant, principled presence. Perhaps Falwell and Reagan missed the pictures of the bishop intervening, at the risk of his life, to save a black man who was being menaced by a crazed mob, and warning that he would leave South Africa if blacks resorted to violence.

Yet when Tutu declined to attend a meeting of religious leaders called by Botha, the White House did not hesitate to express disapproval. For Falwell's squalid assault on Tutu, however, there was a presidential pardon. Reagan commended Falwell for his "apology" and explained his offense. The bishop, he said, was only reporting what he had heard from South Africans—not passing a pygmy's judgment on one of the noble figures of our time.

In making his apology, Reagan's favorite divine explained he had merely meant to say that Tutu was not speaking for the South Africans "any more than I speak for all Americans."

It was magnanimous of the leader of the Moral Majority to suggest he does not speak for all of us. What was most egregious about his smear was the suggestion that he was speaking for South Africans, putting credentials acquired in 5½ days on a government tour against Tutu's lifetime scars.

But what is most strange is that Reagan and Falwell, both of whom have benefited so mightily from public opinion expertise, have failed to impart any of it to their clients in South Africa.

If they really want to succeed, they should whisper to Pretoria that arresting schoolchildren, the new and repugnant tactic of the "reformist" government, is hardly the way to win friends and influence people in behalf of "constructive engagement."

INDISCRIMINATE INSURANCE PRACTICES THREATEN TO ELIMINATE NURSE MIDWIFE PROFESSION

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1985

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, there is growing evidence that Americans may no longer enjoy access to a wide range of necessary services due to the scarcity and high cost of insurance coverage. Over the past year, I have received numerous reports of insurance carriers telling child care providers, toxic waste generators, fishermen, and others throughout the country that their premiums have been raised by as much as 1,000 percent, and in some cases, that their policies have been canceled altogether. Last month, about a third of the certified nurse midwives in this country were notified that their malpractice insurance will not be renewed.

The Subcommittee on Commerce, Transportation, and Tourism will continue to examine the availability and affordability of insurance.

The insurance industry states that the rate hikes and cancellations are necessary to cover the insurance company losses that were suffered in 1984. They claim these actions are based on actuarial data and merely reflect the industry's resolve to underwrite selectively and avoid high risks.

The following article suggests that insurance consumers are being denied coverage for reasons that are arbitrary and not based on sound actuarial judgments.

The cutback in insurance coverage is widespread. Often essential services that, by law in some States, may not be offered unless the provider is insured, are denied coverage. Many insurance consumers and the public they serve are experiencing a crisis. It is time to find out what has gone wrong and what can be done about it.

The article follows:

[From the Washington Post, July 21, 1985]

By Colman McCarthy

NURSE-MIDWIVES AND THEIR STRUGGLE TO SURVIVE

Nurse-midwives, whose professionalism is indispensable in America's birthing rooms, are about to become dispensable to the health-care industry. Liability insurance companies are no longer able to provide malpractice coverage. As a result, a large percentage of the nation's 2,800 certified nurse-midwives may be forced out of the hospitals in which they serve or from the birth centers they operate.

The nurse-midwives are the last ones to deserve ejection. Although they assist at only 2 percent of the nation's annual births, their services are near 100 percent in personal care and warmth. While they only deliver in cases of uncomplicated, or low-risk, births, they are soothers and nurturers whose hands and heads know how to make childbirth a joy, not a trauma.

Their rewards are not in money, with salaries averaging $25,000 a year, against $110,000 for obstetricians. Their rate of malpractice suits is low: 6 percent have been sued since 1974, against 60 percent of obstetricians having been sued at least once. From that it is fair to say that large numbers of the women they serve tend to swear by them, while many women who use obstetricians merely swear.

Nurse-midwives have no moneyed lobby, as do physicians, to protect their interests before regulators or legislatures. Their interests are anything but special and are based only on a wish not to be driven from business by expenses beyond their control.

Marion McCartney's story is typical. She is a licensed nurse-midwife at the Maternity Center in Bethesda. In 10 years of practice and in more than 600 deliveries, McCartney has never been sued. Four years ago, her insurance was $125 a year. It doubled to $250 two years ago and this year went up to $800. She was braced for even larger hits except that her carrier Mutual Fire, Marine and Inland Insurance Co., which covers 1,400 other nurse-midwives, terminated all its malpractice policies.

McCartney is in practice with four other nurse-midwives. In all, they have assisted at 2,500 deliveries. None has been sued. It is important to keep that record in mind, because it underlies the unfair treatment that is suddenly burdening the nurse-midwives. An official of Mutual Fire in Philadelphia explains that his company is leaving the medical malpractice field because of the soaring risk of claims. In the past, Mutual Fire was reinsured by more than 10 other firms, but now the reinsurance market is avoiding high-risk medicine.

That raises an obvious question: Why should nurse-midwives, who practice low-risk medicine, be treated as if they had created the problem? The answer, according to Richard Guilfoyle, the president of Mutual Fire, is that the insurance industry has yet to establish a separate category in obstetric for nurse-midwives. Guilfoyle is sympathetic to the sudden financial problems of a group that provides low-cost health care. He praises the nurse-midwives for their record and says that he favors separating them from the physicians.

As the loudest protesters, physicians, most of whom earn high salaries, are quick to blame lawyers for the million-dollar verdicts that are increasing in malpractice suits. They blame patients for their high expectations for risk-free medical care. With insurance premiums rising as much as 400 percent in some states in the past five years, physicians see their profession in need of emergency-room rescue.

Whatever heartburn doctors may be suffering, it is far less severe than the pain being endured by the nurse-midwives. Many obstetricians are conscientious and high-skilled professionals ready to make any sacrifice for the women who come to them. But one explanation for their high rate of malpractice suits is that too often an atmosphere of personal warmth and human trust has been lost on the way to, and in, the delivery rooms. The wizardry of technology is often paid greater attention than the emotional needs of the woman.

Much of the technology means better health care; it can also mean impersonal care. As bonds weaken or break between obstetricians and mothers and fathers, fewer restraints are present against suing the doctor. Why not sue? He is a distant figure, not a confidant with whom you can discuss differences.

One reason nurse-midwives are rarely slapped with malpractice suits is that they are sought out by pregnant women who share their belief that birth is a profound emotional experience, not a passing medical event. Nurse-midwives don't dominate the process with machinery and drugs, they nurture it with hands-on skill and personal attentiveness. They gird their medical expertise with woman-to-woman friendliness and understanding.

None of that is to senitmentalize the practice of people like Marion McCartney. She and the Nation's other licensed nurse-midwives are asking only that insurers, insurance commissioners and physicians see them as skilled professionals providing low-cost quality care. They are independent and deserve to be separate.

A TRIBUTE TO MRS. MARIAN BARON GOLDNER

HON. MARCY KAPTUR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1985

Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, recently, one of my constituents took first prize in the International Association for Children's Literature Competition in Budapest, Hungary. Mrs. Marian Baron Goldner received top honors for her book, "Georgie the Jovial Giraffe," published by Banner, Inc. of New York and South Carolina. At a dinner in her honor in Budapest, Mrs. Goldner received a silver inscribed tray with a notation in Hungarian that she received first prize. Her book will be on display at the International Book Fair in Frankfort, Germany in October.

Mrs. Goldner, who has previously published plays, poems, stories, and articles, signs her books "Grandma Marian." "Georgie" is written in rhyme and contains educational information in addition to being entertaining for children of all ages. I know my colleagues in the House of Representatives join me in congratulating Marian Baron Goldner for her fine work and thanking her for enriching the lives of children throughout the world.

HEART TRANSPLANT PERFORMED IN TALLAHASSEE

HON. DON FUQUA

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1985

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Speaker, Tallahassee, Florida's capital city, is rapidly gaining a national reputation in the sciences. Last week, doctors at Tallahassee Memorial Regional Medical Center became only the third team in the State of Florida to perform a heart transplant. The patient is doing fine.

The Tallahassee Democrat ran two articles the next morning, one detailing the events of this historic operation and the other explaining the processes of transplant procedures. I wish to praise the doctors, nurses and other members of the medical team involved and pay special tribute to the brave recipient of the heart, Calvin Creel. Special honor should be paid the soul who gave his or her heart so that another might live.

Mr. Speaker, I include at this point in the RECORD the two articles from the Democrat on the heart transplant surgery.

CITY'S FIRST HEART TRANSPLANT PEFORMED

(By Linda Duffy)

The heart of an undisclosed donor was transplanted into a 47-year-old Tallahassee man early Wednesday in a 61-minute operation at Tallahassee Memorial Regional Medical Center.

Calvin "Burl" Creel, who doctors said would have lived only a few days without the transplant, became the first patient to receive a new heart at the hands of Tallahassee Memorial's 16-member heart transplantation team headed by Dr. Thomas J. Bixler.

Tallahassee Memorial has become only the third hospital in Florida where heart transplants are performed. The other two are Shands Teaching Hospital in Gainesville and Tampa General Hospital. The Miami Heart Institute performed one heart transplant in 1969.

Because Creel's family remained in seclusion Wednesday after a week-long ordeal and middle-of-the-night surgery, little is known about him except that he has been disabled with coronary artery disease for several years.

By 3 p.m. Wednesday, Creel was listed in critical-but-stable condition, which Bixler says means there is uncertainty about whether his now-stable vital signs will continue to improve. The condition is usual for a heart-transplant patient.

A report issued by J. Craig Honaman, Tallahassee Mrmorial executive vice president, said Creel was "awake, alert and communicating with nurses and family." He was said to be "progressing as expected."

"I want to emphasise that Mr. Creel is extremely sick," Bixler said at a 7:15 a.m. news conference Wednesday. "He had already undergone two open-heart procedures and would have died within the next few days. He has been disabled for years and it was unclear how long he could have waited for a transplant."

Creel is suffering from some kidney damage, but Dr. C.W Applegate, the team's kidney specialist, had determined it was directly related to the patient's coronary-artery disease and would reverse itself after the transplant, Bixler said.

"Mr. Creel is awake, but he can't speak because he has a breathing tube," Bixler said. "I am sure he is in pain as that is usual for any operation."

If all goes well, Bixler, added, the breathing tube should be removed within 48 hours.

Creel knew he would eventually need a transplant and was evaluated for the procedure when the hospital's unit was readied in August. When he was admitted a week ago, his need for a new heart became crucial.

The search for a suitable donor took six days. Creel's name went on a heart-recipient list with approximately 116 others, but because of his blood type, body weight and severity of illness, he was the No. 1 candidate of 10 for the heart he received Wednesday. According to Terry Jackson, director of the Tallahassee Organ Donor Agency, Creel's wait was very short.

Jackson, Bixler and hospital personnel refused to reveal the identity of the donor other than to say the heart came from an upper Midwestern city.

Jackson said even the Creels don't know the identity of the donor. "This is a very sensitive ordeal," he said, "The majority of donors do stay anomymous."

Although most of the waiting for the heart took place while Hurricane Elana had closed airports in North Florida, Honaman said, "we put off worrying about whether we'd be able to get a heart in here until we actually had one." Once a heart is removed from a donor, it must be implanted within four hours.

The actual transplant began Wednesday at 12:30 a.m. and was completed at 1:31 a.m., three hours and 11 minutes after the organ was located and Bixler flew to the donor hospital to remove the heart.

Kathleen Creel, wife of the patient, gave a short statement, Wednesday morning in which she said: My husband has been sick for a long time. We're thankful to the Lord for this transplant. With the Lord's help, he'll pull through."

"I want to emphasize that even though the operation went well, this is just the beginning for Mr. Creel," Bixler said. "The critical period starts with the operation and doesn't end for several months. He could suffer serious rejection or other problems at any time."

HEART TRANSPLANT REQUIRES SPEED AND PRECISION

(By Linda Duffy)

Transplanting any organ is a procedure requiring delicacy, precision and speed, but the heart dies the fastest, as only four hours can elapse from the time the heart is removed from the donor and placed in the recipient.

Before any operation can take place, however, recipients must be screened and donors must be found. The recipient has to be under 55 years old and in the last throes of coronary disease. Although without a new heart he would face death in a few months, his lungs need to be in good shape, his pulmonary blood vessels have to be healthy and he must be infection-free.

The donor has to be under 35 and free from infection, cardiovascular disease or cancer.

Then the matching of the donor and the recipient begins—blood types, antibody levels, height and weight. Currently in the United States, 116 dying patients are on list hoping to be matched with a heart. Burl Creel, who received a new heart Wednesday at Tallahassee Memorial Regional Medical Center, had a six-day wait for a donor, which is considered brief.

Once a potential donor has been found for a Tallahassee Memorial recipient, at least one member from the cardiac-transplant team—in Creel's case, Dr. Thomas J. Bixler—rushes to the donor's hospital to remove the heart, place it in a cold electrolyte solution, pack it in a cooler of ice and return with it to Tallahassee to complete the transplant.

Remember, all this must be done within four hours. To stay within that time frame. Tallahassee Memorial's cardiac team will travel no farther than 1,000 miles for a donated organ. Once the doctor's plane lands at Tallahassee Municipal Airport, the hospital's Life Flight helicopter rushes the heart to the medical center.

All the while frenzied activity is going on. The patient, being prepared for surgery, is wheeled into the operating room a full two hours before the arrival of the donor heart. As soon as the heart arrives, the transplant begins. The 15-member team goes to work.

Two technicians divert the patient's blood through a heart-lung machine and surgeons cut the aorta, the right atrium and the blood vessels that lead to the lungs. The donor heart is placed in the chest cavity and sown into place. Finally, the surgeons resuscitate the cooled heart by electrical shock, beginning the heart beat.

The heart-lung machine is disconnected and the chest is closed.

The patient is then moved into the intensive-care unit to receive one-on-one nursing and recuperatory care. He will be in some pain and won't be able to talk for a day or two until the uncomfortable breathing tube in his throat is removed.

RECOGNIZING CLEAR RIDGE ALL-STAR BASEBALL TEAM

HON. WILLIAM O. LIPINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1985

Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to share with my colleagues a resolution adopted by the City Council of the City of Chicago recognizing the outstanding achievements of the Clear Ridge Baseball 12-Year Old All-Star Team and commending them on their Illinois State championship win.

RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE CITY COUNCIL OF THE CITY OF CHICAGO, IL

Whereas, the Clear Ridge Baseball League in Chicago, is comprised of twenty-nine teams drawn from some three-hundred families of various ethnic backgrounds; and

Whereas, these families and their children live on the southwest side of our great city in the twenty-third ward; and

Whereas, Clear Ridge Baseball has been providing a baseball program for children for almost fifty years; and

Whereas, the Clear Ridge Baseball Twelve Year old All-Star Team won the Illinois State Championship of Babe Ruth Baseball held in downstate Illinois; and

Whereas, the fifteen young men who won this title for their team and this city were: Robert Krzeckowski, Kevin Duddleston, Pat Kane, Robby Brown, Chris Gallichio, Jeff Gricus, Ken Morgan, Frank Famaglia, Joey Bunch, Steve Pfeifer, Steve Sobun, Matt Taylor, Mike Chico, Brian Spalliero, Matt Hall, Coaches—Jim Duddleston, Phil Pfeiffer, Bob Gricus, John Spalliero: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Mayor and the City Council assembled here on this 7th day of August, 1985, do hereby recognize the outstanding achievements of the Clear Ridge Baseball Twelve Year Old All-Star Team and commend them on their Illinois State Championship win. Be it further

Resolved, That a suitable copy of this resolution be forwarded to the coaching staff of this team as well as the players parents.

A PROGRAM FOR WORLDWIDE ECONOMIC GROWTH

HON. BILL FRENZEL

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1985

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to insert into the RECORD the following speech given to the Japan Federation of Economic Organizations in Tokyo on August 23 by friend, classmate, and colleague, the Honorable JACK KEMP of New York.

Titled "A Program for World-Wide Economic Growth," JACK KEMP'S wide-ranging presentation to this most prestigious group of Japanese business leaders both contained four principal recommendations to improve the climate for world trade, and worldwide economic growth: First, liberalized access to domestic markets, not only in Japan but Europe as well; second, prompt, serious negotiation of a "Reagan round" of GATT improvements; third, reduction of marginal tax rates, and government regulation in all countries; and fourth rebuilding of an international system of stable exchange rates.

You may want to quarrel with one or two of those recommendations. I'm not crazy about No. 4 myself, but our colleague Congressman KEMP has presented a coherent, comprehensive positive program for world growth. His ideas are a refreshing change from the often heard demands for the more negative pessimism of protectionism.

I commend JACK KEMP'S speech, and am pleased to include it in the RECORD.

The speech follows:

A PROGRAM FOR WORLD-WIDE ECONOMIC GROWTH

(By Congressman Jack Kemp)

I am greatly honored to be your guest here in Japan and to be able to address the Keidanren. My wife Joanne and I are especially pleased because it gives us the opportunity to meet Japan and her people in person, instead of through newspaper reports and trade statistics.

Even a brief acquaintance makes it clear that the Japanese are economically successful because they are at heart a nation of artists and poets. It should not be surprising that the people who invented the tea ceremony have also made production almost an art form. Japanese frugality is reflected in the elegance of the haiku even more than in your high rate of personal saving. Indeed, you express your artistic temperament in the very fact that, instead of writing words with a pen, you draw pictures with a brush!

Ambassador Mike Mansfield has said many times that the relationship between the United States and Japan is the most important bilateral relationship in the free world, bar none. Despite our current concerns about trade and national defense, I am happy to say that the state or our relationship is very good.

As an American and a Congressman from Buffalo, I was proud when President Reagan spoke to the Japanese Diet in 1983, the first American President ever to receive that honor. I believe he expressed the sentiment of the American people when he said, "Of all the strengths we possess, of all the ties that bind us, I believe the greatest is our dedication to freedom. Japan and America stand at the forefront of the free nations and free economies of the world."

Both Japanese and Americans should be proud of Japan's economic and democratic development since the war. But it did not happen by accident. It took foresight, courage and hard work on the part of both Japanese and American leaders, and especially on the part of the Japanese people.

The degree of success seems to have astonished even the Japanese. I understand that Japanese journalists began calling the initial spurt of growth in the mid-1950s the "Jimmu boom," because no one could remember such prosperity since the Emperor Jimmu ascended the throne in 660 B.C. But when growth accelerated further in the late 1950s, they had to find a new name, so they called it the "Iwato boom," meaning that such good times had not been seen since the even more remote period when the sun goddess Amaterasu was lured from her Iwato cave. When the economy grew by 13 percent yearly in the late 1960s, they spoke of the "Izanami boom," harking back to the still more misty past when the goddess Izanami gave birth to the islands of Japan.

Yet Japan's "economic miracle" was not really miraculous. Your formula for domestic economic policy was basically what we in the United States call "supply-side economics"—tax incentives for thrift and hard work, a relatively small burden of government, and a minimum of unnecessary regulation. Despite increases in recent years, Japan still has the lowest tax burden among the industrial countries. In fact, for two decades, Japan reduced its tax rates every year, counting on the revenues from faster growth to balance its budget.

Similar policies were also pursued in the United States, notably by President John F. Kennedy. And they have contributed to the rapid development of countries like the Republic of Korea, the Republic of China, Singapore, and Hong Kong—countries poor in natural resources but very rich in human potential. However, it was America's misfortune to forget the formula for its success, until President Reagan rediscovered it.

I am sure that all Japanese school children are told the story about the Emperor Nintoku of the fourth or fifth century, who ascended a high mountain, looked around and said, "In the whole land there rises no smoke; the land is all poverty-stricken. So I will remit all the people's taxes and forced labor from now until three years." The Emperor allowed his palace to become dilapidated, and did not build a new one until he saw the smoke rising once again from the people's chimneys.

Five years ago, President Reagan noticed that there was no smoke rising from the smokestacks of our nation's industries. And he said that it was time to reduce the burdens of taxation, federal spending, and the forced labor of government regulations. He cut tax rates 25%, added new incentives for business investment, and freed our economy from government-imposed burdens. Today the fires of recovery have been stoked, and more than 7 million new jobs have been created. But we will not stop until we have achieved what we promised—full employment without inflation. Congress will shortly consider President Reagan's proposal for a further reform of the tax system, which would cut the top tax rate in half, to 35%, from the time he took office.

Over the years, as our national economies have grown, we have grown together. Trade between the U.S. and Japan has surged tremendously. Our combined economies represent 35 percent of the world's entire output. Total trade between the U.S. and Japan has reached $70 billion, double the level of just ten years ago. Japan is our second largest trading partner after Canada, and our largest agricultural customer. This commerce is still helping our countries to create abundance.

Trade is mutually beneficial. It raises our standard of living by increasing the variety and quality of goods available in every country. It accelerates economic development, not only in the industrialized nations but also in the less developed countries. It helps to keep a tight grip on prices through competition. Above all, it creates jobs by increasing the market for locally produced goods. When trade is free, jobs in Tokyo are not created at the expense of workers in Buffalo, or vice versa; with expanding trade and prosperity, jobs are created in both cities.

Yet, as you know, the sentiment for trade protectionism is growing rapidly in the United States. During my 15 years in the Congress, I have never seen such pressure for protectionism. In the past few days, you have heard other legislators from the United States, who have said they will support protectionist legislation unless Japan moves even further than the recent trade action package. More than 300 different protectionist bills have been introduced, and Congress will begin considering some of them when it reconvenes next month. A major Democratic Party initiative threatens to impose a 25% import fee on any country whose non-oil trade is in surplus by 50% or more. (The sponsors are unclear as to why oil-exporting nations are excluded). This formula aims directly at Japan, the Republic of Korea, the Republic of China, and Brazil.

It is extremely important for you to remember that ours is not a parliamentary system in which the head of government controls the legislature. If such a bill goes to the floor of the Senate, scores of more specific protectionist measures will be added. That's exactly what happened to the Smoot-Hawley tariff of 1930, which began as a bill limited to agriculture, but soon turned into a sweeping measure and finally placed outlandish tariffs on some items that the U.S. didn't even produce. Today the stakes are equally high, and the danger is equally great.

Right now, the chances for avoiding such a disaster rest heavily with President Reagan, who has stood almost alone against the protectionist tide. I will strongly oppose, and I will urge President Reagan to veto, any protectionist legislation passed by the Congress. But President Reagan needs all the help he can get, from his friends both at home and abroad, and I urge you to do what is in your power to help.

The pressure for protectionism will persist as long as its causes remain. It is therefore extremely important to understand and deal with them. I believe there are three reasons why the American trade deficit is front-page news today.

First, the trade deficit has partly reflected a strong U.S. economy, as Sen. Robert Dole observed. Our economy naturally has imported more because it has grown faster than the rest of the world.

It is fashionable to say that the mere existence of a trade deficit costs jobs; on a recent trip to Japan, Rep. Sam Gibbons said that 25,000 American jobs are lost for every $1 billion in the U.S. trade deficit. But this fallacy cannot be allowed to pass unchallenged.

In 1980 the United States had a surplus in goods and services of $9 billion, and total U.S. employment was 100.9 million. Today the total deficit is about $100 billion, but total employment is 108.1 million. In 1980, 59.6 percent of the population over age 16 was employed; today it is 60.1%. These figures prompted economist Herb Stein to ask: "Where are the lost jobs?"

What is overlooked is that the counterpart to our trade deficit is a net capital inflow. This net inflow is due mostly to the fact that U.S. banks are lending more at home and less abroad because of the more favorable economic climate—foreigners have not greatly increased their gross annual investment in the United States. The net inflow has financed 40 percent of the recent investment boom, creating new jobs, hundreds of thousands of new business starts, and a higher standard of living.

There are two ways in which this share of the trade deficit could be reduced. The United States could have a recession; but this would lead to a world-wide reduction in trade, and incidentally increase the U.S. budget deficit. On the other and, the deficit would be reduced if other nations reduce their own tax rates—thereby attracting capital, and strengthening their currenices. In my opinion, this portion of the deficit does not require correction, as long as the investment in America is productive enough to pay for itself. The United States ran a trade deficit almost every year during our first century—and we are still the world's largest developing country.

A second part of the trade deficit is due to trade restrictions; and this has received the most attention. It is clear that Japan has liberalized its trade since the 1960s, and its tariff barriers are lower today on average than in most other GATT nations, including the United States. However, problems remain, especially in such areas as agriculture, forestry, oil and oil products, and capital markets. Their removal would not only increase our trade, but also improve the standard of living of the Japanese, who now spend twice to four times as much as the rest of the world for many basic agricultural and dairy products. Many experts also agree that non-tariff barriers in Japan, such as standards and certification procedures, are a serious obstacle to the free flow of trade between our countries.

I applaud Prime Minister Yasuhiro Nakasone for his trade "action program," which is both a sign of good faith and a significant step forward. The United States should also remove some of its own self-imposed barriers, such as the restriction on exporting Alaskan oil to Japan and the rest of Asia. All of these steps need to be undertaken on their own merits. However, our Commerce Department has estimated that all of them together would reduce the trade imbalance by about $10 billion, or only a quarter of the trade imbalance with Japan.

The third source of the trade imbalance—and the most underestimated—is the chaotic state of the international monetary system. Much of the pressure for protectionism stems from an attempt, since 1971, to maintain a highly integrated world economy without a stable international monetary unit. The result has been similar to what would happen if each American state or Japanese prefecture issued its own fluctuating paper currency.

According to Jan Tumlir, former GATT director of research, "Over the 1970s, the steep rise in the level of economic uncertainty is still insufficiently appreciated as the cause of the halting growth and increased instability in the world economy. It can best be compared to a thick fog descending on a turnpike, slowing down traffic and causing accidents."

Think of the vast difference in the international economic climate before and after the Second World War. The 1930s were the economic equivalence of war—and were soon followed by war itself. A chain reaction was started when each country tried to raise barriers with beggar-thy-neighbor tariffs, exchange controls, and competitive devaluations.

But the farsighted leaders who established the Bretton Woods monetary system, and later the General Agreements on Tariffs and Trade, sought precisely to prevent a return to the mercantilism of the 1930s. President Kennedy, who initiated GATT's Kennedy Round, described this vision as one of "a free community of nations, independent but interdependent, uniting north and south, east and west, in one great family of man, outgrowing and transcending the hates and fears that rend our nation."

Under the Bretton Woods system, the United States offered indirect financial assistance to nations recovering from the war, through multilateral institutions, and agreed to anchor the world monetary system by maintaining the dollar convertible into gold. Other countries committed themselves to stabilizing their currencies by keeping them freely convertible into dollars, and all nations agreed to liberalize international trade. By any measure, the system was a success. Within the framework of Bretton Woods and GATT, nations like Japan and Germany recovered spectacularly through their peoples' efforts. Many less developed nations also began to prosper, thanks to the increasing economic integration.

But fifteen years ago the Bretton Woods system broke down—partly because the international system, based on a national currency, became overextended. Despite its flaws, Bretton Woods was far better than what followed. The breakdown of the world's last stable monetary system unleashed an unprecedented global inflation, which was followed by severe global contraction and rapid regression toward conditions which strongly resemble the 1930s: falling commodity prices, overcapacity, an intractable debt problem; and the beginnings of a slide toward protectionism.

The experiment with floating exchange rates has been a failure. It has failed to bring the promised autonomy of domestic economic policies. It has put a premium on short-term, speculative assets, discouraged long-term investment, and generated defensive behavior by producers and consumers. Trade is disrupted almost daily by unprecedented swings in exchange rates, which have almost turned international trade into a form of gambling. The disruption costs many jobs and much misallocated capital, and those who are hurt turn to their governments for help. Rather than acting as a benign substitute for protectionism, floating exchange rates have directly encouraged it.

I have not said anything about America's budget deficit until now, because the issue can be intelligently addressed only in the context of the international monetary and economic chaos. There is no disagreement about the desirability of reducing the budget deficit, on either side of the Pacific. Indeed, no one would like to reduce the deficit more than the President of the United States. The whole debate turns on how the deficit can actually be reduced. When asked whether tax cuts or deficit reduction is the first priority, the only sensible answer is that the first priority is to prevent a recession that would be the coup de grace for the world economy, and which would hinder rather than promote success in reducing the deficit. Without the American recovery, there would have been little expansion of world trade, and no foreseeable solution to the downward-spiraling debt crisis. It would have been nothing less than irresponsible to pursue monetary or fiscal policies which permited this.

According to conventional wisdom, an autonomously created U.S. budget deficit forces up interest rates, attracting capital and causing the dollar to rise. But it is equally arguable that in a world of floating exchange rates, the dollar's central role in the world economy has caused the currency to rise, created a trade deficit, and contributed to the budget deficit. As long as U.S. dollars are the almost exclusive source of global monetary reserves to accommodate world growth, then one of two things must happen in the face of world-wide demand for reserves: either the U.S. central bank must supply the demand for dollars, or else that demand will be met in real terms through devaluation of other currencies—in either case forcing a trade deficit upon the United States. Until we restore a stable international monetary system through fundamental reform, I am afraid that the pressure for protectionism will continue.

To summarize my recommendations, I believe the industrial countries should take the leadership to improve the climate for international trade in four ways.

First, we need much faster progress in liberalizing access to domestic markets. I am thinking here not only of Japan and the United States, but more especially about Europe, which is in many ways more protectionist. The U.S.-Japanese trade imbalance is not merely a bilateral problem, because Europe's protectionism forces more competition into relatively open markets like the United States.

Second, we need a "Reagan Round" of GATT talks among both industrial and less developed countries. The level of cynicism and hopelessness surrounding such negotiations strike me as completely unjustified. Considering what is at stake, it is our duty to try harder.

Third, more balanced trade can be restored if other countries reduce marginal tax rates and—especially in the case of the stagnant economies of Europe—reduce government intervention in the economy. This would also reduce high rates of unemployment in many countries. I would like to caution against the notion that what is needed is Keynesian "demand stimulus," as though there were little to choose between cutting marginal tax rates and raising government spending. In the United States we have found through hard experience that positive results are achieved only when incentives are increased throught tax rate reduction, not when the burden of spending rises.

Finally, we must quickly begin co-operation to rebuild an international system of stable exchange rates. The Group of Ten meeting in Tokyo earlier this summer, which affirmed support for the floating-rate system, was extremely disappointing, as well as extremely dangerous for the future development of the world economy. I was embarrassed to read a U.S. government publication that justified this position on the astonishing grounds that the floating-rate system "diverts a smaller amount of capital from productive to speculative uses since speculation under this system entails larger risks." My question is: if floating exchange rates are too risky even for speculators, what hope is there for productive businesses?

Prime Minister Nakasone was right when he said: "The free world nations are at a crossroads, facing the crucial choice of continuing along the road of economic prosperity with free trade as its basis or following the path to economic stagnation under protectionism." I am hopeful that we will choose the right path, but to do so we must co-operate in taking vigorous action to address the fundamental problems we face.

Yet economic development does not occur in a vacuum. I would be remiss if I did not mention that the free nations of Asia are also approaching another crossroad. On my current trip—which embraces the Philippines, the Republic of Korea, Japan, and the Republic of China—I find increasing concern throughout the Western Pacific about the dramatic increase in the Soviet Union's military presence here. To someone who has not visited the Pacific in several years, the developments are striking.

For example, over the past eight years, the Soviet Union has built substantial military facilities on the Northern Territories—the south Kurile islands—including about 10,000 motorized infantry, air, and artillery troops. The Soviets remain unyielding concerning the status of the Northen Territories, because the sea lanes of the Soviet Pacific Fleet, as well as of its large strategic nuclear submarine force, run through them. Unfortunately, it is fundamental to Soviet military strategy to control the Northern Territories and to try to neutralize Japan's self-defense.

The Japanese-American Mutual Security Treaty has been called the cornerstone of Asian security. A strong Japanese effort, especially in air defense and sealane protection, is critical to that security, and I commend Prime Minister Nakasone for his responsible commitment to improve its quality. One of the strongest impressions of my visit is how many nations depend on Japan's ability to defend herself.

Perhaps no emotion causes deeper anguish to peace-loving people today than the fact that we live in a world where peace must be defended if it is to be preserved. Yet we bring oursleves to perform the difficult task because what is at stake is not some abstract balance of power, or even a choice between communism and anti-communism. Infinitely more important than what we oppose, it what we stand for: the desire for peace and freedom itself.

One of this century's greatest signs of hope for mankind is that the flower of friendship between our countries blossomed upon a battlefield. This month we observe the 40th anniversary of the end of the tragic war between the United States and Japan. In doing so, we should follow the example of General Douglas MacArthur. At a time when others were steeped in malice, distrust, and hatred, General MacArthur looked forward to reconciliation. Aboard the battleship Missouri in Tokyo Bay on September 2, 1945, he said, "It is my earnest hope, and indeed the hope of all mankind, that from this solemn occasion a better world shall emerge out of the flood and carnage of the past—a world dedicated to the dignity of man and the fulfillment of his most cherished wish for freedom, tolerance, and justice."

Far-sighted as he was, if General MacArthur were with us today, even he would be astonished at the progress. Forty years ago, Tokyo lay in ruins. Yet last night, my wife Joanne and I marveled at the culture and prosperity of this thriving, world-class city. There is a reason why Tokyo was able, with the respect and suport of friends, to rebuild herself—because freedom works. We don't need a monument to commemorate the beginning of friendship between our peoples; this city is that monument—a monument to what free men and women can do in a society which empowers them to create a new life for their families and their children.

Yet in the end what is decisive is not just the concept of economic freedom—which you enjoy; nor is it just the necessity of free trade, for which we must all strive. Above all, it is freedom of the spirit—even more than the material prosperity which results from it—that can make a city rise like a phoenix out of the tragedy of war, and come to stand as a living testament to the values which unite the community of freedom-loving peoples everywhere in the world.

Those present today enjoy a measure of peace and prosperity thanks to those, like MacArthur, who went before us—people who were not merely inspired by this vision, but acted upon it. It is our responsibility not merely to conserve this precious heritage, but the increase it and hand it on to those who will come after us. For in the end our highest responsibility is not merely to make our nations prosper; our highest responsibilty to the world is to keep our nations free.

Thank you very much.

PUERTO RICO SEES HARM IN TAX PLAN: REAGAN WOULD DROP PROVISION CREDITED FOR THOUSANDS OF JOBS IN COMMONWEALTH

HON. JAIME B. FUSTER

OF PUERTO RICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1985

Mr. FUSTER. Mr. Speaker, the New York Times article of August 25, 1985 had the arresting title above.

I hope that my colleagues will read with interest the following excerpts of that news story. Its message is of vital importance to the welfare of the 3.5 million American citizens that live in Puerto Rico and to the employment prospects of our labor force now suffering a 23 percent unemployment rate.

Despite what appear to be unfavorable odds, Gov. Rafael Hernández Colón is stepping up efforts to save a tax privilege that has created thousands of jobs on the island from elimination under President Reagan's tax revision proposal.

Economists on and off the island have warned that if the tax privilege, Section 936 of the Internal Revenue Code, is phased out in five years as the White House proposes, dozens of corporations with thousands of jobs will leave the island.

Norman Ture, president of the Institute for Tax Economy Investigation in Washington, said this would be "devastating" to Puerto Rico, whose unemployment rate of 22 percent is three times the national average. Virtually all economists on the island agree with his assessment.

Section 936, in effect since 1976, frees American corporations from Federal taxes on earnings from plants on the island and permits the return of those profits to the mainland. The provision was designed to create jobs. Puerto Rico has 522 plants, with 83,000 jobs, operating under Section 936, according to the Puerto Rico Economic Development Administration. Most are in the pharmaceutical and electronics fields.

TAX PAID TO ISLAND TREASURY

Companies that take portions of their profits to the mainland must pay the Puerto Rico treasury a tax that ranges from 5 percent to 10 percent, depending on how much of the profits the corporations decide to invest in island enterprises. The "toll gate tax" earned the commonwealth $130 million in the fiscal year that ended June 30.

In addition, corporations are required to place 10 percent of their island bank deposits with the Puerto Rico Government Development Bank, which holds $700 million in such deposits. The Hernández Colón administration hopes to persuade companies to spend some of this money to build low-cost housing.

Mr. Ture said of the Section 936 program, "I don't know of any program to create jobs that has created so many jobs so economically."

Economists in the commonwealth predict that elimination of the section, which would require Congressional approval, would cost 100,000 to 150,000 jobs directly and indirectly and that this would touch off a mass migration to industrial cities in the states. And they foresee substantially higher costs for social welfare programs in Puerto Rico that are financed by the Federal Government.

PATENT COOPERATION TREATY LEGISLATION

HON. ROBERT W. KASTENMEIER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1985

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, today, I introduce legislation at the request of the administration to implement chapter II of the Patent Cooperation Treaty. If enacted, the proposed legislation authorizes the Patent and Trademark Office to become an international preliminary examining authority and enable U.S. inventors to take advantage of all the benefits offered by the Patent Cooperation Treaty.

This major multilateral convention, adhered to by the United States and 38 other countries, has increased in importance to our inventors since it became operational in 1978. The treaty simplifies the filing of patent applications on the same invention in different member countries by providing centralized filing procedures and a standardized application format. Further, the treaty affords applicants additional time to evaluate their inventions before incurring major prosecution expenses in the countries in which they seek protection. The procedures, which give applicants several options on how to proceed with their applications are embodied in two main chapters of the treaty.

Chapter I of the treaty gives applicants a period of 20 months from the priority date of the international application before they have to incur the expenses associated with national filings. During this period, applicants obtain an international search report to help them decide whether to proceed with patent prosecution in the various countries they initially chose.

Under chapter II of the treaty, the period for delaying national patent prosecution is extended by an additional 10 months and applicants are given an international preliminary examination report evaluating their invention on the basis of information contained in the earlier search report. As a consequence, applicants can be more selective of the countries in which they ultimately decide to proceed, can have time to evaluate the strength of their potential patents and can develop marketing plans.

When the United States ratified the Patent Cooperation Treaty in 1975, Congress decided to postpone adherence to chapter II of the treaty because of the then-prevailing opinion that divergent patent examining methods made chapter II impracticable. The treaty is not self-executing and when Congress passed implementing legislation in 1975—Public Law 94-131—that legislation only provided authority for the Patent and Trademark Office to discharge its functions under chapter I. Experience gained with the operation of the treaty since it became operational in 1978, as well as international harmonization of patent processing procedures, may have laid to rest the early concerns regarding U.S. adherence to chapter II. Some in the patent community have come to the conclusion that it would be in their interest to take advantage of the benefits offered by the procedures of chapter II.

To this end, in a letter of July 27, 1984, the President has already requested the Senate's advice and consent to a withdrawal of the reservation on chapter II, which the United States made when it originally ratified the treaty. The bill which I am introducing today, would legislatively implement the withdrawal of that reservation. It would authorize the Patent and Trademark Office to discharge its functions as an international preliminary examining authority and to act as an elected office under chapter II of the treaty.

Arguably, enactment of this legislation would give our inventors an improved tool to strengthen the protection of industrial property on an international scale. This may be so since most other member states of the Patent Cooperation Treaty already adhere to its chapter II, and our inventors can avail themselves of its benefits in those countries only if the United States also adheres to that chapter.

As chairman of the Subcommittee on Courts, Civil Liberties and the Administration of Justice, I urge all interested parties to submit comments on this proposal to the subcommittee at 2137B Rayburn (225-3926).

SUPERFUND REAUTHORIZATION

HON. DEAN A. GALLO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1985

Mr. GALLO. Mr. Speaker, during the summer recess, I had the opportunity to tour the 11 sites in my district that are covered by the NPL list and Superfund. As a result of my visits, I am more convinced than ever that we need closer working relationships at all levels of Government and between Government and the private sector to solve our common environmental problems.

I am also more convinced than ever that we can not continue to delay in the reauthorization of Superfund legislation which, unless we move with purpose and dispatch, will expire in 25 days.

On Thursday, August 8, and Monday, August 12, I visited each Superfund site with local, State, and Federal officials, as well as other interested local residents, concerned about cleanup at each site.

I made this tour for two reasons. First, I wanted to be briefed on the current status of each project and to be sure that local and State officials are working closely to solve these common problems.

My second reason for touring the sites was to emphasize the need for quick congressional action in the fall on the Superfund reauthorization.

What I found were 11 unique Superfund sites, each with individual problems and opportunities for solutions.

The most difficult cleanup project in the 11th District so far is the removal of radon from residential neighborhoods in Glen Ridge, Montclair and West Orange. Work is being done in a confined, populated area, based on experience gained from other cleanups in residential areas.

Transportation and disposal of this low-level radioactive material has become a problem, as well.

Several of the sites I toured involve old landfills leaking polluted groundwater that threatens water supplies. The short-term solution in these areas will be to stop the flow of the liquid.

Long-term solutions may include innovative new technology that will allow for onsite cleansing to remove contamination from the ground. This technology includes a portable unit to burn off hazards.

This process has been perfected by the Environmental Protection Agency. It is portable, leaving no permanent structures behind, and is equipped with state-of-the-art pollution control devices.

Other sites I visited involve innovative local solutions to problems with water supplies. The town of Dover is operating on a backup well system as it awaits agreements paving the way for a permanent solution.

Rockaway Borough and Rockaway Township each have constructed state-of-the-art filtration systems, using local talent to ensure quality water supplies. These sites have been visited by representatives of governments from three continents in search of solutions to their water purification problems.

One site is worthy of particular note, because it involves a private company that has spent well over $1 million to remove a chemical deposit and to remove chemicals from the groundwater using state-of-the-art skimmers.

More companies should be taking such positive steps in cooperation with local, States and Federal officials to complete work on these important cleanup efforts.

Current laws discourage such public spirited efforts, however, on cleanup sites involving more than one company.

My visits have reenforced my belief that local officials have done excellent work toward protecting their communities in these cases.

These visits, combined with my extensive work on the Public Works and Transportation Committee, have furthered my belief that our work over the next 3 weeks will have a profound effect on our environmental quality for decades to come.

Our efforts must provide adequate funding to get the job done, and to do it right. We need a stable, sufficient and fair funding source for our remedial cleanup activities.

We need to provide a community right to know and emergency response training so that communities and people who reside in them are fully protected from the dangers of hazardous wastes.

Our efforts, and the efforts of professionals in the field must continue. Frankly, we have to take steps to ensure that professionals are willing to keep working. We have to provide these professionals with the legal and technical tools to safely and thoroughly perform their mission in a way that protects the public good.

Twenty-one days is not much time to coordinate our actions with the actions of the Senate. It isn't much time to reconcile the well-intentioned approaches of the various committees and subcommittees in our Houses. But, we have a job to do, and do it we must.

ONE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE FIRST PRIMITIVE METHODIST CHURCH IN WESTMORELAND CITY

HON. JOHN P. MURTHA

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1985

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD these remarks noting the 100th Anniversary of the First Primitive Methodist Church in Westmoreland City.

Anniversaries such as this deserve our special recognition. Reflect for a moment that when this church was founded Grover Cleveland was President of the United States, America was still healing the wounds of a Civil War that had ended only 20 years before, and we were on the edge of a major industrial revolution that would reform American society.

And reflect that our ancestors over that 100 years saw unprecedented changes in America that have affected the lives of every citizen and how we go about our lives.

At the center of those changes, providing constancy, guidance, and community were American churches such as the First Primitive Methodist Church. In celebrating this anniversary, we mark not only the 100th year of its existence, but we join together in a celebration of the American spirit, America's religious heritage, and American ideals that have seen our families and friends through those often trying and difficult years.

The occassion of this anniversary also marks a rededication—to begin the next hundred years of the Church's history as a continuing community force of strength for individuals and families, and a source of continued focus for the American and religious ideals that will remain a key to our national strength and success.

It is my pleasure to insert these comments in recognition of the congregation of the First Primitive Methodist Church in Westmoreland City.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1985

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to express high praise and appreciation for the outstanding safety record of Allaire Limousines in Brielle, NJ. As chairman of the House Public Works and Transportation Committee, I feel a special sense of gratitude for the commitment that Allaire Limousines consistently has shown to innovative safety measures. Michael J. Renehan, president of Allaire Limousines, deserves additional praise for his leadership and excellence in contributing to the overall safety of the roads and highways in my district and all of New Jersey.

Allaire Limousines makes every effort to ensure the safety of their drivers and passengers. Each driver is required to successfully complete the National Safety Council safe driving course. Every vehicle is carefully maintained, and each is replaced by a brand new vehicle every 20 to 30 months. In addition, Michael Renehan has been a longtime advocate of the use of safety belts in his vehicles.

I am not alone in honoring this very special organization. The New Jersey State Legislature, Gov. Thomas Kean of New Jersey, U.S. Transportation Secretary Elizabeth Dole, New Jersey State Senator Frank Pallone, the Insurance Information Institute and Limousine and Chauffeur magazine have also recognized the firm's outstanding safety record.

With best wishes for continued success, I thank Mr. Renehan and his firm for the model of excellence they provide for others across the Nation who use America's road system.

THE PERSECUTION OF SOVIET JEWS

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1985

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, the following statement describes the mistreatment of Dr. Nelson Kanter on his recent trip through Europe and the Soviet Union. I would like to call my colleagues attention to this statement as it is a further illustration of the persecution that exists for Soviet Jews, and how an American traveler personally experienced this brutality.

Dr. Nelson Kanter arrived in Leningrad on Friday, August 9, 1985. On August 10, he and his traveling companion were forcibly taken to a Leningrad police station by three or four unidentified persons, one of whom was later identified as the chief of the militia of that district in Leningrad. At the police station, Dr. Kanter and his companion were taken to a room where there were many plain clothesmen and militiamen walking around. Dr. Kanter was separated from his traveling companion: He was taken down a long corridor to a small auditorium where all his personal possessions were examined. An intourist interpretor arrived and Dr. Kanter's personal possessions from a tote bag were exposed on a table where they were photographed from various angles. Dr. Kanter was photographed as well. His requests to speak with the American Consulate were denied. Vitamin C, which he was carrying, was confiscated for a drug check with the implied threat that these people often bring drugs to our country. His personal notebook, containing his views and impressions of Leningrad, were carefully examined and kept.

Some pages of notes made by Dr. Kanter during the previous day, during a visit with Leningrad refusenik, Yakov Gorodetsky, were questioned. Officials implied that he, Dr. Kanter could be held as a spy and that he lied about being a tourist. Under this intimidation, Dr. Kanter was forced to write a statement which said that he did meet with Yakov Gorodetsky, and discussed the recent trial of Roald Zelichonek, another Leningrad refusenik and now prisoner. Dr. Kanter signed the statement. He was told that he was under investigation for speculation. He was removed from detention, but was told he had to report his movements to hotel administration. Dr. Kanter terminated his trip prematurely at great personal expense because he felt he was being followed and watched.

Dr. Kanter is in great distress and there is no doubt that this tourist was used in an incident designed to manufacture evidence against Leningradian Yakov Gorodetsky. Dr. Kanter understands this, and has volunteered the following statement:

I, Dr. Nelson Kanter, affirm and declare that the statement made at the Leningrad militia station on August 10, 1985, was written and signed only as a result of the enormous pressure exerted on me by the Leningrad militia and the KGB. This statement was in no way a reflection of what Yakov Gorodetsky said in the apartment of the previous day. The information written in my notebook, which was confiscated, was not in the exact words of Mr. Gorodetsky. Those notes represented my own loose interpretation of what was said during the course of my visit with him for my own reminiscences of my travels.

It is important that we in the Congress continue to do all that we can to express our support for those who are being denied their basic human rights in the Soviet Union. I urge my colleagues to join me in protesting the Soviet Union's blatant abuses of fundamental freedoms.

TRIBUTE TO GREG SCHLOSSER

HON. ARLAN STANGELAND

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1985

Mr. STANGELAND. Mr. Speaker, today marks the beginning of a stimulating week in Washington, DC, for my constituent and handicapped intern, Greg Schlosser.

Members of my Handicapped Advisory Committee selected Greg to serve as the 1985 Handicapped Intern from Minnesota's Seventh Congressional District.

A lifelong resident of Minnesota, Greg is a recent graduate of St. Cloud State University where he received his B.S. degree in chemistry with a computer science minor. In September 1986, Greg will enter the University of Minnesota Medical School and will pursue the field of pediatric physical therapy.

In May of 1980, Greg suffered a spinal cord injury in a motorcycle accident and he is now confined to a wheelchair. Undaunted, this inspiring young man has become totally independent and extremely active in the St. Cloud and Sauk Rapids communities. He is a volunteer at the St. Cloud Hospital in occupational therapy. And most recently, he was the vice president of the MS Wheelchair Minnesota Pageant. Always a sports enthusiast, Greg has become active in a number of wheelchair sports, participating as the tournament coordinator in basketball for the Minnesota State Tournament in 1984.

This week-long internship will provide Greg with a firsthand opportunity to learn about the Federal Government, national organizations and consumer groups, and their implementation of the programs benefiting handicapped Americans. This internship profits my district through a sharing of Greg's knowledge about the Government's operation and benefits me by increasing my awareness of the needs and concerns of disabled Seventh District citizens.

Greg has an energetic and challenging week of meetings and discussions involving the Social Security Administration, Department of Health and Human Services, the National Organization on Disability and the American Coalition of Citizens with Disabilities, just to name a few. These meetings will prove invaluable in broadening the scope of this week-long internship and have long-term benefits for the handicapped constituents of my district who struggle to meet daily challenges.

With pride, I salute and welcome Greg to our Nation's Capital and to the attention of my colleagues in the Congress of the United States.

OPPOSING AMNESTY FOR ILLEGAL ALIENS

HON. C.W. (BILL) YOUNG

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1985

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Speaker, more than 30 years have passed since the enactment of our Nation's last comprehensive immigration and naturalization legislation. During this period, the swell of millions of immigrants and illegal aliens seeking shelter in the United States has placed undue strain on our Nation.

In an effort to deal with this situation, Congress has acted over the years in a piecemeal fashion to address urgent immigration concerns. The resulting patchwork of U.S. immigration laws and regulations is seriously in need of a comprehensive overhaul by this Congress.

Both the House and Senate spent a considerable amount of time in the 97th and 98th Congress considering immigration reform legislation without reaching a final agreement. An effort will be made again this year to complete the task of formulating a sound national immigration policy. To assist in that effort, I am introducing legislation today to improve upon the proposals considered by Congress in the past and resubmitted for consideration again this year.

My first measure is a resolution expressing the sense of the Congress that no amnesty be granted to illegal aliens living in the United States. After very long debate, the House narrowly defeated an amendment to immigration reform legislation last year which would have eliminated a provision granting amnesty to aliens.

The Census Bureau estimates that there are as many as 6 million illegal immigrants living in the United States. Granting general amnesty to these lawbreakers would send a signal to potential aliens that our immigration laws are made to be broken.

Amnesty also unfairly rewards those who have bypassed our immigration process, while penalizing the millions of law-abiding individuals who have followed the proper procedures, but have been denied entry for one reason or another. Many others must wait out the lengthy application process, which often takes years to complete.

The second measure I'm introducing today would correct one example of our Nation's contradictory immigration policies by prohibiting aliens living in the United States for less than 5 years from applying for and receiving Federal welfare benefits. Immigration officials have the authority, under current law, to deport aliens who become public charges within 5 years of their arrival in the United States. The officials, however, who administer the supplemental security income program are not prohibited from making SSI payments to these same aliens.

My legislation would close this loophole by prohibiting the payment of SSI benefits to aliens living in the United States for less than 5 years. The legislation also requires sponsors of aliens to assume a legal financial responsibility during the alien's first 5 years in our country. Current law requires only a moral, but not a financial, responsibility for sponsors. My legislation ensures that the sponsor, and not the American taxpayers, provide a minimum standard income for aliens.

Mr. Speaker, we are a nation of immigrants, who over the years have sought out a life in the United States where many freedoms and opportunities are available that do not exist elsewhere in the world. We have an obligation to accept a legislatively mandated number of immigrants to our Nation each year who have legally applied and followed proper procedures.

We, however, have no obligation to grant amnesty or benefits to any aliens who have come to our shores illegally. As a representative of the State of Florida, I am well aware of the burdens that have been placed upon the State, country and local governments by the influx of illegal immigrants over the years. These aliens should not be rewarded while millions of other people patiently wait many years for their time to come when they can apply for and receive permission to emigrate to our Nation. It is for these people that we must provide a fair, sensible and comprehensive immigration policy, one that I hope Congress will formulate in the coming months and that will reflect the concerns I have expressed over the years.

UNFORGETTABLE FIRE

HON. BART GORDON

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1985

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, I recently received a copy of a book called "Unforgettable Fire." A man from my hometown of Murfreesboro sent it to me on the 40th anniversary of Hiroshima. He hoped that it might help me better understand the horrors of nuclear war. He hoped that it might emphasize the need for eliminating the nuclear threat. I bring the book to your attention for the same reasons.

"Unforgettable Fire" is a collection of pictures drawn by survivors of the Hiroshima bombing. It was published in 1975, 30 years after the bombing, in an effort to keep us from forgetting this nightmare. It is one of the more moving documents I have ever encountered.

The drawings are understated renderings of an unimaginable horror. Often they are accompanied by brief, searing descriptions. I find the drawings are more disturbing than a collection of photographs because they do not represent objective reality—they record images that have been burned in the memories of the survivors.

This picture is about a rescue operation along the river bank in Sakaimachi. There were cries for help from women, children, and old people pinned under houses or crushed between pillars. The dead were sacrificed for their country. Children, wives, fathers and friends never came back. I hear phantom voices crying for help. I can not forget.

I don't believe that looking at an old man's drawing will make arms control any easier to achieve. I do believe that examining the horror of nuclear war will compel us to prevent its recurrence.

TRIBUTE TO ROBERT G. NICHOLSON

HON. GENE CHAPPIE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1985

Mr. CHAPPIE. Mr. Speaker, I'd like to bring to the attention of my colleagues in the House an individual whose dedication and service to youth deserves special recognition. His name is Bob Nicholson, and after more than 40 years as a Boy Scout leader, he is retiring from service.

Mr. Nicholson began his Scouting as a youth in Racine, WI. From out of that experience came a lifelong dedication to the Boy Scouts. Over the years, he has led Boy Scout troops and councils in Montana, Washington, Arizona, New Mexico and California, providing leadership and guidance to hundreds of young men. Since 1974, northern Californians have been especially fortunate to have Bob Nicholson as Scout executive for the Buttes Area Council in Marysville, CA.

As a former Boy Scout, I believe there is no better training for a young man than to become involved in Scouting. It instills in our young people the basic values on which this country was built.

But Boy Scouts couldn't be effective without the dedication of its leaders. That's why it is so important to recognize the contribution made by those who spend their lives helping young men.

In today's busy world, it is especially noteworthy that someone like Bob Nicholson is willing to provide that selfless dedication to enrich the lives of those around him. Through his leadership, he has helped shape and influence America's next generation of leaders. Those young men, and our country, are better for it.

I know I speak for many others when I express my gratitude and appreciation to Bob Nicholson for giving so much of his life to Scouting. His leadership will be missed.

DONALD BAXTER, NEW ROCHELLE FIRE COMMISSIONER, HONORED

HON. JOSEPH J. DioGUARDI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1985

Mr. DIOGUARDI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor Donald Baxter, who is retiring as the fire commissioner of New Rochelle Fire Department in New York. After 35 years of distinguished service, Don's presence will be sorely missed. Appointed on July 16, 1950, as a probationary firefighter, Don's excellent performance saw him quickly rise through the ranks of the department from lieutenant to captain and then deputy chief.

Not only was Don an outstanding firefighter, he was always in the forefront of bringing new methods and technology into the department to improve their lifesaving capabilities. These included the training of all personnel to handle the implementation of emergency medicine and the introduction of computers for usage in the application of fire service. Last year, not one person died in a New Rochelle fire.

Don's commitment to excellence and safety stretched to private individuals and homeowners, encouraging people to install smoke detectors in their homes. Don is also a member of the Westchester County Fire Advisory Board, the Rotary Club and the Elks Club.

It is with great pleasure that I extend my congratulations and best wishes to Don, his wife Mary, and his four children, Donna, Linda, Lawrence, and Donny. We all look forward to Don's continued success and commitment to excellence.

RECOGNIZING THE MONSOUR EDUCATION DEPARTMENT

HON. JOHN P. MURTHA

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1985

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to insert these remarks into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD honoring the Monsour Education Department.

This is a group of women who are registered nurses, several with master's degrees, plus a secretary and librarian, who are specialists in women's health, children issues, cardiac rehabilitation, and critical care.

We in Congress have closely overseen the outstanding advances made in medical care in recent years and through the efforts of the National Institutes of Health and other Government agencies have helped to promote this research. No matter how fast we can develop the answers to complex medical problems, they are only partially effective until we get the information to individuals and promote individual health care throughout the community.

This is the type of work being done by the Monsour Education Department through community teaching, over 600 in-service programs a year, and public appearances. These types of educational programs can be particularly effective in the prevention of disease and in calming the fears of citizens who face medical problems.

This vital element of the overall American health care delivery system deserves our continued support and recognition. It is my pleasure to add these congratulations to those being received by the Monsour Education Department on a special day of recognition on September 13.

AMERICAN HEART ASSOCIATION'S FOOD FESTIVAL TO EMPHASIZE GOOD DIET

HON. DOUG WALGREN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1985

Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Speaker, heart and blood vessel diseases kill more men, women, and children in this country than any other cause of death. The economic cost of cardiovascular disease will amount to an estimated $72.1 billion in 1985 alone. Scientists have demonstrated that the typical American diet—one high in cholesterol and saturated fats—contributes greatly to the risk of cardiovascular disease. To help focus public attention on this widespread problem, from September 8–14 the American Heart Association's [AHA] Food Festival will spotlight the eating patterns which can help reduce the risk of heart disease.

Most cardiovascular diseases are the result of atherosclerosis, a condition in which the lipid—fat—and cholesterol levels in the blood are higher than the body requires to maintain good health. When the body accumulates an abundance of fat and cholesterol, the excess can collect in the walls of the arteries, forming deposits called "plaque." If the accumulation of plaque is allowed to progress over the years, an artery can become completely clogged with fats, cholesterol, and other debris. If the artery supplies the heart, the result can be heart attack; if it supplies the brain, the result can be a stroke.

The United States has one of the highest rates of cardiovascular disease in the world. The American diet is so rich in saturated or animal fats, that even children show evidence of high blood cholesterol levels. By middle years, most Americans have accumulated plaque in their arteries, making them candidates for heart and blood vessel diseases.

Medical scientists tell us that lowering the level of cholesterol and saturated fats in the diet can reduce one of the risks of coronary disease. The American Heart Association, in conjunction with several national supermarket chains, will work together during Food Festival Week to encourage consumers to purchase nutritional foods and to become aware of eating habits which can help prevent heart disease. According to the AHA, by limiting cholesterol consumption to less than 300 milligrams per day and fat intake to less than 30 percent of daily calories, otherwise healthy men, women, and children over 2 years old can control blood cholesterol levels and reduce the risk of heart attack and stroke.

American Heart's Food Festival spotlights the value of good nutrition and dietary control of cholesterol and saturated fat. The Food Festival's focus on nutrition lets the public know that participating local food retailers and the American Heart Association care about their well-being.

CHAMINADE COLLEGE PREPARATORY CELEBRATES 75TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. RICHARD A. GEPHARDT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1985

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, September 7 is a very important day in the hearts and minds of many young men who attend Chaminade Preparatory School in Creve Coeur, MO. The school is celebrating its 75th anniversary with various celebrations.

Chaminade has served many young men in the crucial growth years of high school. The school is unique among others in that it is the only day and residential school in the St. Louis area.

Not only is this anniversary special to the young men now attending Chaminade—but also to the many alumni who have left its hallowed halls since 1910.

Mr. Speaker, I commend Chaminade College Preparatory for the quality academic and religious guidance it has shown the St. Louis area for the past 75 years and, on this occasion, wish future success.

MSGR. JOSEPH R. PANNONI ENTERS 60TH YEAR OF PRIESTHOOD

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1985

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, we can all learn from the example of dedicated and responsible community leaders. Therefore, it gives me pleasure to bring to the attention of the House the inspiring role that Joseph R. Pannoni has played in the city of Fall River, MA, on the occasion of his 60th year in the priesthood. For 60 years, Joseph Pannoni has given generously of his talents as a priest, as a friend of the members of the Holy Rosary Parish, and through his example, to the entire community of Fall River.

Joseph Pannoni's service is especially noteworthy because he is the first priest of Italian descent ordained for the Diocese of Fall River to be elevated to the rank of monsignor.

Mr. Speaker, all the residents of Fall River, MA, deserve to feel honored by the contribution that Msgr. Joseph R. Pannoni has made for 60 years to his parish, to the Diocese of Fall River, and to the community. As his friends and colleagues gather to wish him well, I join to commend him for his exemplary service.

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of the meetings, when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in the meetings as they occur.

As an additional procedure along with the computerization of this information, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committee scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

Meetings scheduled for Tuesday, September 10, 1985, may be found in the Daily Digest of today's RECORD.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Tuesday, September 10, 1985

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Reverend William Feickert, St. James Lutheran Church and St. Peter Lutheran Church, Tuscarawas, OH, offered the following prayer:

Shalom, shalaam, pax and peace.

Almighty God, source of true wisdom and peace: We invoke Your blessings upon the U.S. House of Representatives assembled to deliberate upon those things which would make for the maintenance, well-being and extension of justice in our land and around the world; and as You have promised to send Your Spirit to lead people into truth, so rule the hearts and guide the counsels of the representatives of our country, that protected from the errors of human weakness, they may seek only the well-being, justice, strength, and peace which comes from caring for Your people and creation. Bless and guide the people, the President, Vice President, the Speaker of the House, legislators, magistrates, executives, service men and women and chaplains.

Bless America with peace, strength, justice, and tranquility. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

REV. WILLIAM F. FEICKERT

(Mr. APPLEGATE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. APPLEGATE. Mr. Speaker, the House has been honored today with the opening prayer by Rev. William F. Feickert, pastor of St. James Lutheran Church in Tuscarawas and St. Peter Lutheran Church in New Philadelphia, both in Ohio. And a friend of mine.

Reverend Feickert is joined here today by his lovely wife, Dorothy, his family, and members of his congregations, and other friends.

Throughout his distinguished service in Tuscarawas County, Reverend Feickert has contributed immensely to the betterment of his community. The special dedication and spiritual devotion that Reverend Feickert brings to the major tasks which confront him everyday goes beyond the norm. His experience of over two decades in service to our Heavenly Father has been especially rewarding—to the Reverend as well as his family and friends. But, most of all, those who come to him during their times of need have come to realize the greatest reward of all.

I would also like to add Reverend Feickert's spiritual commitment and outstanding service to America's veterans. Mr. Speaker, it is an honor to have Reverend Feickert as our guest chaplain today. May we always recall the inspiration that he has given us on this special day.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION WAIVING CERTAIN POINTS OF ORDER AGAINST CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 3244, DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORTATION AND RELATED AGENCIES APPROPRIATIONS, FISCAL YEAR 1986

Mr. MOAKLEY, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a privileged report (Rept. 99-259) on the resolution (H. Res. 261) waiving certain points of order against consideration of the bill (H.R. 3244) making appropriations for the Department of Transportation and related agencies for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, and for other purposes, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION OF INQUIRY CONCERNING AMERICAN PRISONERS OF WAR IN SOUTHEAST ASIA

Mr. HAMILTON, from the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, submitted a privileged report (Rept. No. 99-260, part I) on the resolution (H. Res. 226) directing the Secretary of Defense to furnish certain information to the House of Representatives relating to American prisoners of war in Southeast Asia, which was ordered to be printed.

DEMOCRATS SHOULD BUY AMERICAN

(Mr. HYDE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, yesterday while President Reagan was announcing economic sanctions against South Africa, the Democrats were frolicking at the Speaker's Golf Tournament. The golfers were given a terry-cloth souvenir hat which says on the outside "Speaker's Tournament" and the initials "Democratic National Committee," but on the inside the label says "Made in the Republic of South Africa."

Mr. Speaker, it will not do much good for Republicans to condemn apartheid if the Democrats are going to keep boosting South Africa's economy. With our textile industry in such trouble, I hope next time the Democrats will buy American.

MANDATORY MEDICARE/SOCIAL SECURITY

(Mr. REID asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. REID. Mr. Speaker, part of the American dream for each of us has been the knowledge that we will have the resources to take care of ourselves throughout our lives.

A good example of how this has been accomplished is in my own State of Nevada, where State and local employees have contributed to a retirement system that will provide such security during the postretirement years.

Because of the overwhelming success of this system, I am strongly opposed to any congressional attempts to make Social Security and Medicare coverage for State and local employees, including teachers, mandatory.

Such a requirement would be inequitable, especially where a State's retirement system already meets the needs of the people.

I am, of course, referring to possible revenue-generating legislation now being considered by Congress to reduce the deficit, at the expense of Government workers nationwide, those workers who already are contributing their fair share to solvent retirement systems.

We're all concerned about solutions to balance the Federal budget, but I oppose action that loads such horrendous financial burdens on States like Nevada that have done an outstanding job of maintaining their own financial integrity.

DEFENSE AUTHORIZATION CONFERENCE REPORT

(Mr. MICHEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, there is apparently no business pending before the House today. We should be taking up the Defense authorization conference report. Some Members on your side are attempting to stall the bill in order to take a few more pot shots at it.

There will be a dangerous precedent set if a separate vote is demanded on this issue.

Do you think it's going to stop there seriously? Do you think the other body won't start playing little tricks like this every time the majority doesn't get its way in conference?

If we are going to open this up to a separate vote, why stop there? Why not do the same thing on the budget process?

Why not take separate votes on all issues about which certain Members feel strongly?

This could be the first crack in the dam. It could eventually lead to a deluge of separate votes.

Is this what we want to see? I think not.

We debated the Defense authorization bill. We voted. It was all fair and square. If we change the game rules here then they will surely be changed for other conference reports, here and in the other body.

Mr. Speaker, I submit it is a bad precedent and we ought not to take that route.

ONE MORE YEAR OF BUSINESS AS USUAL ON HAZARDOUS WASTE CONTROL?

(Mr. ECKART of Ohio asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ECKART of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, this year the 30th of September means much more than just the end of another fiscal year. It may also mean the end for one of the Nation's foremost environmental protection programs, the Superfund Program for cleaning up our Nation's hazardous wastes.

H.R. 2817, the $10 billion bipartisan bill that Congressman LENT and I introduced earlier this summer, and which has already cleared the House Committee on Energy and Commerce, would do much to alleviate the problems that the beleaguered program has experienced, but there are those who would use the September 30 deadline to offer a simple 1-year extension of the program. Nothing could be more dangerous or more hazardous to America's health than 1 year more as business as usual, 1 year more of delays, loss of funds, regulatory laxitives, lack of schedules, new incentives and development for permanent cleanup technologies, lack of delay of cleaning up Federal facilities, and the continued problems with leaking underground storage tanks.

Mr. Speaker, we need our $10 billion, 5-year reauthorization. Playing short-term politics with the health of millions of Americans is not in the Nation's interest.

A PROPOSED TOTAL 15-PERCENT CUT IN AMTRAK FUNDING

(Mr. COATS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. COATS. Mr. Speaker, on August 1, just before we left for our August recess, we adopted the conference report on the budget by a pretty substantial bipartisan vote. Some people said that this was just a hollow promise, that it is a sham, and that when the actual appropriations come up, we will not even adhere to that.

We have two chances in the next few days to prove our cynics wrong, and I hope we do. Despite the fact that the budget conference report calls for a 15-percent reduction in the Amtrak funding level, both the Amtrak authorization bill and the Department of Transportation appropriations bill provide only a 10-percent cut in Amtrak funding.

It is clear, through our hearings and discussions and debate over this matter in the Committee on Energy and Commerce, that Amtrak can survive as an efficient and effective national railroad system with an extra 5-percent cut, and I intend to offer an amendment or amendments to both of those bills before us to bring this level to 15 percent.

Mr. Speaker, I hope our colleagues on both sides of the aisle will support this effort to demonstrate that all those things we said about the budget are not just hollow promises. What little credibility we have left with the American people will be lost if we cannot find an additional 5-percent funding cut for Amtrak.

OPPOSING USE OF TAX-DEDUCTIBLE FUNDS FOR PROVIDING MILITARY AID TO CONTRAS

(Mr. LUKEN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LUKEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to give warning to my colleagues as to American taxpayer subsidies to the Contra military forces in Nicaragua. Some private citizens in this country are making war in Central America, and doing it with tax-deductible funds.

One of these groups, the U.S. Council for World Freedom, in gaining tax exemption from the IRS, promised not to provide "materiel or funds to any revolutionary or counterrevolutionary group," and yet sent helicopters and riverboats to the Contras. The council's director, Maj. Gen. John K. Singlaub, admits to using his international contacts to channel lethal aid to the Contras. Another group, the Nicaraguan Refugee Fund, held a fundraising dinner, which netted over $200,000. Of this sum, only $3,000 went to aid refugees, while over $115,000 went for "consulting fees."

We have voted several times against providing military aid to the Contras, and yet several private organizations have been funneling supplies to the Contras, despite their promises to the IRS not to do so.

Twenty-six of our colleagues and I recently wrote to the Commissioner of the IRS, Roscoe Egger, suggesting that the IRS review the tax status of these organizations.

I urge your support of this much needed review. These organizations are not to aid the Contras militarily. They should not circumvent the law.

DEFICIT WATCH

(Mr. PORTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, none of us in this Chamber should wonder why we have $200 billion budget deficits, year after year. Some call the budget uncontrollable. It's no such thing. We in the Congress just refuse to control it.

Let me offer a perfect example. Chemical weapons. Immediately after the House passed its $56 billion deficit-reduction package last spring, we voted on chemical weapons. Here we were, faced with an up-or-down vote on a weapons system we don't really need—a weapons system whose purchase could easily be deferred—a weapons system whose ultimate price tag could reach $20 billion.

How did the Congress vote? To spend the money. Three-quarters of the freshman Members voted that way, and they made the difference. I'll bet many had campaigned as fiscal conservatives, promising to cut the deficit once they came to Washington. But, when the chips were down, they voted to spend.

The House will have a second chance to vote on chemical weapons soon. I'll be interested in seeing what happens this time. So will the American people.

SOUTH AFRICAN SANCTIONS

(Mr. RODINO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, on the question of South Africa, we must ask how much is enough. Yesterday, the President took some steps in the right direction by imposing sanctions against the apartheid government of Pretoria. But considering the magnitude of injustice in South Africa, the administration's action is too tentative and too grudging—it is simply not enough.

Policy as important as our South Africa policy cannot be conducted on the level of rhetoric and symbolism. It must have the force of law—which is why I supported the sanctions bill that we passed with overwhelming bipartisan support. Unlike the administration's action, this bill gives hope to the forces of moderation and nonviolence in South Africa—at the same time it eliminates our Nation's complicity with the abhorrent system of apartheid.

Americans are a proud people because we believe that our Nation stands for right over wrong. We know that racism is wrong. We know that apartheid is wrong. And we know that constructive engagement with a government that practices racism and apartheid is wrong. Let us not soft pedal our Nation's policy. Let us send a united message to the world and to the people of South Africa that the American people stand for what's right—that we stand for justice and an end to apartheid.

INVOKING A TEMPORARY IMPORT SURCHARGE TO ADDRESS TRADE IMBALANCE PROBLEMS

(Mr. CLINGER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. CLINGER. Mr. Speaker, although we returned to work last week, the thoughts and comments of our constituents are still fresh in our minds. During my travels through the 23d District of Pennsylvania, I talked with a lot of folks who had one question on their minds—what are we in Congress going to do about the trade deficit, and more importantly the resultant loss of jobs?

It is increasingly apparent that Congress may take some severe measures if the administration fails to devise a proposal which deals with our trade difficulties. I am also in favor of taking prompt action, as long as it is responsible and reasonable in its approach, and does not contribute to the initiation of a trade war with our partners. Still, our American companies and workers need relief, and the time has come to act.

Last month, I wrote to the President asking him to invoke section 122 of the Trade Act of 1974. This would allow him to impose an import surcharge of up to 15 percent, in the form of duties, on articles imported into the United States. It would not last longer than 150 days without congressional approval and could be targeted to specific countries and imported articles.

Mr. Speaker, with our annual trade deficit approaching $160 million, it is clear that Congress and/or the administration will do something, and soon, in the area of trade. Of course, a temporary and minimal import surcharge would not, by itself, solve all our trade problems. But it could be an intermediate step to show our determination to address our problems, while not committing us to long-term approaches that gamble our future economic well-being.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC., August 2, 1985.

Hon. RONALD REAGAN,
President of the United States,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I am writing to you to ask that you consider responding to our persistent trade difficulties with Japan by invoking Section 122 of the Trade Act of 1974.

As you know, Section 122 provides you with temporary authority to impose an import surcharge of up to 15% ad valorem, in the form of duties, on articles imported into the United States. This authority, not to exceed 150 days without Congressional approval, can be invoked "to deal with large and serious U.S. balance-of-payments deficits", and can be targeted to specific countries and to specific imported articles.

As you are aware, with our 1985 trade deficit expected to reach a record $160 billion, protectionist sentiments in Congress and around the nation have grown to incredible proportions. These have particularly focused upon Japan, which is likely to have a 1985 merchandise surplus of almost $50 billion with the U.S. This imbalance has affected and will continue to affect virtually every region of our country and every sector of our economy.

Let me point out, Mr. President, that clear precedent exists for the use of an import surcharge. As noted in the Senate Finance Committee report accompanying the 1974 Trade Act: "the use of surcharges for balance-of-payments purposes has gained de facto acceptance in GATT. Major industrialized countries which have resorted to surcharges include France in 1955, Canada in 1962, the United Kingdom in 1968, and Denmark and the United States in 1971."

It is my belief, Mr. President, that invoking Section 122, targeted specifically against Japan, would effectively emphasize our concerns regarding the bilateral trade relationship. At this time of enormous federal budget deficits and an overvalued dollar, it would also add much needed revenue to the Treasury, decrease U.S. demand for Japanese goods by readjusting the undervalued yen, improve the balance of U.S. exports to Japanese imports, and give the U.S. additional leverage in encouraging Japan to allow U.S. exports greater access to Japanese markets, thereby preserving and creating American jobs.

Moreover, Section 122 can specifically target Japan, minimizing the potential for friction with GATT members. In addition, Section 122 allows the exclusion of those imports that meet the special needs of the U.S. economy, can be rapidly instituted or rescinded by Executive Order, and would be limited to only 150 days unless extended by a specific act of Congress.

I would also argue that the use of Section 122 authority as a trade policy option is vastly superior to the numerous proposals currently before Congress. The Gephardt-Bentsen-Rostenkowski 25% import surcharge proposal (H.R. 3035, S. 1449), to take one example, is far less flexible than Section 122. It would remain in force until 1991, it could not be targeted to specific countries, it does not allow the exclusion of certain imports, and its surcharge level is probably too high for price increases to be readily absorbed by the exporting nations.

Mr. President, I share your belief in a free market system, and appreciate your efforts to balance the many elements of our trade and economic policies. But free trade can not be a unilateral U.S. policy. Japan does not practice free trade, and until our trade difficulties are resolved we need to adopt policies that encourage a speedy and equitable resolution of these difficulties. Section 122 authority will help us accomplish this goal, and I strongly urge you to invoke its provisions.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM F. CLINGER, Jr.,
Member of Congress.

THE UNITED STATES
TRADE REPRESENTATIVE,
Washington, DC., August 23, 1985.

Hon. WILLIAM F. CLINGER, Jr.,
U.S. House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BILL: I have been asked to reply to your letter of August 1 to the President concerning the problem of the U.S. trade deficit and the potential use of Section 122 of the 1979 Trade Act to impose a temporary surcharge on imports.

I think that we are in agreement that we have several major problems on the trade front. One of the primary problems is the very large federal budget deficit which the President and many in Congress wish to see reduced substantially. As you note, we also have experienced a strong dollar, which impedes our exports and encourages U.S. imports. This has resulted from the inflow of foreign capital to partially finance our federal deficit and economic growth. Further, we have had poor growth in our major export markets, with a severe debt crisis in many developing countries which has cut our exports. Finally, and very importantly, in some major markets, such as Japan, we face barriers to our exports of goods and services and distortions to flows of direct investment.

Our trade deficit reflects the cumulative effect of these problems. But is a temporary surcharge the answer? Wouldn't a surcharge detract from the attention needed to continue our efforts to reduce federal spending and deficits? At the end of the "temporary" period of the surcharge, wouldn't we be back where we are now?

Japan accounts for less than a third of our world trade deficit. Therefore, to substantively reduce the trade deficit, we would have to impose a surcharge much more generally than only on Japanese products. However, most of our trade partners would retaliate against our exports, since they do not believe that they should pay the price of our excessive budget expenditures and a strong dollar.

To make the maximum contribution to reducing our trade deficit, we have to work hard to reduce our federal expenditures in order to bring them more in line with our revenues. We also have to vigorously pursue our national trade interests. Instead of a broad or selective surcharge, I believe that, should our trade partners not play the game fairly, we must employ specific actions to gain leverage to achieve more open markets.

I hope that you will continue to work on the trade issue. It is one of the most important national economic issues that we have to address. I also hope that you will continue to express your thoughts and recommendations to the President and me.

Sincerely,

CLAYTON YEUTTER.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, September 9, 1985.

Hon. CLAYTON YEUTTER,
U.S. Trade Representative,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. AMBASSADOR: Thank you for your response to my recent letter to the President regarding Section 122 of the Trade Act of 1974. I appreciated your comments and agree with much of what you said.

In particular, I agree that the budget deficit is an important factor in our trade problem. I was hopeful that we would do more on this, and was disappointed that we chose a policy that delays the tough decisions until next year.

Yet, having said this, I must also say that I don't think that the solution to our trade deficit can wait until we solve our budget problem. Several countries, most notably Japan, have domestic policies which in some way discriminate toward our exports. These need to be dealt with, regardless of any action we take on the budget. Moreover, I'm not convinced that a lower budget deficit and a resulting lower dollar can occur soon enough to enable U.S. industries to rapidly recapture the foreign and domestic markets which have been lost in recent years due to both macro and microeconomic problems.

I also agree that the imposition of Section 122 is not a substitute for a long-term trade policy which is well-reasoned and part of an overall U.S. approach to economic policy. However, Section 122 would serve several purposes. First, it could serve as an alternative to many of the other trade proposals currently gaining momentum in Congress. The surcharge doesn't have to be 15%, it could be 10% or even 5%, and it doesn't have to last a full 150 days and could be targeted to specific countries and products. Second, it would send an appropriate signal to those countries, particularly Japan, that believe we will continue to maintain the unacceptable status quo in our trade policy (I know you agree we need a trade policy that goes beyond mere "nagging"). Third, it would give the Administration and Congress more time to prepare a comprehensive trade policy to deal with our trade partners in the future. Fourth, it could provide short-term relief to those industries and individuals feeling the pinch from the surge in imports.

Like yourself, I do believe that we should work to avoid a trade war. In my opinion, it would certainly be disastrous for all concerned. However, it is also my belief that we can best avoid retaliation by our trading partners by looking at measures which are short-term in nature and less severe than those such as a 25% long-term import surcharge.

I agree that a temporary surcharge is not the entire answer to this very complex problem; however, until our trading partners realize that the United States will not continue to allow the kind of unfair trading practices that have contributed to our $150 billion 1985 trade deficit, I believe that stronger steps are necessary.

I would be happy to meet with you at the appropriate time to discuss this matter in greater detail. Thank you again for your letter.

Sincerely,

BILL CLINGER,
Member of Congress.

THE HOUSE WEDNESDAY GROUP,
Washington, DC, September 4, 1985.

Letters to the EDITOR
New York Times,
New York, New York 10036

DEAR SIR: The Times has correctly identified the need to offer an "alternative to workers displaced by imports" ("Pay $68,000, Save a Shoemaker"—August 27), rather than answering the call for protectionism ringing through the halls of Congress.

One way to address this problem would be for Congress to pass a retraining proposal recently introduced by Representatives Bill Clinger (R-PA) and Nancy Johnson (R-CT)—The National Training Incentives Act of 1985, H.R. 1219. This legislation, backed by cosponsors ranging from conservative Republicans to members of the Black Caucus, has several significant provisions which would help to retool U.S. workers.

First, it would provide a 25% tax credit for training expenses in excess of a 5-year historical average, thereby rewarding the type of retraining, on-the-job training, which labor and business agree is the most effective. Structured like the R&D tax credit, this provision will only be used if business decides it needs to spend more on retraining and will generate $4 in private-sector financed retraining for every dollar lost in federal revenues.

This approach is particularly important when considering the bias which now exists in the tax code between incentives for R&D and plant and equipment and for worker retraining. For example, in FY 1986, tax incentives for R&D and plant and equipment totaled $79.2 billion, while incentives for worker retraining came to a paltry $25 million. This represents a ratio of over 300 to 1. This is even more appalling when you consider that in recent years the contribution of education and training to total productivity growth is about one-half.

Another component of the Clinger-Johnson proposal would permit workers to finance retraining with money withdrawn, without penalty or taxation, from their IRAs or annuity accounts. This would allow roughly 13 million working class households to take advantage of an already established network of retirement financing.

Although some might argue that the IRA was designed exclusively with retirement in mind, it is interesting to note that a similar retirement vehicle, the 401(k) Deferred Compensation Plans, does not have the inflexibility of the IRA, but instead allows for early withdrawal for a variety of purposes, including but not limited to the payment of college tuition, purchasing a home, or even the coverage of unreimbursed medical costs, depending upon the particular plan.

A third provision of this important legislation removes a significant disincentive to retraining by allowing any displaced worker who is otherwise eligible for unemployment compensation to collect unemployment assistance while participating in a training program. Unfortunately, at present only 13 states allow a worker in a retraining program to receive unemployment compensation. This must change. We do not need a system which mandates that people wait until their unemployment has run out before they can develop a new skill.

Our nation needs to pursue a more vigorous employment policy so that America's workforce will not lag behind with outmoded skills while technology moves forward. While others advocate the use of protectionist measures to keep jobs in this country, we believe an alternative such as H.R. 1219 is a positive and far-sighted proposal which comes to grips with changes in the world economy. As the Times correctly observes, "policymakers who want growth must do more than nobly pledge allegiance to free trade." The Clinger-Johnson proposal is just such an effort.

Sincerely,

STEVEN HOFMAN,
Executive Director.

PRESIDENT'S EXECUTIVE ORDER ON SOUTH AFRICA FALLS SHORT OF CONGRESSIONAL GOALS

(Mr. WOLPE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, by continuing to resist the congressional sanctions legislation and by offering his own far weaker version of sanctions in his Executive order, President Reagan continues to fail to take advantage of an opportunity he now has to both embrace and strengthen the extraordinary bipartisan concensus that exists, within this Congress and across this land of ours that we must make a very direct break with the policies of constructive engagement.

In South Africa itself, the President's Executive order will be understood essentially as a means of trying to resist stronger sanctions. It thereby encourages the Afrikaners, the white minority regime, in their belief that they can in fact hold on indefinitely, that the current American interest in South Africa is only a passing fancy, and that they can maintain their horrendous system of apartheid without real economic cost and without any significant degree of international isolation. The President's executive order is temporizing. His constant remarks by way of an apology for South Africa are only encouraging greater repression, inviting greater violence, and terribly compromising American interests not only in South Africa but throughout the African Continent.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the President to abide by the consensus that exists in this Congress to give his support to the congressional sanctions legislation.

SUPERFUND REAUTHORIZATION—WE MUST ACT NOW

(Mr. LENT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, on September 30, 1985, Superfund, the most important environmental law enacted in this decade, is scheduled to expire. We must not allow this to happen. Congress must act immediately to reauthorize and strengthen this vital program governing the cleanup of our Nation's hazardous waste sites.

Superfund is a complex law, involving serious and controversial issues. Some would avoid confronting these issues by enacting a simple 1-year extension of the legislation. That kind of nonaction would have disastrous consequences for the Superfund Program and for the environmental health of this Nation.

The Environmental Protection Agency has planned to spend $900 million for the cleanup effort in fiscal year 1986. A 1-year extension at current funding levels would slash that obligation by fully two-thirds, to $300 million. EPA would be forced to slam on the brakes, stopping a critical program which is finally gaining momentum. I have a list of 67 hazardous waste sites at which EPA has already slowed or delayed cleanup pending the extension and expansion of this program. I am submitting the list of sites for the RECORD.

Mr. Speaker, if we fail to enact a comprehensive reauthorization of Superfund, we will have failed the citizens who look to us to protect their health. I urge my colleagues to join me in working for immediate House action on a comprehensive Superfund reauthorization bill.

THE "YUGO"—A PRODUCT OF SLAVE LABOR

(Ms. KAPTUR asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, when President Reagan lifted the voluntary auto import restrictions last March, he opened the floodgates for foreign cars entering our shores. Now, there is yet another new entry in the race to capture our American market. It is called the Yugo. It is built in Yugoslavia. Ringing in at $3,990, it is being purchased sight unseen in many parts of the country. The low price sounds magnificent, but let's consider why. The workplace in Communist Yugoslavia is a far cry from what it is here in America. How can our workers possibly compete with Yugoslavian workers who have no rights and work for 60 cents an hour? Slave labor. And because Yugoslavia is a Communist country, its companies can afford to build this car at a loss just to steal more of our domestic market. A very clever subversion of our economic system, isn't it.

There is no question that there is room for improvement in the American auto industry. It must modernize, improve quality, and expand productivity. But what this trade issue really comes down to is fairness and a decent standard of living for families across America. The flow of foreign goods on our markets, like the Yugo, may look good to some shortsighted consumers. But when imports rob jobs, America suffers. Our standard of living is second to none. It depends on workers working and plants producing. Our Nation's trade policy must reflect this reality. As President Lincoln said, if this country ever falls, it will fall not from without, but from within.

PAY RAISES FOR GPO EMPLOYEES

(Mr. MONSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. MONSON. Mr. Speaker, while holding town meetings in my district in Utah during the August recess, I learned that the problem of greatest concern to my constituents is still the ever growing Federal deficit. We here in Congress debate that issue regularly. Yet, despite our talk about reducing the deficit and cutting the budget, many situations exist which are defeating our efforts.

As a founding member of the Grace Commission caucus, I have been concerned for some time now that so much of taxpayers' money is going to support unnecessary Federal spending each year. One classic case is the Government Printing Office which employs 2,300 Federal employees. These workers have long been among the highest paid in their profession, in or out of Government. In fact, some are being paid up to almost $18,000 a year more than people with similar jobs in the Government.

Yet, the Joint Committee of Printing recently granted permission for the GPO to receive generous 15 percent cost-of-living pay hikes over the next 3 years for all GPO craft workers. If we continue to allow this kind of unnecessary generosity, we will never gain control over Government spending and our ever-increasing Federal deficit.

Mr. Speaker, I include an article by Donald Lambro with my remarks in the RECORD to further explain this example of wasteful spending:

[From Human Events, July 20, 1985]

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE PAY RAISES SOAK TAXPAYERS

(By Donald Lambro)

REAGAN APPOINTEE IGNORES BUDGET DEFICITS

Let's say you're the head of a large corporate subsidiary and your parent company's running a $200-billion annual deficit. The interest payments alone on your debts are costing you $130 billion a year. The board of directors has voted to slash spending next year by $56 billion to bring the firm's fiscal crisis under control, but it remains deeply split about where to cut.

Meanwhile, your workers are demanding a pay raise (these workers don't care if the company's plunging into debt) and you've got to decide whether your company can afford to give it to them. What do you do?

That's the real-life situation that faced Ralph E. Kennickell Jr., head of the $600-million Government Printing Office, whose 2,300 printers, bookbinders and production workers have long been among the highest paid in their profession, in or out of the government.

Congress' investigating arm, the General Accounting Office, discovered in 1983 that GPO workers were being paid from $3,222 to $17,879 more than workers performing similar jobs elsewhere in the government.

Yet Kennickell's incredible decision was to offer GPO's craft workers a generous cost-of-living raise of up to 15 percent during the next three years and to cut their workweek from 40 hours to 37-and-a-half hours.

In making the wage-hike offer, Kennickell was thumbing his nose at the Administration's efforts to cut the budget as well as the budget-cutting mood in Congress. Faced with another record-shattering $200-billion-plus deficit next year, both the House and Senate budget bills called for freezing federal pay where it is.

However, Kennickell, seemingly oblivious to all this, volunteered the pay hike without any real effort to engage in tough negotiations with his printers. "He just handed it to them on a silver platter," said one well-placed GPO official.

But before the wage hike could take effect, it had to be approved by GPO's lord and master, Congress' Joint Committee on Printing—which, in the past, has been notoriously generous to the printer unions that represent GPO's craft workers. Notably, the chairman of the committee is Maryland Sen. Charles Mathias. Many GPO employes live in his state, and their unions have enthusiastically supported his reelection campaigns.

Thus, despite a budgetary crisis of historic proportions, when the Joint Committee on Printing met on June 13, it merrily voted, by 6 to 2, to ratify Kennickell's costly give-away to GPO's printers—leaving taxpayers to foot the bill.

The big spenders who irresponsibly agreed to the pay raise were Senators Mathias, Mark Hatfield (R.-Ore.) and Wendell Ford (D.-Ky.); plus Representatives Joseph Gaydos (D.-Pa), Ed Jones (D.-Tenn.) and Frank Annunzio (D.-Ill.).

Only two lawmakers on the committee opposed the pay raise: Representatives Robert E. Badham (R.-Calif.) and Pat Roberts (R.-Kan.).

Under the wage package that the committee rubber-stamped, GPO craft workers will receive a whopping 4.6 percent pay raise this year and up to a 5 percent raise—depending upon the cost-of-living index—in each of the succeeding two years.

"These lucrative benefits," Rep. Roberts told me, "fly in the face of every taxpayer willing to sacrifice in an effort to reduce the deficit."

Why would Kennickell—whose patron is Georgia's Mack Mattingly, one of the Senate's staunchest foes of excessive federal spending—push for this pay raise? Many believed that by supporting the raise for GPO workers, he hoped to improve his weakened chances in the Senate Rules Committee, which has been stubbornly sitting on his embattled nomination since last year.

At this writing, the Rules Committee panel, also chaired by Mathias, was expected to vote soon on Kennickell's nomination. That nomination had been snared in a controversy over Kennickell's financial-disclosure form, in which he reported earning about $20,000 more in 1981 than he actually did earn. He attributed the error to "carelessness."

However, whichever way that vote turns out, Kennickell and Congress' Joint Committee on Printing already have done irreparable damage to the efforts to halt the spending spiral at GPO.

The fact that Kennickell, a Reagan appointee from Georgia, could make such an offer reveals why some of the President's most conservative allies in Congress have been suspicious of Kennickell ever since the White House picked him to succeed GPO Public Printer Danford Sawyer last year.

THE LAW ENFORCEMENT OFFICERS PROTECTION ACT OF 1985

(Mr. HUGHES asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, this morning the Committee on the Judiciary, by a unanimous voice vote, favorably reported the bill, H.R. 3132, the Law Enforcement Officers Protection Act of 1985.

One of the major new dangers that our Nation's police officers face on patrol or in investigation, is that the criminals are arming themselves with "cop-killer bullets," ammunition specially designed to penetrate their protective armor.

This bill reflects more than 3 years of work on this problem by the Subcommittee on Crime and the Administration. The result is a balanced, workable bill that will provide law enforcement officers with protection from armor piercing ammunition. I want to commend our distinguished colleague from New York, MARIO BIAGGI, for his tireless efforts in helping us to overcome the obstacles that this bill has faced.

The ammunition covered is carefully and narrowly defined, and has no sporting purpose. The bill would prohibit the manufacture and importation of this ammunition except for limited purposes.

The only issue about which there is any disagreement is controlling the sale of this ammunition. The administration's experts concede that it is quite possible that several million rounds of this ammunition could be available on gun dealers' shelves. It is this ammunition that now poses the greatest danger to our Nation's police officers. This bill prevents its sale to the general public by licensed dealers.

This bill will give our Nation's police officers an urgently needed margin of safety. Passage of this legislation must be our highest priority. We must not be blinded by the smokescreen of the National Rifle Association which says that this measure takes away from the Nation's sportsmen.

This ammunition cannot be controlled if it is primarily intended to be used for a sporting purpose. Nothing is taken away from sportsmen.

I urge the House to support prompt passage of this bill to protect the Nation's law enforcement officers.

AMERICAN BUSINESS WOMEN'S DAY

(Mr. SHAW asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill which requests the President to designate September 22, 1986, as "American Business Women's Day."

This day would mark the importance of American business women to the whole Nation. This day is supported by the American Business Women's Association which actively promotes professional and educational advancement for women. ABWA has more than 110,000 members and 2,100 chapters.

This organization awards scholarships to women not only entering college, university, or vocational training programs, but also to women who need to refresh job skills before reentering the work force and to women who need certain courses in order to qualify for promotion and career advancement. Since 1949, ABWA has awarded more than $18 million in scholarships. Just last year, ABWA awarded $2.9 million to over 5,700 women.

The ABWA deserves a hearty congratulation for their work in behalf of an important group, the American business woman.

Mr. Sanders, I invite you and our colleagues to join me in celebrating American Business Women's Day on September 22, 1986.

PRESIDENT MISSES OPPORTUNITY FOR PEACEFUL SOLUTION IN SOUTH AFRICA

(Mr. WEISS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, President Reagan has missed a tremendous opportunity to assist moderate whites and black leaders such as Bishop Desmond Tutu in moving toward a peaceful end to apartheid in South Africa.

The President has derailed the bipartisan legislation containing economic sanctions against the government in Pretoria, which passed the House by a vote of 380 to 48, and in an earlier version, the Senate, by a vote of 80 to 12.

The President's Executive order invoking sanctions against South Africa should be seen for what it is: an invidious political tactic. The sanctions moving through Congress were a sincere effort to alleviate the suffering of millions of black South Africans under the yoke of apartheid. It is disturbing in the extreme for the President to reduce this effort to a mere political maneuver designed: First, to head off a confrontation with Congress; and second, as the New York Times put it, "above all to protect South Africa from significant harm."

Mr. Speaker, the people of the United States and the people of South Africa both deserve better.

A FEW THINGS THAT HAPPENED WHILE CONGRESS WAS OUT OF TOWN: SEVEN AMERICANS REMAIN HOSTAGES IN LEBANON

(Mr. O'BRIEN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, a few things happened while Congress was out of town concerning the seven Americans held hostage in Lebanon.

I had the privilege of meeting with President Assad of Syria, Vice President Khaddam and Foreign Minister Shara in Damascus in mid-August on behalf of my constituent Father Lawrence Jenco and the six other Americans held hostage in Lebanon, as well as the 4 Frenchmen. I was most graciously received by President Assad and his Government. Our talks were frank and open. I sincerely hope that these efforts may encourage a renewed search to locate and effect the release of the American and French hostages.

NBC reported Sunday that the wives of two Frenchmen kidnaped in Beirut have received letters from their husbands.

A Kuwaiti Embassy employee kidnaped in Beirut on July 11 was released unharmed at midnight August 12, after 33 days of captivity.

Mr. Speaker, today marks the 246th day of captivity for Father Lawrence Jenco, a Servite priest from Joliet, IL, and a personal friend.

William Buckley, a U.S. Foreign Service officer has been held hostage 543 days today.

Today marks the 490th day of captivity for Rev. Benjamin Weir, a Presbyterian minister Terry Anderson, the Associated Press bureau chief in Beirut, was kidnaped 178 days ago.

Today is the 105th day of captivity for David Jacobsen, the director of the American University Hospital, Beirut.

Thomas Sutherland, dean of the agriculture school at the American University, has been held for 92 days.

Today also marks the 280th day since the disappearance of Peter Kilburn, the American University librarian.

Mr. Speaker, the hostage crisis in Lebanon continues.

EXECUTIVE ORDER ON APARTHEID NOT ENOUGH

(Mr. FASCELL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, it is somewhat encouraging that the White House has finally rethought its policy toward South Africa and the President by Executive order is attempting to preempt any action in the other body on a conference report that has been over there for some time where we have overwhelming bipartisan support for the imposition of sanctions representing our distaste and our abhorrence with apartheid and the repressive actions of the Government in South Africa. But issuing the Executive order, unfortunately, is not going to solve anything, in my judgment. The preemption might work for a while in the other body, but the issue is not going to go away because the Executive order does not do away with the issue.

So what we have, unfortunately, appears to be a confrontation between the President and the Congress where the Congress overwhelmingly wants to do something and it will be so interpreted in South Africa. What we need to have, of course, is a challenge to that government and a change of the U.S. policy. The best way to do that would be statutorily where you have strong bipartisan support and you show to the world that the executive branch and the legislative branch are joined together in making a statement with respect to our opposition on what is going on in South Africa. The way it looks now is it appears to be that we are divided, that something else has happened. I think that is unfortunate.

What should really happen is the other body should take that conference report, send it to the President and the President should sign it and let it become law. Then everybody would know exactly where the United States stands.

ABOLISH THE SYNTHETIC FUELS CORPORATION

(Mr. WORTLEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WORTLEY. Mr. Speaker, in a burst of can-do spirit, Congress launched the Synthetic Fuels Corporation in 1980 with a $15 billion appropriation and a mandate to go forth and create fuel from oil shale. It didn't matter that the technology was not readily at hand, $15 billion could get it there as needed.

Just in case the outright $15 billion was not enough, Congress said, let there be price supports and loan guarantees. After all, they don't cost anything. Synfuels, it was decreed, would lead the way to enhanced national security and energy independence.

Five years later we are no closer to a commercial synfuels industry. The Synthetic Fuels Corporation has wasted money by the barrel, given new meaning to the word mismanagement and has served as a glaring example of Government waste, fraud, and abuse. If anything, the money wasted on the Synthetic Fuels Corporation has hurt our national security and made us take giant steps backward from more self-sufficiency in energy production.

The House of Representatives has done the correct thing in deleting funds for the Synthetic Fuels Corporation in the Interior appropriations bill.

May our brother legislators across the Capitol bring us closer to debt independence by excising the $6 billion for synfuels in their Interior appropriations bill. And may our enthusiasm for fiscal responsibility be put to good use by passing legislation to terminate the present synfuels program. Amen.

TRADE ANNOUNCEMENT ON BRAZIL

(Mr. DURBIN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Speaker, if President Reagan's recent announcement here in Washington was supposed to reassure America that we have the resolve to develop a firm and fair trade policy, it did not.

Among the nations which the President targeted for attention in our foreign policy as to trade last Saturday was the nation of Brazil and the President specified that Brazil's resistance to American exports of computer products would be taken on head on.

There was an announcement, though, several weeks ago which received less fanfare and attention relative to Brazil. That announcement was made here in Washington by our Treasury Department and it will have a more far-reaching effect on the economy of the United States than the announcement by the President that we are going after Brazil's imports of American computers.

On August 27 our Department of the Treasury announced that they would allow the Brazilians to export ethanol to the United States duty free until November 2.

At a time when American workers in Decatur, IL, and across the Nation are battered with imports, we will allow up to 500 million gallons of blended Brazilian ethanol to come in duty free.

At a time of a Federal deficit, by not collecting the duty, we will walk away from $300 million that our Treasury could be amassing.

At a time of depressed agricultural prices, this decision by the Treasury will drop the price of corn 15 cents a bushel.

At a time of farm foreclosures across our Nation, American farmers will lose $1.2 billion in farm income because of this Treasury decision.

As we have incurred the largest trade deficit in the history of the United States, we need only look to decisions like these for the cause.

Is it any wonder in light of this Treasury decision that Congress here in Washington and the American people are demanding a trade policy that makes sense and stops this crippling export of our Nation's jobs and wealth.

BEST WISHES TO THE HONORABLE TOM BEVILL

(Mr. CALLAHAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CALLAHAN. Mr. Speaker, when we returned last week from our August work recess, a familiar face, good friend and distinguished colleague was noticeably missing from our ranks. Fortunately, Congressman TOM BEVILL is only temporarily absent, and I am happy to report that he is doing well, recovering in his Jasper, AL, home from heart bypass surgery a few weeks ago.

Over the years, Alabamians have been wise in their selection of public servants to represent us and our country. Statesmen like the late Speaker William Bankhead, his father John, and Senators Jim Allen, Lister Hill, and Justice Hugo Black have all received their rightful degree of respect during their tenure here in this House and in the other Chamber as well.

Today, the Alabama delegation is honored to have TOM BEVILL as one of our most distinguished Members. Webster's Dictionary defines a stateman as "one who exercises political leadership wisely and without narrow partisanship." An abbreviated definition of a true statesman would simply be "TOM BEVILL."

TOM, we all wish you a speedy recovery. Get well soon, we need you here in Washington.

TIME RUNNING OUT FOR CONGRESS TO ACT ON TRADE PROBLEMS

(Mr. BONKER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Speaker, time is running out for Congress to act responsibly on the trade problems that beset this country. We can no longer ignore the trade deficit, the unfair policies that give other nations a competitive edge, the emerging threat this agreement represents to our domestic industries.

This administration has no trade policy; indeed President Reagan just recently recognized there was even a problem.

But time is running out on our Government to correct this ominous trend. And patience is running out in Congress.

Yet there is a right way and a wrong way to deal with this problem. Reorganizing the executive branch to better cope with trade matters is a step in the right direction.

Today I am introducing a bill to establish a new Department of Commerce and Trade. This department would consolidate most of the trade functions now delegated to the Trade Representative and the Secretary of Commerce. The new Secretary would be the principal spokesman for the administration on trade and would be the President's top trade negotiator. The Department would administer our import relief and export control laws and would administer our export promotion programs.

Responsible trade reorganization can strengthen the formulation and implementation of U.S. trade policies, improve coordination among the agencies, and increase the weight given to our trade negotiators, and enhance our competitive position in world mandates.

NATIONAL DAY OF FASTING TO RAISE FUNDS TO COMBAT HUNGER

(Mr. PACKARD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PACKARD. Mr. Speaker, this week I will be introducing a resolution declaring the Sunday prior to Thanksgiving, November 24, 1985, as the "National Day of Fasting to Raise Funds to Combat Hunger." This is not a commemorative piece of legislation, but a bipartisan effort to raise money to feed the hungry in the United States and around the world.

The resolution encourages the people of the United States to forfeit one or more meals (if they can) on that day, Sunday, and contribute the money saved from those meals to a hunger relief organization. The quality that makes this resolution outstanding is that: First, it costs those who choose to participate nothing more than what they would have spent on food for their own meals; second, it gives the American people an opportunity to share potentially tens-of-millions of dollars in aid with victims of hunger; and third, it costs the Government absolutely nothing.

What better way is there to celebrate the blessings in our lives, but to generously share with those less fortunate? Mr. Speaker, I invite my colleagues to join me as original sponsors in support of this most special event.

MORE BAD NEWS FROM THE FARM

(Mr. McCURDY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. McCURDY. Mr. Speaker, if we truly want to keep American families on the land, Congress must address the farm credit crisis now.

Recent disclosures that the Farm Credit System, may need a Federal Government bailout to survive, is just the latest in a series of developments that have staggered the farm community. First quarter reports on the farm economy showed us that farm income had dropped more than 30 percent from 1 year ago when we said farm income equaled the 1930's. Bankers polled recently in the Southwest reported more than half of their farm loan repayments were lower than 1 year ago. Farm prices are substantially lower than last year. Small business closings in rural communities are higher than last year. Bank failures have reached alarming numbers. Many American farm communities are taking on the appearance of ghost towns. We're losing an American way of life.

Today, a newspaper in my State reports that the farm economy has become so depressed in parts of Oklahoma that suicide counselors say there is a definite increase in cases within the agriculture community.

Mr. Speaker, the farm bill will not solve these problems. The farm community is bearing the brunt of U.S. fiscal irresponsibility: Huge deficits in the Federal budget and in trade. This administration and this Congress must unite to bring about substantial deficit reduction and a balance in trade. We must take responsibility for the economic crisis in agriculture and work to resolve it.

COMMENDING DOT FOR DECISION ON TRANSPORTING HAZARDOUS WASTE

(Mr. ROWLAND of Connecticut asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROWLAND of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to commend the Department of Transportation for issuing a very significant and much awaited decision yesterday.

That decision goes to the heart of this Nation's ability to effectively route hazardous materials over our highways to underground storage sites.

The ruling I refer to denies a bid by New York City to avoid shipments of nuclear wastes from Brookhaven Laboratory on Long Island from traveling on highways which traverse the metropolitan area. As an alternative, the city proposed to barge the waste to my State and send it on a much longer, circuitous route.

While I obviously am interested in protecting my State's interest, I also rise to commend the decision for its far broader implications. The national standards of transporting dangerous materials and the fact that these standards must be supreme over attempts by certain localities is all of our responsibility.

A contrary decision would have opened the floodgates for hundreds—perhaps thousands of similar appeals, and the result would be chaos as far as the integrity of the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act is concerned.

Again I commend DOT's decision.

HOUSE AND SENATE SHOULD CONTINUE ACTION ON ANTI-APARTHEID LEGISLATION

(Mr. HOYER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to urge our colleagues in the other body to continue to act on the House-Senate conference report on H.R. 1460. Yesterday the President recognized that the policy of "constructive engagement" is ineffective on addressing the worsening repression of South Africa's policy of apartheid. The President's Executive order does not go far enough, however, and action by the Congress should continue.

The best hope for change in South Africa now lies in the conference report before the Senate. H.R. 1460 offers important incentives for action by threatening more severe sanctions within 1 year if no significant progress is achieved toward the elimination of apartheid. The President's Executive order does not provide future sanctions and, therefore, is more likely to be viewed by the South African Government as a set of inconveniences to be tolerated rather than incentives for change.

I believe it is imperative for us in Congress to continue our action to establish a workable plan to resolve this ongoing violation of basic human dignity and individual freedom by adopting the conference report on H.R. 1460.

PRESIDENT'S EXECUTIVE ORDER ON SOUTH AFRICA

(Mr. EDGAR asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues who have preceded me in condemning the President's proposal on South Africa.

I think the President's proposal is hollow and shallow and circumvents the bipartisan congressional consensus that has developed over the last several months that strong action has to be taken against the Government of South Africa on the issue of apartheid.

I share with my colleagues the comment that was made by our colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [BILL GRAY], who indicated that the President's Executive order on South Africa contains the rhetoric of our legislation, but not the teeth necessary to send a firm signal to South Africa and to the world. I agree with that statement.

It is time for the House and the other body to have a real constructive engagement with the White House on this issue of South Africa and demand strong action and strong sanctions against that Government, and stronger penalties in the future if, in fact, no action is taken. I would urge the other body and this body to place on the President's desk that congressional consensus, bipartisan effort and make sure that the President has to stand up and speak out much stronger and much more firmly on this important issue.

PRESIDENT'S ACTION AGAINST SOUTH AFRICA

(Mr. CROCKETT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CROCKETT. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the House conference committee on the antiapartheid bill, I want to commend the chairman of our Foreign Affairs Committee and the chairman of our Judiciary Committee for the excellent statements they made here this morning setting forth their views with respect to the President's recent action.

President Reagan's wrist-slapping order against the apartheid government of South Africa does little to encourage meaningful change in apartheid. Indeed, the President's action not only waters down each of the immediate sanctions proposed by the Congress; but it also eliminates the key proposal that would automatically trigger further and stronger sanctions in a year if acceptable steps to end apartheid were not taken.

Mr. Speaker, Congress must clarify and strengthen the President's message to Pretoria by enacting into law the complete House-Senate conference report. The basic message to South Africa must be, that it is imperative now that the Pretoria government begin meaningful negotiations with black South African leaders, including the imprisoned Nelson Mandela and the Africa National Congress and the imprisoned Rev. Allan Boesak and the United Democratic Front.

U.S. WORKERS COMPETING IN INTERNATIONAL TRADE

(Mr. ALEXANDER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, in a recent article published by the U.S. News & World Report, September 2, 1985, edition, this prestigious weekly news magazine features the question of whether or not U.S. workers can compete in international trade.

On page 40, I will refer to its comparison in the study of U.S. productivity versus Japan. I quote: "Despite Japan's gain, an average American worker can still outproduce his counterpart in Japan. Overall hourly output of a U.S. worker exceeds that of a Japanese one by about 20 percent. Most studies," it goes on to say, "give Americans the edge in efficiency, in agriculture, finance, wholesale and retail trade and in business services. Japan is rapidly gaining on the U.S. in productivity."

Mr. Speaker, the reason that we have fallen behind in America is because in the last several years, the United States has had no trade policy. That is, we have taken no action to represent American workers and farmers in dealing in international commerce. As a result, the sales of U.S. products have declined severely and the trade deficit has risen dramatically.

A few minutes ago, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BONKER] announced the introduction of a reorganization bill that would reorganize our Government in the form of a Department of Trade. I rise today to support that bill and to say it is a first step toward developing a U.S. trade policy to deal with the current crisis.

THE AMERICAN HEART ASSOCIATION'S FIRST ANNUAL FOOD FESTIVAL

(Mr. SLATTERY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SLATTERY. Mr. Speaker, the American Heart Association will be sponsoring its first annual food festival during the week of September 8 to 14 to spotlight the value of good nutrition and dietary control of cholesterol and saturated fat to reduce the risk of heart disease.

The American Heart Association will join with more than 6,000 supermarkets throughout the United States by providing information on "heart-healthy" eating, including the importance of reading nutrition labels on packaged foods, as well as how to choose lean cuts of meat and preferable dairy products.

Heart and blood vessel disease kill more men, women, and children in this country than any other cause of death. The economic costs of cardiovascular disease will amount to an estimated $72.1 billion in 1985 alone. Most cardiovascular diseases are the result of atherosclerosis, a condition in which the lipid (fat) and cholesterol levels in the blood are higher than the body requires to maintain good health. When the body accumulates an abundance of fat and cholesterol, the excess can collect in the walls of the arteries, forming deposits called plaque. If the accumulation of plaque is allowed to progress over the years, an artery can become completely clogged with fats, cholesterol, and other debris. If the artery supplies the heart, the result can be heart attack; if it supplies the brain, the result can be a stroke.

Medical scientists tell us that lowering the level of cholesterol and saturated fats in the diet can reduce one of the risks of coronary disease. The American Heart Association has advocated since 1961 a diet low in saturated fat and cholesterol for everyone—healthy individuals and those with heart and blood vessel disease. According to the American Heart Association, by limiting cholesterol consumption to less than 300 milligrams per day and fat intake to less than 30 percent of daily calories, individuals can reduce the risk of heart attack and stroke.

Please join with me in commending the American Heart Association and participating retailers for promoting this first annual national community nutrition event. This is an excellent example of the cooperation that can exist between the voluntary and private sector to accomplish a worthy health promotion goal.

REMOVAL OF NAME OF MEMBER AS COSPONSOR OF H.R. 2600

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my name be removed as a cosponsor of H.R. 2600.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MOAKLEY). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY TO HAVE UNTIL MIDNIGHT WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 11, 1985, TO FILE REPORT ON H.R. 3128, DEFICIT REDUCTION AMENDMENTS OF 1985

Mr. CROCKETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary have until midnight on Wednesday, September 11, to file a report on H.R. 3128, Deficit Reduction Amendments of 1985.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

PRESIDENT'S EXECUTIVE ORDER ON SOUTH AFRICA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I have been somewhat disturbed today as I have listened to some of those who have criticized the President's initiative on South Africa, and particularly somewhat disturbed by the tone of the remarks I have heard, because as one who has been fairly deeply involved in trying to bring about a change in policy in South Africa, it has seemed to me that what we set out to do was to get the administration to change their policy toward a more activist kind of policy.

With the President's announcement of yesterday, that has certainly been done. Now it is true that what the President ended up doing is not exacting what I would have done, but it does apply open and direct pressure to the South African Government which was something that we said all the way along was what we wanted to accomplish. So if it is not precisely what some of the rest of us would have done, if it is not precisely what was in the conference report that a lot of us voted for, if it is not precisely what we outlined in various bills that we vote and put into the hopper on South Africa, the fact is that it is a major and historic step in the right direction, and ought to be looked at in that vein.

The most important thing with it, in my mind, is that it is a policy that the administration now assumes ownership for. If we would go the route of passing the conference report, sending that down to the White House, having it vetoed and overriding that veto on Capitol Hill, it might make us feel good about the fact that we have forced the President to adopt a policy that he did not want. But the fact is that the administration, having criticized and vetoed such a bill, would have no ownership for that policy.

I have usually found that people do not take very much initiative on things that they are not particularly involved with themselves, where they do not have any ownership involvement for themselves. So what you would end up with is an administration grudgingly applying a policy that has been mandated on it about South Africa by the Congress.

Now, it seems to me that that would not get us to where we want to be. I think that we worked, a lot of us, toward trying to achieve a kind of bipartisan agreement and consensus on a policy that would bring change to South Africa. It seems to me that it is distinctly unhelpful to have some here in the Congress who seem to want a confrontation with the President more than they want a change in South African policy. I think our objective should be achieving reform in South Africa, not fighting among ourselves about the nuances of the policy options that we choose. Let me also say in the same context that I found Bishop Tutu's statement yesterday distinctly unhelpful toward uniting the American people in the cause of obtaining real human rights progress in South Africa.

The American people know that President Reagan is not a crypto-racists, as Bishop Tutu called him. That is an ill-advised and totally inaccurate characterization by Bishop Tutu and should be retracted with an apology. Such an apology would help, I think, get the American people together and united toward doing the kinds of things that are necessary in order to bring about changes in the apartheid system in South Africa. All of us who want change in South Africa have a duty to put politics and personal pride of authorship about policies behind the need to formalize a policy that has broad-based support for ending apartheid in South Africa. That is what we should be all about, broad-based support for a policy that has a chance of changing some things in South Africa. The President took a historic step in that direction, and, rather than looking for ways to nitpick that policy change by the President, we sought to be looking for ways to build upon that initiative as a unified American approach to human rights progress in South Africa.

There is enough confrontation in South Africa; we do not need unnecessary confrontation here on our policy toward South Africa.

I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania for yielding. I am somewhat out of breath. I apologize because I was in another part of Capitol Hill when the gentleman took the special order. I want to compliment the gentleman for taking this special order.

Did the gentleman hear anyone in the well this morning talking about Ethiopia?

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman is correct. We have got human rights problems around the world beyond South Africa. It seems to me what the President has done in taking the step he did is, he helped define that this nation is going to take strong stands, and I would hope that we will begin to hear more about situations like Ethiopia.

I would be glad to yield further.

Mr. ROTH. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The reason that I raise this question about Ethiopia is very important. As the gentleman realizes, when the foreign aid legislation was up, we added an amendment to that bill that required the President to report back to the House in 30 days on whether there is a deliberate policy by the Government of Ethiopia to actually starve some of the people in the rebellious areas in Ethiopia. I find it quite interesting to read what the administration had to say about that situation. I commend the report to everyone in this body and submit the entire text in the RECORD. Although some 7 to 8 million people are in imminent danger of starving to death and many thousands upon thousands have already died because of the cruel and deliberate policies of the Mengistu dictatorship, the President has not imposed sanctions against the Government of Ethiopia. In Ethiopia it is not a question of civil rights, it's a question of life or death. But I hear no one in this body speaking out on that issue.

Certainly if we are going to speak out on South Africa, and we should as we are all opposed to apartheid, we should speak out equally—if not more forcefully—against the death policies in Ethiopia.

At this point, I submit the text of the Presidential determination.

PRESIDENTIAL DETERMINATION No. 85-20

Memorandum for the Secretary of State.

Subject: Determination with Respect to Ethiopia.

Pursuant to Section 812(c) of the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1985 (P.L. 99-83), I hereby determine on the basis of current evidence that the Ethiopian Government does not meet the condition specified in subsection (c)(1) of that section.

This determination, together with the justification therefor, shall be reported to the Congress immediately. This determination shall be published in the Federal Register.

JUSTIFICATION

Section 812(c) of the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1985 (P.L. 99-83) provides as follows:

Prohibition on Imports and Exports.

(1) The President shall determine, within 30 days after the date of enactment of this Act, whether the Ethiopian regime is conducting a deliberate policy of starvation of its people and has not granted fundamental human rights to its citizens. The President shall submit that determination and the basis for that determination to the Congress.

(2) If the President determines that such a policy is being conducted and that such rights are not being granted, paragraph (3) shall take effect if the Congress enacts a joint resolution approving that determination.

(3) If the conditions specified in paragraph (1) and (2) are met:

(a) goods and services of Ethiopian origin may not be imported into the United States; and

(b) except for emergency relief, rehabilitation, and recovery assistance, goods and services of United States origin may not be exported (directly or indirectly) to Ethiopia.

In order for the prohibition on imports and exports to enter into force, the President must first determine that both elements of the condition are met, and so report to the Congress, and Congress must then enact a joint resolution approving the determination.

For the reasons described below, the Ethiopian Government does not meet the condition described in subsection (c)(1). The Ethiopian Government's respect for human rights is deplorable, and its political, economic and military policies have no doubt caused vast and unnecessary human suffering, including starvation. However, as explained in greater detail below, the available evidence does not justify a determination that the Government of Ethiopia is at this time "conducting a deliberate policy of starvation."

1. Human Rights.—The Ethiopian Government's record on human rights is deplorable. In addition to other human rights concerns, the 1985 implementation of the policy of "resettlement" of famine victims, especially from the northern regions, is cause for deep concern. Many of almost half a million persons have been forcibly separated from their families and rounded up, from their villages and at relief camps and feeding sites, and confined under armed guard at transit camps. Transport south by air, bus or truck was accomplished under crowded and inhumane conditions to resettlement sites in primitive wilderness areas, totally lacking in basic health, sanitation and other essential services. Those resettled were compelled to perform long hours of hard labor clearing and cultivating land while receiving only minimal shelter and rations. Veterans of the resettlement campaign who have escaped report beatings, murder, imprisonment, deprivation and what they consider enslavement in a highly regimented work environment where mortality rates are exceedingly high. The inhumane resettlement program diverts from the food reflief effort badly needed transport and logistical support and supplies. We and others have repeatedly brought to the attention of the PMGSE our objection to this policy.

Additional details on the Ethiopian Government's human rights practices can be found in the section on Ethiopia in the Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1984, which concludes that human rights prospects for the future remain bleak. A copy of the summary paragraphs from that report is attached.

2. Starvation.—The Ethiopian Government's political, economic, and military policies have no doubt caused vast and unnecessary human suffering, including starvation. The determination called for by Congress, however, requires a finding that the regime is currently and deliberately following a "policy of starvation." The available evidence does not justify a determination that the Government of Ethiopia is, at this time, conducting a deliberate policy of starvation.

In recent months the Ethiopian Government has, in response to pressure from the U.S. and other donors, taken certain actions to facilitate an enhanced relief effort. For example, (1) the Ethiopian Relief and Rehabilitation Commission (RRC) has agreed to a small program to expand feeding in the north where fighting has severely disrupted relief activities; (2) the Ethiopian Government has reduced the pace of its resettlement program, which had diverted substantial transportation resources that could have been used to alleviate starvation; (3) recent evacuations of relief camps have apparently been more humane, and the people involved adequately provided with food and seed. Many problems need continuing effort, however, including the need for much expanded feeding in contests areas, and end to coercive resettlement, highest priority to transporting relief goods, and greater freedom to monitor relief programs. We will continue to review these aspects, and to press the Government of Ethiopia to make further sustained improvements.

Section 812(c) does not call for any determination concerning the past conduct and policies of the Ethiopian Government concerning starvation of its people. Nor does it call for an evaluation of policies that may have had political or military purposes, but which nevertheless caused increased starvation. That Government's past conduct, and the effects of its policies, are matters of grave concern, even though the evidence on these subjects cannot justify a determination under the statute. Background material concerning Ethiopia's past practices is therefore appended to this justification.

ATTACHMENT 1.—EXCERPTS FROM 1984 REPORT ON HUMAN RIGHTS PRACTICES IN ETHIOPIA

"Ultimate power in Ethiopia, wielded by Chairman Mengistu Haile-Mariam and a small group of former military associates, continues to be exercised and maintained through intimidation and arbitrary arrest. The country is without civil or political freedoms and without institutions or laws to protect its citizens' human rights. The Provisional Military Government of Socialist Ethiopia maintains complete control over the media, labor, education, internal and external movements of Ethiopian citizens, and all political processes.

"Persons expressing opposition to the regime or who are believed not to support it are routinely arrested by security police and subjected to torture in varying degrees; some executions have been reported as well. The individual citizen enjoys no legal protection and may be detained at any time, without explanation and be held indefinitely without any prospect of trial. For example, as many as 1,000 low and mid-level Ethiopian Government officials and business or government-affiliated organization members were arrested in Addis Ababa during June, July, and August.

"Ethiopia, with a population of over 40 million, continues to have one of the lowest per capita incomes in the world ($140). The vast majority of Ethiopians live with inadequate housing, water, sanitation, and medical facilities. The Government has so far been unwilling to reduce its sizable military spending to increase relief or development efforts. More than one million Ethiopians remained outside the country, the result of years of war, drought, poverty, civil strife, and oppression. Human rights prospects for the future remain bleak."

ATTACHMENT 2.—BACKGROUND ON ETHIOPIAN PRACTICES

FAMINE

The present regime in Ethiopia, the Marxist government of Haile Mariam Mengistu, came to power during the chaotic and violent period of the Ethiopian revolution of 1974-76. Since then the regime has consolidated its position by ruthless often violent suppression of opponents. It has been dependent upon the Soviet Union and Cuba for military and political support. The ideological orientation of the leadership is antithetical to the United States and, since Chairman Mengistu's assumption of power, relations between the U.S. and Ethiopia have been severely strained. The property of U.S. nationals was expropriated, diplomatic representation was reduced to lower levels and security and economic assistance halted.

Drought is no stranger to Ethiopia. Periodic drought and famine have laid waste to that nation from time immemorial. The current cycle of drought struck first in 1973 and 1974. Northern areas, already eroded and overworked, were then as now hard hit. Close on the heels of that catastrophe came the revolution which by 1976 had completely eliminated the feudal agrarian system of hundreds of years. The revolutionary government carried out an extensive land reform but assigned low priority to the creation of other viable national agrarian policies, as it focused energies on maintaining political predominance and on the war with Somalia and the internal armed conflict in Eritrea and Tigray. Particularly deterimental to agricultural production and to the rights of the rural population have been the official policy in favor of collectivization and the preponderant allocation of agricultural development resources to inefficient state farms and collectives. Small independent farmers, the backbone of rural population, have suffered. Following years of poor rains, drought came again even more viciously than before into this fragile landscape in 1983 and 1984. The land had never really recovered from the drought of the mid-seventies and, due to the revolution and the internal armed conflict, the rural social system was in shambles. Incorrect government policies, inattention, and a refusal to accept the evidence at hand combined to create the tragedy which now confronts us. The combination of these policies with nature's capriciousness have led to the starvation of hundreds of thousands of people with millions more still at risk.

FAILURE OF THE ETHIOPIAN GOVERNMENT TO AMELIORATE FAMINE CONDITIONS

With the failure of the 1983 rains it became clear that Ethiopia again faced a famine of potentially massive proportions. Food stocks which would normally carry through one year of bad rains were seriously depleted by years of insufficient rains. Warnings from knowledgeable Ethiopians as well as international food production/weather monitoring agencies were ignored. No effective famine planning was done by the Mengistu government, although the Relief and Rehabilitation Commission (RRC), established in 1974, was still in existence. The port of Assab was in fact closed from November 1983 to April 1984 to allow only cement and military equipment to enter. When the rains failed again in 1984, the situation became critical but despite the pitiful scenes of suffering and deprivation due to drought, the Mengistu regime refused to take steps to ameliorate the problem. Donors could not get from the Ethiopian Government answers to basic questions affecting food needs. Rather than alleviate suffering, the regime continued to assign high priority to military spending financed by the Soviet Union.

The expensive preparations for the ostentatious September 1984 ceremonies celebrating the tenth anniversary of the socialist revolution were further evidence that the government put politics ahead of feeding hungry people. Given the specter of starvation, such celebration constituted a callous misallocation of resources. The incongruity was apparent to many. International pressures and criticisms of Ethiopia mounted, forcing the Mengistu regime to reconsider, in a defensive fashion, its responsibities towards its citizens. From that point, November 1984, onward, the Government of Ethiopia grudgingly began to coordinate with donor governments to permit famine relief operations. The sheer enormity of the logistical task has been overwhelming. The process has been plagued with misunderstandings, broken promises, misrepresentations and a continued refusal by the Ethiopians to give relief efforts top priority over security and political considerations. The internal armed conflict also created problems, as both sides of the struggles in Eritrea and Tigray interfered with food shipments.

Following is a summary of Ethiopian Government actions that have resulted in acute human suffering, hunger and even starvation and have been the basis for some arguing that the Ethiopian Government had a deliberate policy of starvation.

The Ethiopian Government was unwilling to allocate available vehicles to the famine relief effort, but used them for military, resettlement and commercial purposes.

The Ethiopian Government was unwilling and later did not facilitate the movement of food to non-government controlled areas of Eritrea and Tigray. International relief workers earlier witnessed strafing and bombing of civilians fleeing to the Sudan. The bombing of villages, the burning of crops and the theft of farm animals have in the past been attributed to forces of the PMGSE.

In what was described as an effort to get people who were dependent on feeding centers back to the land, the Ethiopian Government forcibly evacuated tens of thousands from Ibnet, a relief camp in Gondar Province. Most of these evacuees were driven out without adequate provisions and some died. Pressure from the U.S., the UN and other donors, plus international press attention, led to Chairman Mengistu reopening the camp. The Ethiopian Government claimed the precipitous evacuation was ordered by local forces. However, two months later, military forces again tried to forcibly empty Inbet. This time, UN intervention stopped the evacuation. The Ethiopian Government has told the U.S. and other donors that it intends to close all the camps so that people can return to their land to plant. The U.S., UN and other donors are carefully monitoring these actions so that people will be adequately provided with food and seeds for planting.

The Ethiopian Government, at the depth of the crisis, continued to implement a policy of forced resettlement. This policy included the allocation of substantial transportation resources, including trucks, which would have alleviated starvation. By this allocation of resources the PMGSE demonstrated that its priority was not alleviation of starvation.

We have received persistent reports that food supplies, most provided by the World Food Program, were diverted to local militias and army units; while, we have no evidence that these diversions have involved other than relatively small amounts of food, the persistence of these reports continues to be of concern.

The Ethiopians seized a shipment of Australian wheat intended to be delivered to Tigray and Eritrea via Port Sudan. The Ethiopian Government justified its actions by charges that outside forces were delivering aid to rebels fighting the Ethiopian Government.

Inappropriate PMGSE pricing policies and collectivized agriculture and state farms (particularly in resettlement areas) are having significant negative impact on food production, especially basic food grains. The imposition of a system of collectivized agriculture and state farms (through highly objectionable, coercive means) has proven to be inefficient and unproductive and is contributing further to hunger and starvation. In addition, the PMGSE policy of imposing artificially low official market prices on the sale of basic foodstuffs and forcing farmers to sell at these prices has naturally resulted in a significant decline in production, which has exacerbated further the current food shortage situation. Both the U.S. Government and IBRD have urged the PMGSE to correct its inappropriate agriculture policies. To date no reforms have been made. Given Ethiopia's high rate of population growth, this lack of action augurs ill for the future when the country will have even more people to feed.

EVIDENCE OF RECENT ETHIOPIAN GOVERNMENT ACTION

Recent evidence does not at this time justify a determination that the Ethiopian Government is now conducting a deliberate policy of starvation. Despite the difficulties mentioned above, the international community provided unprecedented aid to Ethiopia. In FYs 1984 and 1985, the Western community has provided 1.1 million metric tons of food, plus millions of dollars for transport. The U.S. is the largest donor, committed to meeting one-third of the need. About 50 percent of the food actually delivered, however, has come from the United States. Both the U.S. and UN, as well as other donors' insistence on certain conditions being met have led to improvement in the situation. This insistence, steadily applied over the past 18 months, has produced sporadic action on the part of the Ethiopian government on logistics, a greater role for humanitarian private voluntary organizations, and better distribution of relief supplies. Some examples of these improvements are the following:

After months of wrangling, the RRC has now agreed to a program to expand feeding throughout the north, the area of civil strife, where fighting has severely disrupted and prevented relief activities. This plan, which is being implemented by American private voluntary organizations and International Committee of the Red Cross, and is designed to increase humanitarian access to the large population at the risk in Eritera and Tigray, began in August. To date, heavy rains and fighting between Ethiopian and rebel forces have interfered with food distribution both from within Ethiopia and across the border from Sudan.

In recent weeks, the Ethiopian Government has substantially reduced the pace of its resettlement program, while adhering to its original policy and targets.

After a delay of many months, the Ethiopian Government granted full accreditation to the five USAID staff removing ambiguity about their status and improving their ability to manage the U.S. relief effort. Accreditation was granted to USAID personnel only after repeated unsuccessful attempts by our Embassy and then higher level intervention of the UN.

After the earlier disastrous events at Ibnet, wherein 60,000 drought victims were driven from the camp at gun point while their huts were burned and possessions destroyed, recent relief camp evacuations were witnessed by NGO, UN and U.S. officials. All report the evacuations were orderly and that people were adequately provided with food and seed. The RRC instructed the evacuees to go to relief centers nearest their homes after a month for further rations.

At our insistence, the PMGSE has recently publicly acknowledged the considerable U.S. and other western assistance, in press reports in Ethiopia and at an August 23 press conference in Washington.

These steps have gradually produced considerable progress in the overall fight against famine. Recent UN figures show improvement in food distribution. According to July 24 UN figures, the total number of beneficiaries receiving emergency food in May, 1985, was approximately 4.6 million, up from about 3.4 million in the months of March and April. Of this May total, half (2.3 million) received their food from the RRC, with an estimated 750,000 of these (or 16 percent of total recipients) being in the resettlement areas, 995,000 in the north (Eritrea, Tigray, and Wollo) and the rest in other areas. Of the 2.3 million beneficiaries who received food from non government organizations (NGOs), 1.7 million (or three fourths) were in Eritrea, Tigray, and Wollo; the remaining 600,000 were in Gondar, Shoa, Harrarhge and Sidamo; and none were in resettlement areas. In terms of metric tons, in May the RRC and NGOs each distributed 35,000 metric tons of food, up from 25,000 and 27,000 respectively in April and 28,000 and 21,000 respectively in March.

The latest World Food Program figures also show an improvement in food distribution in Ethiopia. They report that food distribution steadily increased from 49,000 tons in March to 78,000 tons in July, with more than half distributed by NGOs and the rest by the RRC. Population being reached also increased from 3.4 million in March, to about 5 million by the end of June, representing 63 percent of the estimated total at-risk. A recent joint survey by the office of the UN Assistant Secretary General in Addis Ababa and the International Committee of the Red Cross showed that 80 percent of the population in need in Tigray is being reached. For Eritrea, the percentage is about 76 percent.

While progress has been made recently in resolving some of the problems associated with the famine relief effort, many problems need continuing effort. These include expanded feeding in contested areas, an end to forced and coercive resettlement, highest priority to transporting relief goods, reduced port fees, and freedom to monitor relief programs. Given the failure of the Government of Ethiopia to meet its commitments in the past, we will continue to monitor these with the greatest care.

Mr. WALKER. If the gentleman will allow me to reclaim my time, it is my contention that the President took us down that road yesterday. The President has defined some ways of putting pressure on the South African Government to bring about some change. It is my contention that, rather than being excoriated here in the House because we do not like minor portions of what the President did, that what we ought to be doing is finding ways of accommodating that toward a policy that addresses the future.

TENTATIVE AGREEMENT ON DRILLING OFF THE CALIFORNIA COASTLINE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. LEVINE] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. LEVINE of California. I thank the Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to spend a few moments talking about the unfortunate breakdown in the agreement that had been achieved between the Secretary of the Interior, on the one hand, and a bipartisan group of Representatives from the California congressional delegation, on the other hand, with regard to the issue of Outer Continential Shelf oil drilling or offshore oil drilling.

Mr. Speaker, prior to the August recess, for 6 very intense weeks of discussions and negotiations, a bipartisan group of Members of both the House and the other body, including both of U.S. Senators, met for some 20 hours with the Secretary of the Interior to attempt to, and to in fact, succeed in achieving an agreement between the Secretary of the Interior, on the hand, and this bipartisan group of California Representatives, on the other hand, to try to come up with a long-term resolution of these complex and difficult issues of drilling off the California coastline. This was an agreement that was hailed by the Secretary of the Interior, himself, in a joint press conference with a number of us on the delegation as a landmark agreement.

The Secretary came to California and spent some 10 days in hearings up and down the State of California and during the first several days of those hearings again reiterated the importance and significance of this balanced agreement under which a significant part of the California coastline would be protected to the year 2000 and under which some 150 tracts would potentially be available for oil and gas exploration along the California coastline.

There were a number of coastal cities that were deeply concerned about this compromise, a number of tracts along the coastline of California in sensitive coastal areas, but people understood that a compromise needed to be reached, a balance needed to be struck.

There was give on both sides, there was a significant compromise by both sides, and it was the hope of those of us who have been involved in this process that we would come back to Washington and ratify this agreement.

Unfortunately, at a meeting that took place this morning called by the Secretary of the Interior and at which he invited all 45 Members of the California congressional delegation, the Secretary essentially announced that he was no longer able to accept this agreement, that he wanted substantial changes in it. He was unable to tell us today what those changes would be, despite the fact that we have been involved in this process for such a long time and despite the fact that all of the issues, I think, are well known to both sides.

The Secretary indicated that new information had come to his attention. But after a, I think, fairly thorough discussion of the issue, I think it was clear to Members on both sides of the aisle who were at this meeting that the so-called information was neither new nor was, in fact, information. This was simply a lobbying campaign by the oil industry on this administration, which has been so sympathetic to that industry, to urge this administration to go back and get as much as they could possibly get in terms of tracts off the most sensitive parts of the California coastline to satisfy what has unfortunately become an insatiable appetite, a voracious appetite, from this industry.

Mr. Speaker, under prior administrations, whether they were Democratic or Republican administrations, under the administration of President Nixon, under the administration of President Ford, and under the administration of President Carter, those most sensitive areas along the California coastline have been out of bounds for coastal drilling in the immediate future because it was understood by bipartisan administrations and by bipartisan Representatives in this House and in the other body that we were dealing with some of the most precious natural resources ir this Nation's inventory and that, in t e absence of an absolute energy emergency, a real energy emergency, those resources need not be drilled at this time.

Unfortunately, this administration has broken with that bipartisan tradition initially under the auspices of Secretary Watt who essentially wanted to open up every inch of the California coastline to offshore oil drilling; we had hoped and we had believed that the current Secretary of the Interior was involved in a good faith effort to resolve this issue for a long period of time so we would not have to continue to come back to the floor of this House or the other body to resolve this issue in a legislative fashion. An agreement was reached, an historic agreement, in the words of the Secretary a landmark agreement, and unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, today the Secretary announced to the delegation that he could not live with that agreement.

Unfortunately, we will have to come back to this body seeking the legislative protection that we hoped could be achieved through a resolution of this issue, through a compromise. That will not be possible, but I do believe that it is important that the membership understand that a vast majority of our delegation on a bipartisan basis continues to want to live up to this agreement.

I think it is a sad day for a balanced energy policy and for the California coastline that this resolution has broken down.

UPDATE ON TENTATIVE AGREEMENT ON DRILLING OFF THE CALIFORNIA COASTLINE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. DANNEMEYER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. I thank the Speaker for permitting me to address the House on this occasion.

Mr. Speaker, I, too, attended the meeting that my colleague, Mr. LEVINE, attended with Secretary Hodel, and when I listen to these versions I am almost amused because sometimes I get the impression that some of our colleagues are attempting to tell the American people that the issue is whether or not we shall drill off of the coast of California for the first time, that it is a pristine, virgin area untouched by oil drilling. The truth is that we have been drilling off the coast of California for the last 25 years. That is, the Outer Continental Shelf.

We have 16 platforms in Federal OCS territory containing some 800 wells that are in production right now. We have 15 platforms in State tidelands areas that contain over 3,500 wells.

We have been drilling off the coast of California in the State tideland area; that is, the area within 3 miles of shore, since 1890, the last 90 years.

The issue is not, shall we begin for the first time? the issue is: Shall we expand what has proved to be a compatible activity, given the environmental concerns that we all have?

I am a native Californian. I love the State. I believe every foot of our beach, our coastline, is environmentally sensitive. When I hear some of my colleagues saying there are certain areas of their coastline that are more environmentally sensitive than the other areas, I sometimes think I hear the sound of elitism by those comments. The reason I make this observation is because millions of people in southern California have been using the beaches of southern California all during the quarter century of the time that we have been developing and utilizing the oil resources in the Outer Continential Shelf.

I can say to my colleagues, when you go down to the beach in southern California and play in the waves, the surf, or what have you, when you come out of the surf, you do not have oil on the bottom of your feet except perhaps in a minor area around Santa Barbara, where it comes, not from industry, Mr. Speaker, but it comes from natural seeps that have been in there from time immemorial. The Spanish explorers talked about that in their logs when they explored the California coast.

That is just part of the natural terrain of the area.

The agreement that the Secretary developed tentatively was fatally flawed from the outset. It is unrealistic. I sympathize with my colleague from Santa Monica, Mr. LEVINE. He has a real problem on his hands.

Expecting a Member from the California delegation to agree on drilling off of his or her coastline is kind of like expecting a Member of Congress to agree on the method of his own execution.

There are 17 Members in the California delegation of 45 who have coastal districts in their areas. I sympathize with those Members. They have a difficult problem because there will always be a small handful of vocal folks in those districts who will stand and say much with the concept of "[millions for defense and not one cent for tribute;" that is to say, they will never agree to any drilling off their district under any circumstances. We will never satisfy those people.

So I believe it is more rational for the delegation from California to participate along with all of us, the 435 who comprise this body, in deciding national policy for expansion of a resource off the coast of California. There are 28 of us, of the 45 who represent inland areas. I think we should have had some input into this agreement, the tentative agreement that the Secretary developed.

Unfortunately, none of us were a part of that agreement. I think that is what fatally flawed it. The tentative agreement only permits exploration of maybe 5 percent of the total resource; it exempts areas off Santa Cruz, Bodega Bay, Point Arena, that are estimated to contain in the Department of the Interior's analysis about 1 billion barrels of oil and, in the industry's analysis, about 5 billion barrels of oil.

That tentative agreement locked up those three areas until the year 2000.

That is ridiculous. This Nation today is importing over a third of its oil every day; it is costing we Americans about $45 billion; that is about a third of our negative trade balance. The national energy policy of America is energy independence. We pursue that policy by exploring those areas of our country off the coast that have reasonable probability of oil and natural gas.

I look forward, Mr. Speaker, in concluding, to having a full debate on the floor of the House where the 435 of us can decide what is going to happen to this national resource, and I look forward to participating in that debate.

SOUTH AFRICA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, history teaches us that people who expect a steady improvement in their lives seldom resort to violence. People who see no future for themselves and their children often do become violent. In South Africa, a vast majority is permanently denied participation in the political and economic life of their country, based solely on their race. The tragic events we are witnessing in South Africa are the culmination of decades of frustration with the immoral and intolerable system of apartheid. The cause of peace and justice require the prompt implementation of reform. The longer that reform is postponed, the more unstable and intractable the situation will become. Our own national interests, as well as our values as a Nation, are directly involved. The President's effort to circumvent the overwhelming bipartisan consensus on compromise legislation involving South Africa is disappointing and dangerous. By abdicating leadership on this essential moral and strategic issue, the President seems content to let events take their course. We cannot afford to let that happen. It is essential that our country take decisive and meaningful action to send a firm signal to South Africa and the world that the American people expect and support prompt reform in that unhappy country. The President's program sends the wrong message.

OFFSHORE DRILLING

Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 90 seconds, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the gentleman can only have 1 minute.

Mr. LEVINE of California. I will take the 1 minute, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman from California intend to talk about the issue of offshore drilling?

Mr. LEVINE of California. If the gentleman will yield, yes, this gentleman does intend to.

I would like, if I could, to simply put into context a couple of the comments that the gentleman from California [Mr. DANNEMEYER] made so that the record is clear.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw my reservation provided my colleague from California will also include in his request 1 additional minute for this Member from southern California.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California to address the House for 1 minute?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, I think that the gentleman from California [Mr. DANNEMEYER], as always, is very persuasive with regard to his side of the issue. I do think that a couple of points should be included in the RECORD so that comments perhaps will not be misunderstood.

While the gentleman is correct that only 17 of the Members of the delegation do represent coastal districts, and 28 represent inland districts, I think it should also be clear that despite that breakdown of the delegation, the vast majority of the entire delegation does support the agreement that was reached.

It is my understanding that only 11 of the 45 Members have taken a position in opposition to the agreement, which would mean that a significant number of not only the coastal Representatives, but also the inland Representatives, have taken a position in support of the agreement that was reached.

Second, with regard to the issue of resource data—which is one of the subjects that has been discussed now at some length in the meeting this morning, and I am sure we will hear more about—the point that I think needs to be emphasized is that the Interior Department had available throughout all of these discussions resource data which has not changed; it was based on its resource data that this agreement was arrived at.

OFFSHORE DRILLING

(Mr. DANNEMEYER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, my colleague is correct that of the 45 members of the California congressional delegation, 11 signed a letter in opposition to this tentative agreement, which means that that would be 34 who were in some posture in between. I think 27 had signed a telegram to the Secretary very recently, indicating their support of the tentative agreement.

I can understand the 17 Members from the California delegation who represent coastal districts, because they have real sensitive problems. I want everyone to understand that.

I do not quite understand why the 28 of us who are inland are so opposed—I mean, a majority of the 28 who are inland are still in opposition to the agreement. I do not quite understand their thinking, particularly those in the San Jaoquin Valley of California, because the farm organizations in our State are in favor of OCS; there are many commercial interests outside of the oil industry that are in support of OCS; and I think it is part of the process of politics that those Members from the inland areas of California in opposition to OCS should have an opportunity of defending their position against establishing energy independence for America, and I look forward to participating in that debate.

PART B MEDICARE REIMBURSEMENT FOR PHYSICIAN ASSISTANTS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. WYDEN] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to join with Senator CHARLES GRASSLEY, of Iowa, in introducing this bill to bring the services of physician assistants under the Medicare Part B Program. The purpose of this measure is to increase access to health care for older Americans. But, I am glad to say, it will not add a penny to the Medicare Program.

Physician assistants are skilled health professionals who perform many of the same duties as physicians such as taking patient histories, conducting physical exams, and, in some States, even writing limited prescriptions. Thus, physicians are able to take care of more patients, but patients get more of their doctors' attention and they get better care.

Currently, Medicare part B covers physician assistant services when they are rendered in a certified rural health clinic or in a health maintenance organization [HMO] or similar program. This coverage policy has been a success. Now Senator GRASSLEY and I want to see these same services available to other Medicare part B beneficiaries. To deny this coverage limits access to health care for some of our senior citizens, and it runs cross-purpose against our health manpower training programs.

For example, in July, both the House and the Senate unanimously passed the health manpower amendments of 1985. Included in this bill was a $14 million, 3-year authorization for physician assistant training programs. It unanimously passed. But the irony, and inefficiency, is that while we are financing the training of physician assistants, we are doing less than we can to make sure older Americans can take advantage of their services.

This legislation would allow us to use these skilled health professionals. And, according to the Congressional Budget Office, the proposal is budget neutral. The bill creates a reimbursement level slightly lower than the reimbursement rate that a physician would otherwise receive. In other words, the increased access, and resultant increased Medicare cost, are offset by a lower reimbursement rate.

Increased access to health care for senior citizens without increase in cost to the Medicare Program and better use of health manpower training investments—two good reasons for Congress to take the action Senator GRASSLEY and I are proposing.

For the benefit of my colleagues, I ask unanimous consent that a Congressional Budget Office letter speaking to the budgetary impact of my bill be included in the RECORD at the end of my statement.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to:

Mr. BEVILL (at the request of Mr. WRIGHT), for the week of September 9, on account of medical reasons.

H.R. 3244

By Mr. BOEHLERT:

—Page 35, after line 25, insert the following new section:

SEC. 304. The Federal Aviation Administration shall develop and publish in the Federal Register guidelines for the selection of locations for Airway Facility Sector Headquarters Offices to ensure consistent criteria for the selection of locations which require the lowest life-cycle costs consistent with the functions of such Offices.

Redesignate subsequent sections accordingly.

By Mr. COUGHLIN:

—On page 15, line 9 strike the "." and insert the following in lieu thereof: ": Provided further, That none of the funds provided in this Act shall be used for the approval of, or to pay the salary of any person who approves, projects to construct a landfill in the Hudson River as part of an Interstate System highway in New York City."

By Mr. LEWIS of California:

—At the end of the bill add the following new section:

SEC. 326. The limitation on obligations for Federal-aid highways and highway safety construction programs for fiscal year 1986 shall not apply to obligations for the Bypass Highway Demonstration Project and the Los Angeles Freight Transportation Demonstration.

By Mr. RICHARDSON:

—Page 24, line 11, strike out "$616,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$581,400,000".

By Mr. WAXMAN:

Page 41, strike out line 14 and all that follows through page 42, line 4, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(b) None of the funds described in subsection (a) may be made available for any segment of the Downtown Los Angeles to the San Fernando Valley Metro Rail Project unless—

(1) the Southern California Rapid Transit District establishes an independent committee of experts to conduct detailed studies of the entire Metro Rail Project route and the potential hazards associated with the occurrence of methane gas;

(2) before the expiration of the 9-month period following the date of the enactment of this Act, the committee established under paragraph (1) submits recommendations to the Southern California Rapid Transit District regarding any adjustments in the Metro Rail Project route that are required to avoid tunneling into or through any area where the occurrence of methane gas presents a potential hazard;

(3) the Southern California Rapid Transit District submits to the Urban Mass Transportation Administration binding plans that—

(A) incorporate the recommendations of the committee submitted under paragraph (2); and

(B) indicate that no part of the Metro Rail Project will tunnel into or through any zone designated as a potential risk zone or high potential risk zone in the report of the City of Los Angeles dated June 10, 1985, and entitled "Task Force Report on the March 24, 1985 Methane Gas Explosion and Fire in the Fairfax Area"; and

(4) the Urban Mass Transportation Administration approves such plans.

SENATE—Tuesday, September 10, 1985

(Legislative day of Monday, September 9, 1985)

The Senate met at 2 p.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

God of truth and justice, in these perilous days the Nation's welfare deserves the total dedication of its public servants to selfless and, if necessary, sacrificial service. We are the United States and we desperately need leadership that is united in purpose and in action. Grant to all leadership—legislative, executive, and judicial—the will to unity. We do not pray for uniformity, Lord, for we know that unity in its essence is diverse. We rejoice in the diversity which has and must characterize our unitedness. But, dear God, deliver us from attitude and action which polarize, fragmentize and destroy. God of our fathers, protect the unity which is the foundation of our greatness, our strength, our influence nationally. In His name whose mission was to unite all things. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished majority leader is recognized.

RESERVATION OF LEADERSHIP TIME

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I reserve my time under the standing order and also the time of the distinguished minority leader.

SCHEDULE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, there will be special orders in favor of Senators COHEN, MATTINGLY, SYMMS, and PROXMIRE not to exceed 15 minutes each, then routine morning business not to extend beyond 3:30. Then we will turn to Senate Joint Resolution 31. I thought we completed Senate Joint Resolution 31 yesterday, "National Family Week."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PRESSLER). It is the pending business.

Mr. DOLE. It is the pending business. Following disposition of National Family Week, we will turn to S. 47, the school prayer bill, and rollcall votes can be expected later in the day.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR COHEN

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Maine [Mr. COHEN] is recognized for 15 minutes.

U.S. TRADE POLICY

THE U.S. SHOE INDUSTRY

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, less than 2 weeks ago, the President confirmed my belief that this administration has no coherent international trade policy. With his decision to ignore the recommendation of the International Trade Commission to provide import relief to the American shoe industry, the President has written off yet another U.S. industry crippled by foreign imports.

In the face of footwear imports rising to nearly 80 percent of the U.S. market, 21 percent unemployment in the footwear industry, over 125 plant closings in the past year and a half, and a unanimous injury finding by the bipartisan ITC, the President turned his back on the remaining 100,000 American shoeworkers and told them he just does not care enough to help.

As my colleagues know, there exists a mechanism for the objective hearing of an industry's trade grievances and the means to provide assistance to that industry when it can prove that it has been injured by imports. Section 201 of the Trade Act was designed by the Congress to address precisely the crisis faced by the U.S. shoe industry. The President's decision on August 28 has clearly made a mockery of this entire process.

Frankly, the domestic shoe industry could have bypassed the established trade procedure. They could have come directly to Congress, but instead they were encouraged to follow the law, follow the procedure that Congress has set up for industries such as shoes, textiles, or any other industry. They spent hundreds of thousands of dollars pursuing this course of action only to have the President say, "the facts do not matter." I wish he had spoken earlier saying, "Save your money, save your time, because we don't intend to grant relief under any circumstances."

If section 201 of the Trade Act is not a remedy for shoes, where there is almost 78 percent market penetration, then it cannot help any other industry in this country. What we have to recognize is that the administration has said, for all practical purposes, "Don't bother bringing any more 201 actions because even if injury is found, even if the ITC proposes a remedy, you will get no relief from us."

From an ITC which only last year determined that this industry had suffered no injury from imports came a unanimous finding this year that serious injury had occurred. From that same Commission came a majority recommendation for temporary import quotas as the only effective remedy which would allow this industry to recapitalize and modernize, and again become competitive in the world marketplace. Yet the President cast aside the recommendations of his trade policy experts and told the shoe industry that the facts of the case do not matter, and that the industry has wasted its time and money.

In announcing his decision to abandon the American footwear industry, the President directed the Secretary of Labor to work with the affected shoe producing States in developing retraining programs for the thousands of shoe workers whose livelihoods have been shattered by imports.

The cruelest irony, Mr. President, is that this same administration, which has told American workers to sacrifice their jobs at the altar of free trade, has also actively sought the elimination of the very retraining programs it is now promoting.

I say to the President, you cannot have it both ways. Either use your existing authority to combat unfair trading practices and massive import surges which threaten the very existence of our basic industries, or support the programs designed to ease this painful transition.

Mr. President, I come before this body today with a number of my colleagues to tell the President and the American people that there are many in Congress who do care and are prepared to take the necessary actions to insure that a coherent American trade policy is developed for the United States. Absent any substantive action by the President, we in the Congress will step into this void created by the President's inaction and develop a responsible international trade policy which does not sacrifice the jobs of our workers in favor of an abstruse devotion to a trade dogma which ignores the reality of our world trading system. It is a sad commentary on America, Mr. President, when our greatest export is American jobs.

As we in the Congress begin the trade debate, I will be meeting with Senator RUDMAN, who wishes to be associated with my remarks, Senator MITCHELL, Senator DANFORTH, Senator KASTEN, and other members of the Senate footwear caucus to seek to enact legislatively what the administration refused to do under our existing trade relief laws. I had hoped that this would not be necessary. Nevertheless, we have reached an impasse, and I am committed to bringing substantive relief to the American footwear industry.

There was an interesting item in today's Washington Post in reference to some of the complaints being leveled against unfair trade practices by Japan. Japanese officials, for example, have a method of taxing foreign cigarettes based on the sum of their cost plus the average 20-percent tariff paid upon entering Japan. This constitutes a tax on a tax. In responding to this charge, the Japanese officials said:

The tax-on-a-tax system is deeply rooted in the Japanese legal and financial system. It wasn't created as a trade impediment. We need the revenue.

Another item in this particular story concerns Japan's highly protective trade barriers to leather goods coming from the United States. The Japanese argue that their leather industry, like much of their agricultural sector, qualifies for protection because it is composed of large numbers of small, inefficient businesses that could never compete with the United States and other foreign providers.

So here we have a major trading partner, with which we have a trade deficit approaching $50 billion this year, continuing to erect trade barriers. The Japanese justify these trade barriers as necessary to protect their small, inefficient businesses from competition. I would like to know where the administration has been for the last 4 years. We have lost 100,000 jobs in the footwear industry during this past decade. Last year, we saw over 100 plants close, throwing thousands upon thousands of American workers out of their jobs, and suddenly the administration says, "Well, maybe it is time to do something. Now we have to get tough on our trading partners." Mr. President, it comes very late and is awfully little.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article published in today's Washington Post.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Sept. 10, 1985]

REAGAN TRADE DEMANDS SEEN TESTING JAPAN

(By John Burgess)

TOKYO, September 9.—Politics and Japanese tax law will make it extremely difficult for Japan to meet demands voiced by President Reagan this weekend for reforms in its market for cigarettes and leather, Japanese officials said today.

But the officials suggested that Reagan's call might turn out to be positive news if it helps reduce pressure in Congress for far-reaching legislation to cut Japan's mounting trade surplus by hindering its exports to the United States.

On Saturday, Reagan announced he had decided to implement "countermeasures" against Japan, the European Community, South Korea and Brazil if they did not stop "unfair trade practices" in a variety of product lines.

Japanese officials expressed surprise at the categories Reagan specified in Japan's case: cigarettes, leather and leather shoes. They have been the subject of negotiations between Washington and Tokyo for years.

In the Japanese view, the market for cigarettes was almost totally liberalized on April 1, when distribution and promotion of cigarettes was thrown open to competition after decades of control by a government monopoly.

However, foreign cigarette companies, which now account for only about 2.3 percent of Japan's $10 billion-a-year market for cigarettes, contend that significant impediments remain. They argue that, in a truly free market, they could build up to about one-quarter of the sales.

In particular, they point to Japan's practice of taxing foreign cigarettes based on the sum of their cost plus the average 20 percent tariff paid upon entering Japan. This constitutes a "tax on a tax" they say and makes their products too expensive.

They complain that the former monopoly agency, now recast as a private company, retains sole rights to produce cigarettes in Japan and contend that it still has a de facto monopoly on distribution.

Japanese officials respond that the tax-on-a-tax system is deeply rooted in the Japanese legal and financial system. "It was not created as a trade impediment," a Foreign Ministry official said. "We need the revenue."

Any shift in tobacco policy comes slowly in Japan, in part because of the influence of Japan's 75,000 tobacco farmers within the ruling Liberal Democratic Party. Tobacco is Japan's second-largest cash crop, after rice.

Officials here concede, however, that leather is a highly protected market. Strict import quotas are in place. Last year, officials of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade ruled that quotas on leather were illegal.

Japan pledged to remove them. However, the United States has protested Japanese suggestions that the new system will be a dual-tariff schedule in which anything imported after a certain target level had been reached would be assessed tariffs at a higher rate. "It would be at least as effective a restriction," said one U.S. official here.

The Japanese argue that the leather industry, like much of the agricultural sector, qualifies for protection because it is composed of large numbers of small inefficient businesses that never could compete with U.S. and other foreign producers.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, shock and outrage are the words I would use to describe my reaction to the President's failure to approve global quotas on imported footwear. The glaring absence of any meaningful White House trade policy has once again been demonstrated, this time at the expense of the Nation's footwear workers and their families.

Arkansas is 10th in producing footwear in the United States, and footwear ranks first among all manufacturing industries in 7 Arkansas counties, 5 having a population under 25,000. Arkansas shoe workers want to keep their jobs, and I intend to do everything I can to see that factory doors stay open.

Congress must act now—since the administration has shirked its responsibility—to give the footwear industry a chance to survive and prosper. The American Footwear Industry Recovery Act, of which I am an original cosponsor, accomplishes this important goal and is pending in the Senate Finance Committee. Under the bill, S. 848, quotas would be implemented for 8 years. Although I consider the substance and duration of import relief under this legislation negotiable, the absolute and substantial reduction of imported shoes is not.

Mr. President, it is a continuing mystery to me how a President who claims to advocate a day's work for a day's pay can so easily dismiss the futures of thousands of American citizens who only wish to work hard, provide for their families, and stay on the job. And what does the President do when these workers come to him asking their leader for help? He turns his back, opens every door but the one with the shoe worker behind it, and welcomes a flood of imports into our country.

Shoe workers across this country have a right to demand their government acknowledge and respond to their plight. With imaginative spirit they symbolized the despair prevalent in the industry by sending partial shoes to Members of Congress, this representing the small portion of the domestic market which remains open to American industry. Later, they sent soles of shoes with passionate pleas inscribed on them, asking us to convey to the President the need for positive action on imports. Today, empty shoe boxes, emphasizing that the President gave the footwear industry nothing in his recent decision, arrive in my office to insure that we not forget the seriousness of the situation.

Well, Congress let the President know. I have lost track of the letters I have signed to the White House asking for help, asking only for a change—and the President and his advisers ignored these requests. It is clear now that the solution to this problem is not going to come through administrative action. Real progress can result, however, if Congress taps the creative spirit of the shoe workers of America, adopts their passion and persistence, and enacts a trade law which addresses their problems.

Mr. President, I look forward to meeting in the coming weeks with other members of the Senate footwear caucus and with representatives of the footwear industry to discuss a coordinated legislative strategy to respond to this critical situation. Let those of us in Congress who believe in a future for this proud and important American industry stand up now and act.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from Maine yield?

Mr. COHEN. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SASSER. I thank the Senator from Maine for yielding.

U.S. TRADE POLICY NONEXISTENT

Mr. President, I rise today to express my shock and frustration at the insensitivity shown by the President in rejecting the advice of the International Trade Commission and refusing to grant import relief to the domestic footwear industry.

Two points emerge crystal clear from this announcement. The first is that this administration has no coherent trade policy and the second is that our trade laws are not working.

This administration is so blinded by the illusion of free trade they cannot see that they are presiding over the deindustrialization of America in the name of ideological purity. There is no such thing in today's international marketplace as free trade and it is time the administration recognizes it. Virtually every country in the world assists its domestic industries with subsidies, with currency manipulation, or with quotas.

It is time for this administration to wake up from its dreamworld of completely free and unfettered trade. There is a real world out there of tough practical choices. We simply must not be afraid to enter the real world marketplace and take steps to preserve our domestic manufacturing industries. We can enforce reasonable and effective trade laws without raising impenetrable trade barriers or evoking the specter of the disastrous Smoot-Hawley Tariff.

While the administration remains wedded to an outmoded economic theory, my constituents are losing their jobs—and this decision means more of them will lose their jobs.

The administration's action on the question of shoe imports is a signal, I think, a signal to our trading partners and trading adversaries around the world that they can continue to eat our lunch, and it is a free lunch so far as they are concerned.

I think it is a signal to my colleagues in Congress that if something is to be done to save the jobs of American workers and to save American industries and to stop the deindustrialization of this country, it will be up to us in Congress to address this problem in a reasonable and moderate fashion.

As I travel around my State, I continually see the effects of shoe imports on our citizens. Seven shoe facilities were closed in Tennessee last year. In these towns, shoe workers are already out of work or will be put out of work in the near future due to plant closings. I talked to individuals who have lost their jobs in the communities where they have lived and worked for years—and they face the future with no prospects of new jobs.

There were over 100 communities across the Nation who shared this devastating experience in the last year.

The second fact apparent from this decision is that our trade laws are simply not working. If ever an example were needed of what constitutes serious injury due to imports, the nonrubber footwear industry provides it.

Between 1968 and 1984, imports increased 233 percent. The net decline in the number of plants totaled 507, costing over 112,700 workers their jobs. Production has fallen to the lowest levels since the Depression. Last year in Tennessee alone, seven shoe plants closed.

The footwear industry followed the procedures laid down in our trade laws to prove injury—and they proved it to the satisfaction of every single Commissioner on the International Trade Commission. They also offered a comprehensive 5-year plan which the industry agreed to undertake during the quota period. If the trade laws will not work for this industry, it is doubtful they will work for any industry.

When Congress wrote the trade laws it intended they be used. We did not intend them as a rhetorical statement whose practical application was to be avoided at all costs.

Far more is at stake here than the fate of a single industry. Frankly, we are dealing with the credibility of our entire system of trade law, with the viability of our most basic American industries, and with the future health of our national economy.

In the next few weeks the Senate will be conducting an extensive trade debate. If we cannot rely on our trade laws to protect our industrial base, then those laws need to be changed. If the administration has no trade policy, then the Congress will write one for them.

The belief that there is no middle ground between absolute free trade and absolute protectionism is largely responsible for the trade crisis we face today—a crisis that has put literally millions of working Americans on the unemployment rolls and has thrown our agricultural sector into its sharpest nosedive since the Great Depression.

It is time we deal with the trade issue as it exists in the real world. We can assist our industries—as other nations do—without starting an international trade war. I intend to be an active participant in the upcoming trade debate as we work to level the playing field for our Nation's industries.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COHEN. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Arkansas.

CHALLENGE FOR THE SENATE ON FOOTWEAR IMPORTS

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Maine for arranging this time for some of us who are deeply concerned about the prospects for the U.S. footwear industry in light of the President's recent refusal to provide sorely needed trade relief for that industry.

I am appalled that the President failed to provide any relief whatsoever. The International Trade Commission proposed to limit shoe imports to 63 percent of the market, and that was the very least figure that should have been adopted. If anything, the President should have strengthened this remedy. Rather, the President has made it clear to the rest of the world that the United States will continue to be a dumping ground for their products, no matter how many of our own workers and industries may be hurt.

Just 2 days after the President refused to help the import-battered domestic shoe industry, the Commerce Department released figures showing that footwear imports continued to flood the American market in July. So far this year, shoe imports have risen 13.4 percent over 1984 levels. In July, 79 million pairs of shoes entered the United States and that was down slightly from 85 million pairs in July 1984, the second highest monthly level ever recorded. As of this moment, 77 percent of all shoes sold in this country are imported.

At the same time that imports have been dramatically increasing, our own domestic industry has been disintegrating. In 1984, which was a banner year for national economic growth, domestic production of footwear fell by over 13 percent, and so far this year, domestic production has declined 22 percent. Since 1979, domestic production has fallen from 400 million pairs to under 300 million pairs in 1984, a decline of 25 percent. The most recent year, other than 1984, that domestic production fell below 300 million pairs was 1921.

In 1984, over 100 footwear plants closed nationwide—1 year, 100 plants. This represents a direct job loss of 7,000 footwear employees in 1984 alone, and nearly 23,000 since 1980. Indirect job losses, a continuously falling work week and growing "temporary" layoffs further exacerbate the hardships imposed on footwear employees. Are these 23,000 people who have lost their jobs since 1980 not as important as the roughly 1,000 people the President chose to protect who work for the Harley-Davidson Motorcycle Co.? Where is the difference?

In my home State of Arkansas, the shoe industry directly employs about 5,600 people. The footwear industry is the first or second largest employer in 12 Arkansas counties. Since 1980, we have lost eight plants and three were closed just this past year. We have lost over 1,000 direct footwear jobs in Arkansas since 1980, and 2,600 jobs since 1976. Counting indirect employment effects, we have lost nearly 4,500 Arkansas jobs in the past 8 years.

For the rural Arkansas communities that are involved, the impact of a plant closing can be catastrophic in the local economy. The people who are displaced in these rural communities simply have no alternative sources of employment. Of the 12 Arkansas counties where footwear is a leading industry, 8 have populations of less than 25,000. Almost two-thirds of all footwear workers are female, more than one-half are age 50 or older, and less than half have completed high school. They simply have nowhere to go when a plant shuts down.

The footwear industry is in serious trouble, and the President does not seem to care.

If we cannot provide relief when 77 percent of all the shoes in this country are being imported, then no other industry need apply to the International Trade Commission. It is discouraging in the extreme.

If the President does not care whether imported shoes decimate the U.S. shoe industry, the U.S. Senate can vote to impose the quotas recommended by the International Trade Commission; not a good solution, and not one which I wish we had to take.

But if we have to do it, we should do it, and we can fill some of the loopholes that the International Trade Commission left in its order.

The President has challenged Congress to do something, and we should accept the challenge.

I thank the Senator again for yielding.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for his statement and support for this entire measure.

Mr. President, I shall ask a couple of simple questions.

Is there any other nation in the world that would tolerate a 77-percent import penetration of its market?

Is there any other nation in the world whose leaders would look at a major industry over the years that is now in the process of dying and say: "Too bad. Tough luck. That is the way the world works"?

Is there any other nation in the world whose leadership would say: "Go vote with your feet. Just get out of Maine, get out of Arkansas, leave Missouri. Go out west"?

Mr. BUMPERS. Vote with your bare feet.

Mr. COHEN. "Go out west in bare feet and go to Silicon Valley. Perhaps you can pick up some computer training jobs there."

The difficulty with the vote-with-your-feet type of argument, as the Senator from Arkansas just pointed out, is, there is no place to go. These people are basically low income and the low scale of education the Senator from Arkansas has pointed out. More than half of them are women. Most are over the age of 50. They have no place to go and no jobs to get when they go there.

So for the administration to adopt the posture of "go vote with your feet," it would seem to be the essence of callousness, indifference, and disregard for the over 100,000 people who have lost their jobs and the 100,000 remaining who will lose their jobs in this industry as a result of the President's decision.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I rise today to voice my support, not only for an American industry which is in deep trouble because of imports, but also for the 22,000 Americans and 4,000 Wisconsinites who are in danger of losing their jobs.

There was a time in America when everything we purchased was made or crafted in the United States, right down to our shoes; 10 years ago, domestic shoes accounted for the major share of the American market. What was a robust industry only 10 years ago is now struggling to stay alive.

Today, you will rarely find the words, "Made in the U.S.A." on the soles of your shoes. You are more apt to find that your shoes were made in Brazil or Spain or Italy, because we have allowed the flood of imported footwear to go unchecked. To make matters worse, these nations have imposed tough quotas on American-made shoes that make it virtually impossible for us to export to them. Now, those imports account for a staggering 77 percent of the domestic market.

Some would argue that American products are no longer as well made. Well, although my colleagues may disagree with the specifics, I know that the best shoes in the world are made in Wisconsin. The reason why the American shoe industry is in peril is because we have not had a balanced and fair trade policy.

I have always been a firm believer in free trade, but I also strongly believe that trade must be fair. Certainly, free trade must not come at the expense of fair trade. And until other nations are willing to trade freely with us by allowing American products in without restrictions, we must literally put our foot down.

Mr. President, as I stated earlier, it is not just a great industry that is at stake here. We are talking about the livelihood of 22,000 Americans and their families. Already, this imbalance of trade has resulted in the loss of thousands of jobs in Wisconsin. Thousands more will be lost if nothing is done.

Over the past 10 years, 14 shoe factories in Wisconsin alone have closed their doors for good. Most recently, hundreds of workers were left jobless by the closing of Chippewa Shoes in Chippewa Falls, WI, at the end of last year. Now, other factories in the State face a similar fate. There is no time to lose.

The administration had a real opportunity to solve this problem when the ITC recommended protection of the domestic industry through import limitations. But on August 28, the White House refused to act.

The ball is now in our court. Congress must act to make the difference while there is still time. I am happy to lend my support to legislative relief.

Mr. President, only by reintroducing fairness into American international footwear trade will we be able to save the jobs of thousands around the United States that will otherwise be lost.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I join with my colleagues today to discuss the President's recent decision to refuse relief to the American footwear industry.

The International Trade Commission's May recommendation to the President has been ignored. The Commissioners had overturned previous rulings and by a vote of 5 to 0, they found that the footwear industry had been seriously injured by foreign imports.

The Commission, an independent, bipartisan group, is required to engage in extensive research, conduct specialized studies and maintain a high degree of expertise in all matters relating to the commerce and international trade policies of the country. The Commission evaluates appeals for import relief from affected industries and determines whether an article is being imported in such increased quantities as to be a substantial cause or threat of serious injury to the domestic industry.

In the case of the footwear industry, the Commission found that such relief was warranted. Indeed, their unanimous ruling in favor of the industry reflects their firm conviction that import relief is both necessary and desirable.

Why, then, are these laws on the books? This is a textbook example of a situation that qualifies for section 201, Trade Act, relief.

Without this relief, the collapse of this vital industry is almost assured. An additional 220,000 jobs may be lost, many of them in my own State of Tennessee, which is the fifth most important footwear-producing State in the Nation.

We must not turn our backs on this important industry at this crucial juncture. Otherwise, it will soon cease to exist. I urge my colleages to think long and well about the administration's disregard of our trade laws and the grave effects such policy will have on one of our most important basic industries.

IMPORTED FOOTWEAR QUOTA LEGISLATION

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my Senate colleagues today in voicing the imperative need for immediate action on the import surge that is destroying the domestic footwear industry.

Since 1981, when the President made his first decision against the footwear industry and its workers by rejecting the recommendation of the International Trade Commission that the modest import relief then in place be continued for a couple of years, the industry has been subjected to one blow after another.

Developing nations targeted footwear manufacture and export to the American market as a quick way to industrialize and provide their own people with jobs and stepped in to take up the slack during the period of orderly marketing agreements.

When that modest relief measure was allowed to expire, the market was wide open at a time when other nations were closing their own markets and aggressively targeting the American consumer as their final purchaser. Imports soared immediately to some 60 percent of the domestic market and slacked off only in the face of the 1982 recession. That recession saw shoe workers join millions of others thrown out of jobs many had held for decades. It saw many shoe companies close as the surge of corporate bankruptcies reached new records.

But the difference was that in the economic recovery that followed the recession, the closed factories did not reopen. The lost jobs were not recovered. And domestic footwear production shrank, even as imports surged to take advantage of the economic recovery.

With footwear imports reaching an unprecedented three-quarters of the domestic market, with the governments of virtually every other potential market nation limiting imports either directly or by indirect trade barriers, this Nation has become virtually the world's only free market for footwear manufacture.

And given that the vast bulk of footwear manufactured in the world is manufactured for export markets, not domestic consumption, our markets have been flooded with products that can find no other outlet.

It is precisely such a situation that our domestic trade laws were designed to address. The footwear industry took its case to our International Trade Commission, exactly as envisaged by law, argued it there and won the recognition of the Commission that imports were a major cause of its problems.

That determination of fact is required by our trade laws to be made before policy is established. That is as it should be.

But what our trade laws do not assure—and what I am certain no Congress has ever intended—is that following a clear determination of fact, no policy is established.

Yet, that is exactly the stance President Reagan took when he directly rejected any import relief whatsoever for this beleaguered industry.

It is clear that in the absence of White House concern about jobs lost, companies bankrupted and entire communities economically threatened, Congress has a responsibility to act.

We cannot and should not ask one small sector of our population—the people who work in shoe factories, the companies that employ those workers, and the community where shoe manufacturing is an economic mainstay—to pay the entire price for a national policy.

During the 1982 recession, the war on inflation was won, not by supply-side economic theory, but purely on the backs of the men and women thrown out of jobs.

During this 1985 trade crisis, the administration is apparently again willing to wage war on the trade deficit with the livelihood of ordinary working people and the families that depend on those paychecks.

There is only one answer. We must act now to change the law before the administration's total lack of any coherent trade policy plunges even more people into economic disaster.

The 1974 Trade Act, which the President has refused to invoke, was purposefully designed to give the executive branch the freedom it needed to manage international trade relations to the benefit of our Nation by encouraging other nations to lower tariff barriers to imports and relax nontariff import barriers of various sorts.

But instead of using that freedom during its 5 years in office to open other markets and move toward a worldwide regime of free trade, this administration has encouraged imports as a way to hold down inflation, regardless of the cost in American jobs and long-term economic health.

We are witnessing and have been witnessing for 5 years the not-so-very gradual dismantling of our manufacturing economy, as our jobs and production are exported overseas.

Trade policy by this administration has consisted of a series of reluctant and belated actions taken only in the face of the most overwhelming and protracted public concern.

But that is not good enough. Thousands of workers can be idled before public concern is aroused. Hundreds of companies can close plants and go out of business before this administration will act. And if the industry in question is a small and regionalized one—as is the case with footwear manufacture—not even the most protracted and painful crisis has proven to be enough to catch the President's attention.

In these circumstances, it is clear that Congress must recapture an element of its control over the trade policy area that the administration cannot be relied on to exercise.

We must change our laws to make mandatory that which is now discretionary, to narrow the options available so that factual circumstances, not individual preferences, will dictate actions, to ensure relief when the conditions warrant relief, not to raise false hopes.

This Senate and this Congress must act and must act soon, not only on direct relief for the footwear industry, but on a wider scale to make our trade laws reflect the will of the Congress and the realities of the international trading world.

PROTECTIONIST MEASURES FOR THE FOOTWEAR INDUSTRY

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, in recent weeks the plight of shoe producers and employees has received great attention in Washington, in the press and around the country. More specifically, the question of granting relief, in the form of protectionist measures, to the ailing footwear industry has been considered by policymakers within the administration and legislators on Capitol Hill. I am gratified that so much energy has been devoted to a consideration of what, if anything, can be done to save shoe-worker jobs threatened by import competition. Nevertheless, I applaud the President's decision to refrain from granting quotas to the industry.

This assessment was certainly not an easy one for me to make. In New Hampshire, the nonrubber footwear firms rank first in jobs among all manufacturing industries. It ranks first among all manufacturing in Strafford County and among the top three industries in five of the other nine counties. As of May of this year, the nonrubber footwear industry employed 7,900 people in 28 plants. The footwear industry historically has been important to New Hampshire's economic health; opposing quotas for the industry does not win one many friends.

Much has been said about the International Trade Commission's report to the President on the footwear industry, but little has been mentioned about the dissenting view of Vice Chairman Susan Liebeler. I recommend to my colleagues and all who have an interest in this issue her views on remedy options for the industry. Vice Chairman Liebeler argues against protectionism for a very simple reason: given the results of protectionism for the industry in the past; the long-term outlook for the industry's competitiveness vis-a-vis low cost foreign producers, and the extent to which domestic manufacturers can be expected to invest in state-of-the-art machinery, the footwear industry does not meet the very stringent criteria set forth by the Congress in section 201 of the Trade Act.

Those criteria stipulate that "import relief actually prevent or remedy serious injury." If protectionism only delays the injury, then relief is not in order. Based on the above-mentioned factors—precedent, long-term outlook and investment predictions—Ms. Liebeler concludes that protectionism is neither an effective nor socially beneficial solution to the footwear industry's woes.

Additionally, it is important to remember, that there is another constituency out there, whose needs and interests are just as important as those of the footwear industry. I am speaking of consumers—230 million Americans including the 1 million who live in New Hampshire. Their needs in this case are affordable shoes at the lowest price. This is especially true for lower income Americans, who desperately need to watch and control the cost of everything they buy, including necessities such as shoes. Economic studies included in Ms. Liebeler's opinion indicate that each $14,000 shoe job saved would incur siocietal costs upwards of $35,000, and that consumers in this country would pay an additional $832 million per year for shoes. Clearly, protectionism is not in the interest of the country at large. In the case of the shoe industry, President Reagan has spoken out in favor of the consumer.

Once again, I commend this Ms. Liebeler's assessment to the attention of my colleagues. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of her opinion be included in the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

There being no objection, the opinion was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMEDY VIEWS OF VICE CHAIRMAN SUSAN W. LIEBELER

(Part Two—Remedy)

I. INTRODUCTION

The Commission has made a unanimous affirmative determination in the injury phase of this investigation, thus I must now consider what remedy recommendation to make to the President. The purpose of the escape clause is to provide "temporary relief for an industry suffering from serious injury, or the threat thereof, so that the industry will have sufficient time to adjust to the freer international competition." [1] Section 201 authorizes a petition for import relief "for the purpose of facilitating orderly adjustment to import competition." [2] An industry seeking escape clause relief "must include a statement describing the specific purpose for which import relief is being sought, which may include such objectives as facilitating the transfer of resources to alternative uses and other means of adjustment to new conditions of competition." [3]

The operative language of section 201(d)(1) is as follows:

"If the Commission finds with respect to any article, as a result of its investigation, the serious injury or threat thereof described in subsection (b) of this section, it shall—

"(A) find the amount of the increase in, or imposition of, any duty or import restriction on such article which is necessary to prevent or remedy such injury, or

"(B) if it determines that adjustment assistance under parts 2, 3, and 4 of this subchapter can effectively remedy such injury, recommend the provision of such assistance, and shall include such findings or recommendations in its report to the President." [4]

The statute makes it clear that an affirmative determination by the Commission does not open the door to unrestrained relief. Any import relief [5] recommended can only be the amount "necessary to prevent or remedy such injury."

Section 201 contemplates two bases upon which relief can be granted. First, the domestic industry can seek relief to facilitate the "more orderly" transfer of resources out of the industry than would otherwise take place. In such a case, the domestic industry will still have to shrink, and any relief granted is intended only to make the transition more orderly.

The second basis on which relief can be granted is to prevent or remedy serious injury or threat to the domestic industry. The domestic footwear industry has not argued that it wants a more orderly exit from the industry. Instead it argued that relief will enable it to make new investment so that the market share of domestic producers will increase after the relief has expired.

Import relief can always delay the injury during the period of relief. The statute, however, requires that the import relief actually prevent or remedy serious injury. If import relief would not enable the industry to be competitive in the marketplace after relief expires, then there is no import relief that the Commission can recommend to the President.

II. MY RELIEF RECOMMENDATION

The domestic footwear industry is experiencing a major contraction. Thus, any relief must prevent or remedy such a contraction by enabling the industry to achieve a long-run equilibrium at a level of output substantially above what it could have achieved without import relief.

No import relief

The problem of the domestic footwear industry, however, is the long-run comparative advantage held by foreign producers. Thus, the only import relief that would prevent serious injury to the domestic industry is a permanent import restriction. The Commission is only empowered, however, to recommend temporary relief.[6] It is not, however, the purpose of Section 201 to establish permanent barriers against fairly-traded imports. Rather, its purpose is to provide a domestic industry with temporary relief to adjust to new conditions of competition from imports. Temporary import relief can prevent or remedy injury caused by short-run problems.

Imported shoes are less costly to produce than domestic shoes and they are likely to remain so.[7] This is a result of our nation's unmatched productivity and growth. Nations will, and should, specialize in the production of those commodities in which they have a comparative advantage. Fortunately, our country has a large capital stock which tends to provide labor with many productive employments. Our comparative advantage is in the production of goods that use a high ratio of capital to labor. Shoes, however, are produced with a low ratio of capital to labor. Therefore, American footwear cannot be produced as cheaply as foreign footwear.

The availability of inexpensive imports permits consumers to purchase less expensive shoes, and allows the valuable capital and labor used in the footwear industry to shift to more productive pursuits.[8] The decline of the American footwear industry is part of a dynamic but sometimes painful process. Congress, by only providing for temporary relief, has recognized that our continued prosperity depends on our willingness to accept such adjustments.

The industry has sought so-called temporary import relief before. The Commission has conducted approximately 170 investigations relating to this industry. In addition to 155 adjustment assistance investigations conducted between 1963 and 1974 under Section 301 of the Trade Expansion Act of 1962, the Commission has conducted one escape clause investigation under the predecessor to Section 201, two Section 701 investigations, two section 731 investigations, and five section 751 investigations. In 1982 the industry also initiated investigations with the U.S. Trade Representative under Section 301 of the 1974 Trade Act.

This is the fourth footwear case under section 201 and so far the industry has obtained relief twice. The 1975 petition resulted in adjustment assistance, the 1976 case resulted in Orderly Marketing Agreements (OMS's) with Taiwan and Korea, the two major suppliers of imported footwear. Although the industry tried to postpone the expiration of those OMA's,[9] President Reagan did not seek to extend them and they expired in 1981.

The escape clause is aimed at giving temporary relief to an industry so that it will have enough time to adjust to freer international competition.[10] This industry has had ample time and opportunity to adjust to freer international competition. In its 1976 brief to the Commission in Investigation No. TA-201-7, Nonrubber Footwear, petitioners, represented by the same law firm that represents the domestic industry in the current proceeding, made essentially the same plea for "temporary" relief:

"Petitioners recognize that the Trade Act of 1974 only authorizes temporary relief from the influx of imports for the purposes of permitting an industry to adjust to new conditions of competition. The imposition of temporary mandatory quotas for the full period permitted under the terms of the Act would do just that by enabling the domestic industry the respite necessary to regain its economic health and provide more vigorous competition to foreign produced footwear at the termination of such relief.

"In the interim, increased orders to domestic producers would not only generate increased profits because of the sheer rise in the volume of sales but additional orders would also enable domestic producers to return to efficient levels of capacity utilization, thereby increasing productivity. Such profits could then be ultilized for capital expansion and additional research and development, thereby leading to greater technological and marketing strength.

"In addition, normal economic forces would work to the benefit of the domestic industry so that it would be more competitive in terms of price by the time the quotas were removed." [11]

Speaking through the same counsel in the next footwear case, petitioners again argued that "temporary" relief would enable them to become more productive and competitive:

"On the assumption that the industry is given the quota relief for the five-year period, what actions can be expected of domestic shoe manufacturers to enable them to become more competitive with imports once the transitional period of restraint is terminated?

"In specific terms, we would suggest that domestic footwear manufacturers, restored to greater confidence over their economic future, would make new investments in plant and equipment thereby making the industry even more productive and efficient.

"Greater sales can be anticipated under the quota program which will lead to a return to efficient levels of capacity utilization with longer runs resulting in economies of scale and lower unit production costs which would thus strengthen the industry's overall competitive position. This should also result in a strengthened financial position for companies in the industry, permitting them to attract more capital and more reasonable interest rates, thus enabling them to invest in new plant and equipment and to pay for additional research and development—both technical and marketing. Greater technological and marketing strength will, thus, be an inevitable result improving the industry's competitive position even further. At the same time, there will be a narrowing of price gap between domestic and foreign shoes." [12]

The industry is once again arguing that during the period of import relief they will modernize their plants and equipment and increase productivity. The domestic nonrubber footwear industry has presented an ambitious five-year $697 million plan to reduce costs and become more competitive with imports by developing and applying new technologies throughout the industry. The industry claims that by implementing technologies already within its grasp it will improve domestic productivity by 25 percent, thereby eliminating the 15 percent price advantage of imported footwear.

If I believed that: (1) import relief would allow the industry to implement this plan; (2) the industry would not be able to implement this plan without import relief: and (3) that the plan would allow the industry to achieve a long-run equilibrium characterized by significantly greater production than it would have without relief, then the statute would compel me to recommend the import relief necessary to realize the plan.

The success of the domestic industry's plans rests on several questionable assumptions. First, the petitioners assume that the price advantage of imported footwear that the domestic industry must overcome is only 15 percent [13] but respondents have suggested that the price advantage runs closer to 25 percent.[14] The price advantage enjoyed by foreign footwear producers appears to be considerably higher than 15 percent.[15] Under such a cost advantage, domestic footwear producers may not regain a competitive advantage even if they make the proposed modernization expenditures and even if these expenditures reduce costs by the amount indicated by the petitioners. Second, the petitioners claim that the effects of their proposed modernization efforts will reduce domestic producters' costs by 11 percent and, thereby, allow domestic producers to eliminate most of the 15 percent price advantage of imported footwear.[16] This prediction comes from the Kaplan report, however, which was based on the production of five types of leather shoes only,[17] not on nonleather shoes which account for a significant portion of the United States nonrubber footwear market, especially in the low cost segment which is supplied primarily by imports. Because the major nonleather upper materials are much cheaper than leather, neither the material savings nor labor savings suggested by results of the Kaplan report may apply to nonleather footwear like plastic and fiber shoes. Third, the petitioners assume that the foreign producers will not improve their productivity over the next five years, while domestic productivity will jump by 25 percent as a result of import relief.[18] It is more likely, however, that foreign production will continue to increase. Productivity in the Taiwan and Korean footwear industries, the two largest foreign suppliers of footwear to the United States market, has reportedly increased by 4 to 7 percent annually during the last several years while domestic productivity has remained relatively unchanged. It is not clear why one would not expect this trend to continue. Fourth, the petitioners assume that the domestic industry will spend about $697 million in efforts to reduce their production and distribution costs. Although it is difficult to predict how much the industry will actually spend to modernize, individual firm responses to the Commission's confidential questionnaires indicate that domestic producers plan to spend only about $100 million on these efforts during the requested relief period.[19]

Finally, there is a fundamental question of what connection there is between import relief for the footwear industry and investment in new plant and equipment that will make the industry competitive. If good investment opportunities are available, they will be exploited regardless of any relief provided for this industry. It might be argued that the domestic footwear industry could become more competitive if it could modernize; and that it needs the more favorable cash flow generated by quotas to reinvest in the industry and to encourage financial institutions to lend to the footwear industry.

If modernization of plant and equipment presents favorable investment opportunities for the footwear industry, the capital market would provide financing. Although the increased cash flow which could result from import relief would be likely to improve the equity portion of the footwear producers' balance sheets and make it more likely that they could borrow funds or reinvest, there are other means by which these producers could obtain investment funds. They could issue additional equity or merge with an equity-rich firm. Alternatively, if the market believes that good investment opportunities exist in the footwear industry, but that the managers of some footwear firms are not up to their task, then such firms would be ripe for takeover.

If there is investment in plant and equipment that can be expected to generate a competitive rate of return, then someone, whether it is the current producers or others, will find it in their self-interest to make those investments. To believe that the revenues generated by import relief are necessary to finance this new investment reflects a fundamental misunderstanding of the way in which capital markets operate. If the investment is worthwhile, it does not matter whether the funds used to purchase the investment come from retained earnings, new debentures, bank loans, or new equity ownership. In our highly sophisticated capital market, a project which would ensure the profitable survival of the footwear industry would not go unfunded.

If investment in the domestic industry is not rational because expected costs are likely to exceed expected revenues, then: (1) it is not in the industry's interest to make such investment; and (2) it is not in the nation's interest that the industry do so. If a firm cannot profitably make such an investment, it means that the resources can more productively and profitably be employed elsewhere in the economy.[20] In spite of the efforts by the domestic industry to suppress imports, in spite of the "temporary" relief, in the form of OMA's with Korea and Taiwan, and in spite of the present 9 percent tariff on nonrubber footwear, the industry has been shrinking. Between 1981 and 1984, 207 plants closed (gross), 94 of these closing occurred last year. The closing of unprofitable plants is a necessary adjustment. Import relief at this stage will retard this process and encourage entry into a shrinking industry.

I do not believe the domestic industry's investment plan is credible or viable. The market has already indicated that additional investment or growth in this industry is unwise. Because there is no temporary relief which would prevent or remedy serious injury. I recommend that no import relief be given to this industry.

III. ADJUSTMENT ASSISTANCE

I do, however, recommend that the President provide adjustment assistance [21] to the domestic footwear industry under Parts 2 and 4 of Chapter Twelve of the Trade Act of 1974 (Adjustment Assistance For Workers and Communities).[22] "The Commission shall . . . (B) if it determines that adjustment assistance under parts 2, 3 and 4 of this subchapter can effectively remedy such injury, recommend the provision of such assistance . . ."[23]

The Senate Report clarifies a number of points about the adjustment assistance program. First, it states that the Commission cannot recommend both import relief and adjustment assistance.[24] Second, the Committee states that the addition of the provision concerning adjustment assistance was intended "to permit the Commission to recommend adjustment assistance . . . in circumstances in which the Commission determines that such assistance would be a more effective remedy . . . than import relief.[25] Since the provision of certain types of adjustment assistance encourages workers and firms to exit from an industry, it would appear that Congress intended to give adjustment assistance to ease the pain of exit from an industry. This is a far more effective remedy for industries such as footwear which face irreversible decline.

In providing for Trade Adjustment Assistance, Congress has decided it is appropriate to redistribute wealth from the rest of society to participants in import-competing industries.[26] The statute does not permit me to consider the costs of such programs. It is, however, appropriate for me to consider the effect of the various programs on the domestic footwear industry, since the President may decide to provide trade adjustment assistance.[27]

A declining industry presents its participants with new decisions. An unemployed worker must decide whether to (1) retire; (2) wait to be recalled to work; (3) relocate; (4) obtain training in a new skill in a different industry; (5) seek and accept alternate employment; or (6) withdraw from the work force.

Each affected individual is best placed to weigh the costs and benefits of the various alternatives and make the choice that maximizes his or her expected welfare. There is no reason to believe that all workers should obtain retraining or seek relocation, or any of the other alternatives. The life circumstances of each individual differ, and consequently, their optimal choices differ. Government programs distort the underlying costs and benefits of the choice set faced by displaced workers by paying them for certain choices rather than others.

The adjustment assistance program offers unemployed workers several types of payments, including Trade Readjustment Allowances (Supplementary Unemployment Benefits);[28] employment services;[29] training;[30] job search allowances;[31] and relocation allowances.[32]

The critics of adjustment assistance[33] note that less than 1 percent of individuals affected received either job search or relocation assistance[34] and treat that as evidence of the failure of the program. The program is designed to help people find new work. It has clearly failed to do that, and in fact, with its heavy emphasis on supplementary unemployment benefits, it undoubtedly has encouraged workers to remain unemployed longer than they would otherwise.[35] This result is certainly perverse if the program's purpose is the rapid re-employment of the displaced workers.

Since Congress intended for Trade Adjustment Assistance to help displaced workers find new employment, I recommend that it be aimed at that purpose in this case. Employment services, training, job search cost reimbursement allowances and relocation allowances should be provided for footwear workers.[36] These forms of adjustment assistance are least costly and encourage workers to find new employment.

I also recommend adjustment assistance to communities under Part 4 of Chapter 12 of the Trade Act of 1974.[37] Such assistance would provide loan guarantees to private parties to invest in production facilities in a community in which footwear plants have had to cut back or close operations. Particularly in Maine, where footwear firms are often the major employer in small, somewhat isolated communities, such loan guarantees will diminish the likelihood that whole communities would be injured by the closing of a shoe factory.[38]

I do not recommend adjustment assistance for firms under Part 3 of Chapter 12 of the Trade Act of 1974.[39] This provides for technical assistance, loans and loan guarantees to firms. Payments to firms will retard rather than encourage the industry's adjustment to import competition, and would work at cross purposes to adjustment assistance to workers.

IV. IMPORT RELIEF

A. Available forms of relief

Although I have determined that there is no relief that would prevent or remedy the serious injury to the domestic nonrubber footwear industry, the Commission majority has recommended quotas. Since the Commission has made an affirmative determination in the injury phase of these proceedings and since the Commission majority has recommended quotas, the President now has the option of providing import relief.

If the President decides to provide import relief, he can use any one or more of the following tools:

(1) Proclaim an increase in, or imposition of, any duty on the article causing or threatening to cause serious injury to such industry;

(2) Proclaim a tariff rate quota on such article;

(3) Proclaim a modification of, or imposition of, any quantitative restrictions on the import into the United States of such articles;

(4) Negotiate, conclude and carry out orderly marketing agreements with foreign countries limiting the export from foreign countries and the import into the United States of such articles.[40]

Because the President may decide to impose some form of import relief. I provide my views on its most appropriate form.[41] In so doing, I note that the relief recommended by the majority is intended to restore the industry to its condition at the end of 1983.[42] I will assume that this is the desired level of benefit to the domestic industry. In designing a remedy one should try to find the least costly remedy which will provide the desired benefit. There are less costly and more efficient ways to provide the desired benefit to the domestic industry than the quotas recommended by the majority. I will now discuss the various forms of import relief available to the President.

B. Tariffs

If the President decides to provide import relief, I recommend a system of tariffs, instead of quotas. There are several reasons why a system of tariffs is preferable to a system of quotas.[43]

The first reason for using a tariff instead of a quota is uncertainty about the success of the industry's plan. The domestic industry claims that the foreign cost advantage is only 15 percent, a figure which has been disputed by a number of respondents, and that with five years of import relief it will reduce the foreign cost advantage to 2 percent.[44] If the President accepts the industry's plan and provides relief, he can impose a system of tariffs based on the industry's assumptions that will provide as much protection as the proposed quota. Thus, if the industry's projections are correct and they are able to reduce the cost gap, they will benefit as much from the tariff as from the equivalent quota. On the other hand, if the industry cannot reduce the gap, in which case their plan will almost certainly fail, then the tariff will provide less protection than the quota and the cost to society will be lower. The tariff also has the benefit of taking petitioner's plan at its word.[45]

A related reason for choosing tariffs over quotas is that tariffs will not insulate the industry as much from the discipline of the marketplace. The goal of the statute is to facilitate the adjustment to import competition. Competition from imports is felt through the presence of equivalent imports at competitive prices. If there are changes in the relative costs of producing domestic and foreign shoes, a tariff will allow those changes to be felt in the market, while a quota will not.

Another reason for preferring a tariff is that an ad valorem tariff, as opposed to a unit tariff, does not cause an upgrading of imports and a downgrading of domestic production.[46] With a quota or unit tariff, the cost of a quota right used to import a pair of shoes is the same regardless of the price.[47] Shoes, however, are not fungible. They vary in quality and, therefore, in price. A quota will increase the relative price of inexpensive imported shoes and encourage importers to upgrade their imports. It will thereby encourage domestic production of relatively inexpensive shoes more than it will encourage domestic production of relatively expensive shoes. With an ad valorem tariff, however, the prices of all shoes are increased by the same percentage, although by a different absolute amount; and accordingly, the relative prices of all pairs of shoes remain the same.[48]

Thus, the ad valorem tariff encourages domestic manufacturers to produce all shoes without influencing their choice between inexpensive and expensive shoes. Such an incentive is important in light of the temporary nature of the relief granted under Section 201. It would be a peculiar remedy indeed that for five years encouraged the nonrubber footwear industry to produce precisely those shoes for which it suffers the greatest comparative disadvantage and where improved technology is likely to be least effective in reducing costs.

Therefore, I believe that the President should impose a system of tariffs, preferably ad valorem tariffs if he decides to grant import relief.

C. Tariff-rate quotas

If the President decides to impose some form of a quota, I recommend a tariff-rate quota.[49] With a tariff-rate quota the units specified in the quota can enter the United States without paying the tariff, whereas units above the quota limit have to pay the additional tariff.[50] The benefit of the tariff-rate quota over the quota is that with the tariff-rate quota there is a limit on the distortion that can be caused by the relief.

For every quota there is an equivalent tariff. I suggest that the President set a tariff two or three percentage points above the tariff which would be equivalent to the quota as the tariff portion of the tariff-rate quota. Such a system will give the industry the benefits of the quota if it is correct, but it will limit the costs of relief to society if it is wrong.

D. Auctioned quotas

There are significant benefits of an auctioned quota over quotas or Orderly Marking Agreements allocated to importers or importing nations.[51] When quota rights are simply given away, or are sold at prices substantially below their value, the revenue[52] the Treasury would receive if the quota rights were sold is given to the parties who receive the quota rights.[53]

There is an additional benefit from selling as opposed to assigning quota rights.[54] When quota rights are assigned and are not transferable.[55] then there is no way to be sure that the parties with the rights are the providers of the shoes consumers value most.[56] When the rights are sold, the importers that will be able to pay for the quota rights will be the ones that have the shoes consumers value most.

E. Orderly marketing agreements

The fourth option available to the President is to negotiate orderly marketing agreements (OMA's).[57] This form of relief was granted in 1977 following a previous Section 201 investigation.[58] The effects of an OMA are equivalent to the effects of assigned quotas.

F. Market segment quotas

Assuming the President decides to impose a quota, he must decide whether to impose one quota covering all imported shoes or different quotas covering different market segments. In addition, he must decide whether to exclude specific segments of the market from any quota. There are a number of benefits and problems associated with market-segmented relief. It is my purpose here to discuss them in order to bring them to the President's attention. I make no recommendation on whether market-segmented relief is appropriate.

The intended beneficiaries of any quota presumably are the domestic producers of shoes. U.S. production is not significant in every segment of the nonrubber footwear market. For example, foreign producers have such a large comparative advantage in the production of athletic footwear that domestic manufacturers are unlikely to engage in its production unless extremely high barriers to trade are erected. Most domestic production of nonrubber footwear is of high value-added shoes. Thus, if the purpose of import relief is to stimulate domestic production during the relief period, a higher tariff or lower quota should be provided to the segments of the market where domestic production is most highly concentrated and where supply is relatively elastic. Thus, theoretically at least, athletic footwear should either be excepted from any system of quotas or entitled to a generous quota to reflect the high market share of imports and the relatively low cross-elasticity of demand between athletic footwear and domestic nonrubber footwear.

Theoretically, it is possible to design a quota structured to provide the greatest amount of help to the domestic industry at the least cost to the rest of the nation. Crafting such a remedy is in some respects similar to creating an optimal sales tax. In taxation theory, if the goal is to maximize the revenues that the government receives while distorting economic allocation as little as possible, the optimal taxation scheme entails placing the highest taxes on those commodities with the most inelastic supply and demand curves.[59]

There are a number of problems in applying this technique here. The primary theoretical problem is that unlike the taxation case in which the maximum is the revenues collected by the state, the maximum of our import barrier has a more ineffable character. We seek to provide the greatest prospect for the future viability of the domestic industry. The connections among that viability, the shapes of the relevant supply and demand curves, and the incentives to invest the revenue generated by import relief in the industry are obscure.

Even assuming that one could theoretically specify a least burdensome tariff or quota, there are a number of practical problems that prevent its effective implementation. Although shoes are neither fungible nor identical, neither are they neatly separable into clearly distinct groups. Thus, it is doubtful that we could devise subcategories that Customs could administer at reasonable cost and which clever profit maximizing importers or manufacturers could not circumvent.

The Commission majority has recommended the exclusion of footwear with a customs value $2.50 or below, and Chairwoman Stern and Commissioner Rohr and have recommended separate quotas for shoes based on their customs value. These attempts reflect the laudable goal of not overburdening the consumer by restricting shoes that American firms do not produce, and attempting to limit the distortions that a quota would otherwise generate. However, the exclusions and categorizations present the problems I just discussed. The definition of athletic footwear and its distinction from non-athletic footwear is not clear. Therefore, excluding or segmenting athletic footwear would place a large burden on Customs and would induce product characteristics and labeling changes by manufacturers in order to fall within the excepted category. Similarly, price segmentation of the quota will burden commerce and lead to creative attempts by manufacturers to get around the quota, such as importing shoes without boxes or laces. The world is a complicated place inhabited by people who seek their own welfare. The straightforward distinctions we contemplate in our offices can lead to unanticipated results.

G. Summary

I recommend that if the President imposes quotas they should be global ones and auctioned to the public. The auction held for Treasury bills can serve as a model for any quota auctions. The quota rights should be divided into commercially practical units and all purchasers of rights in the same quota should pay the same price.

IV. COST-BENEFIT ANALYSIS

In making my remedy recommendation I did not consider the costs of import relief or adjustment assistance. Section 201 does not permit the Commission's recommendation to be based on consideration of consumer welfare or social welfare costs. The U.S. Trade Representative has, however, asked the Commission to analyze these costs in all Section 201 cases because they are relevant to the President in deciding whether to give relief. The parties extensively briefed the costs and benefits of relief to us. I shall briefly address these issues.

The consulting firm retained by the domestic industry, ICF Inc., provided the Commission with an economic analysis of the costs and benefits of the domestic industry's proposed quota[60] which yields a net benefit to the United States from the quota.

ICF estimates that 48,000 jobs will be saved and 23,200 to 28,700 jobs will be created by the proposed quota. According to ICF, the quota benefits are the employment gains computed by multiplying the number of jobs saved (and created) by the annual salary.

ICF also used a macro-economic approach to measure the quota benefits. According to ICF, the proposed quota would transfer approximately $900 million to the U.S. economy each year. Using an income multiplier of 2.0, ICF estimates the direct benefits of the quota to be about $1.8 billion a year.

The economic costs of the propossed quota include the increase in consumer prices and a consumption distortion effect (that is to say, a welfare loss to consumers who would forego purchasing footwear as a result of quota induced price increases). In the first three quota years these costs exceed $400 million a year. As a result of anticipated price declines, these costs then drop significantly and are positive in the last year of the quota and thereafter. Comparing the costs and benefits of the quota, ICF claims that the proposed quota will produce large net benefits to the United States economy.

The flaws in this analysis were explained by the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) in their helpful and informative Posthearing Brief.[61] In Appendix A of the FTC brief, the FTC's economic expert, Dr. Morris Morkre, laid bare the methodological flaws that underlie the ICF approach. According to Dr. Morkre, the problem is that ICF ignores the opportunity cost of labor, assuming instead that workers will be permanently unemployed and that those who retire from the work force place no value on their lifestyle. In 1984, however, the mean duration of unemployment among unemployed nonrubber footwear workers was 17.4 weeks. Therefore, the direct employment benefits of the quota are short-lived, equal only to the unemployment costs saved by the quota.[62]

The flaw with the macro-economic approach, according to the FTC, is that it is based on a fundamental misunderstanding of international trade. According to ICF, the quota will transfer funds to the United States that would otherwise go abroad. The response of the FTC is as follows:

"This interpretation of the effect of a reduction in spending abroad ignores the fact that individuals in the United States choose to purchase foreign-made footwear and, as a consequence, they also choose to exchange dollars for foreign shoes. That is, consumers are not wasting or throwing away income or wealth in this transaction. They are obtaining goods that they value at least as highly as the money spent (or else they would not purchase the shoes in the first place). Moreover, using the concept of consumer surplus (see the FTC's Prehearing Brief, Appendix C, p. 21), consumers derive a benefit from such purchases over and above the amount spent.

"In contrast to Mr. Reilly's [the ICF economist] assertion, the quota does not lead to a transfer of wealth (or income) to the United States; the true situation is just the reverse. As a consequence, the foundation of Mr. Reilly's macro-economic approach, the injection of wealth into the United States, evaporates. The quota does not transfer wealth to the United States; rather it implies a destruction of real income in the form of reduced consumer surplus. The rest of his analysis, i.e., the multiplier operation, is meaningless".[63]

I find the cost-benefit analysis of the FTC and of our own Office of Economics to be more rigorous and reliable than that of the domestic industry.

Our office of Economics has estimated the costs of various forms of import barriers, assuming no retaliation by any of our trading partners.[64] It evaluated the effects of the majority's quota proposal. One estimate by our economists is that under such a quota, shoe prices would increase on average 15 percent for imported shoes and 5 percent for domestic shoes. Consumers would pay an extra $832 million each year for shoes. The gain to those in the domestic shoe industry from such a quota would be $681 million, and 24,000 new jobs would be created. A translation of this sum into the cost per job reveals that consumers would pay approximately $35,000 each year for each $14,000 a year job saved. These costs estimates are being provided as part of this report. I believes that these estimates are conservative. Using a slightly lower domestic elasticity of supply figure, the price increases to 8.2 percent for domestic shoes and 17 percent for imported shoes and consumer costs exceed $1 billion a year. The added domestic employment shrinks to 17,500 jobs, which translates into a cost per job of $60,000. These estimates do not include any additional costs due to retaliation. This is a net social welfare cost of $680 million in the first year. Where does the $680 million go? Nearly all of it, $600 million, would go to foreign shoe producers.[65] The remainder is lost as a result of interfering with the market process.[66]

V. CONCLUSION

In summary, I recommend that the President place no additional restraints on nonrubber footwear imports. Because the statute appears to require adjustment assistance in circumstances such as these, I recommend adjustment assistance designed to re-employ displaced footwear workers as rapidly as possible. If the President decides to raise import barriers, I recommend a tariff. If the President chooses a quota, I recommend that it be a global one and that it be auctioned.

APPENDIX A [67]

Increased imports must be a substantial cause of the serious injury or threat thereof to the industry. Subsection 201(b)(4) defines "substantial cause" as a cause "which is important and not less than any other cause." In defining a separate "cause," one must not compare a genus with a species or subspecies.

There are only three types of causes at this level of generality that can inflict serious injury or threat thereof to the domestic industry. They are (1) a decline in demand, represented by an inward and leftward shift of the demand curve (fig. A); (2) a decline in domestic supply, represented by an inward and leftward shift of the domestic supply curve (fig. B); and an increase in foreign supply, represented by an outward and rightward shift of the supply curve (fig. C).

The consequence of these adverse shifts will result in either a fall in the price or quantity of footwear produced by domestic producers, or both.

[5] The term import relief is more narrow than the term remedy. Import relief includes all direct restraints on imports: tariffs, quotas, tariff-rate quotas, and orderly marketing agreements. Trade adjustment assistance is a remedy but it is not a form of import relief.

[6] The erection of permanent barriers to import is in the hands of Congress and the President alone.

[8] This situtation is not unique to the footwear industry. The classic example is agriculture, where the share of the labor force engaged in farming declined from 50 to 3 percent over the last one hundred years. This shift did not produce a 47 percent unemployment rate; it freed labor to produce cars and computers, etc. Such changes have made our country the richest nation in the world.

[9] After another investigation the Commission advised the President that the termination of the OMA with Taiwan would adversely affect the domestic industry.

[13] According to the domestic industry's brief, however, the Korean cost advantage in producing the typical ladies' pump is over 30 percent of the cost in the U.S. FIA's Prehearing Brief at 55-56.

[16] The specific modernization expenditures and their effects in reducing domestic producers' costs are based entirely on findings of the Kaplan report. The Kaplan study was financed by domestic nonrubber footwear producers to determine what their industry must do to become competitive with imported footwear.

[17] The five leather shoes used in the Kaplan study appear to have a simple upper design and do not require the greater labor content of more intricate designs. As a result, the calculated cost savings may not apply to more complex shoe designs requiring intricate handwork. Volume Shoe Posthearing Brief at 24-25.

[20] Thus, if the President should provide this industry with import relief, it would be unwise to condition it on reinvestment in the industry.

[21] I am aware that the adjustment assistance program has been sharply curtailed and may be eliminated. Nothing in this opinion should be construed as a statement in support of the existence of such a program. Section 201 requires me to make certain "recommendations" to the President. This language supports the popular misconception that Commissioners play advisory roles. Section 201 does not permit me to consider many factors, such as the costs of my recommendation and its effect on consumers, which are relevant to making informed recommendations.

[26] Adjustment assistance transfers wealth to displaced workers in import competing industries from the rest of society. In a dynamic economy such as ours, we are all subject to the vagaries of the marketplace. Changes in demand, technology, or imports, can result in a loss of our current employment. Displaced shoe workers are no different than the slide-rule makers or the hatters. Each has a once valuable skill for which there is no longer a market. If would be impossible to identify all the individuals who suffer dislocations because of one or more market phenomena. Trade adjustment assistance draws distinctions between those individuals who are injured by imports and those whose injury may be even more severe but are either the victims of something other than increased imports.

[38] Community adjustment assistance programs may cause sub-optimal investment and result in inefficient use of resources. The fact that firms in other industries have not located in communities on their own suggests that it is not advantageous to do so. Congress, however, has decided to subsidize communities adversely impacted by import competition and I, therefore, recommend adjustment assistance for communities.

[41] I do not, however, recommend that any import relief be granted.

[42] See supra at 130. (Additional Remedy Views of Chairwoman Paula Stern).

[43] For every unit tariff there is a quota that will produce the same equilibrium under conditions of no uncertainty. Comparisons between tariffs and quotas are made assuming this sort of equivalence. This is shown in my general discussion of tariffs and quotas set forth in Appendix B tomy views.

[44] FIA Prehearing Brief, at 16-17 of Appendix 4, U.S. Int'l Trade Comm., Nonrubber Footwear, Inv. No. TA-201-55 (1985).

[45] The domestic industry's unwillingness to accept a tariff instead of a quota suggests that they do not think their plan is credible.

[46] There are two kinds of tariffs: unit tariffs and ad valorem tariffs. With a unit tariff, the amount of the tariff is the same for all units regardless of price. For example, a tariff of $2.00 on a pair of shoes is a unit tariff. With an ad valorem tariff, the amount of the tariff is a fixed percentage of the price, so the amount of the tariff varies with the price. For example, a 15 percent tariff on a pair of shoes is an ad valorem tariff.

[47] This is true for both auctioned quotas and allocated quotas.

[48] See Falvey, The Composition of Trade Within Import Restricted Product Categories, 87 J. Pol. Econ. 1105 (1979).

[49] If the President imposes tariff-rate quotas, I recommend that the quota portion be auctioned.

[50] All imports have to pay the current tariff which is 9 percent.

[51] See Copper, at 70 n. 14 (Views of Vice Chairman Susan W. Liebeler).

[52] The Commission's Office of Economics estimates that if the majority's recommendation is adopted, the value of the quota rights will be $519 million in the first year alone.

[53] There is at least a theoretical possibility because of the large market share of imports that some enterprising entrepreneur could make a profit by bidding for the entire quota allocation, only use part of that allocation, and thereby raise prices. Such an attempt to monopolize would be actionable under the Sherman Act.

[54] One advantage of an ad valorem tariff over a quota is that the tariff does not cause foreign suppliers to change their mix of shoes. An auctioned quota will not cause an upgrading if importers bid for the quota rights not by making a bid in dollars per pair of shoes, but as a percentage of the Custom's value of the shoes. With such a system, there would be a market price for the quota rights as a percentage of price, and the auction winners would pay for their quota rights only when their shoes are imported and valued by Customs. A quota where the bids are a percentage of the value of the imported product is more restrictive than one where the bids are in fixed dollar amounts because the former prevents the upgrading of imports. Thus, if such a bidding system is selected, the quota should be expanded for it to be equally restrictive.

[55] I recommend that if quota rights are assigned that they be transferable.

[64] A summary of their analysis is set forth in Appendix C to my views.

[65] Import relief which benefits foreign producers more than domestic firms would be a peculiar remedy indeed. If either a tariff is used or quota rights are sold, the U.S. Treasury gets the $600 million.

[66] There is one other important effect of import barriers. They generally raise the value of the dollar, an unwelcome event to participants in export industries and other import-competing industries. As conditions in import-competing industries worsen because of any additional import restraints on footwear, they will seek their own relief and impose still greater costs on consumers.

[67] This analysis was originally developed in Copper at 60-65 (Views of Vice Chairman Susan W. Liebeler) As in the copper report, I am indebted to the Federal Trade Commission for presenting this analysis. See 19 U.S.C. 1334 (1982) instructing the Commission to cooperate with other federal government agencies including the Federal Trade Commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The 15 minutes of the Senator from Maine have expired.

The Senator from Georgia is recognized.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Thank you, Mr. President.

THE TRADE CRISIS

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, the return from the August recess traditionally marks the end of what is considered one of the busiest and, hopefully, most substantive recess periods of Congress. Members are able to take advantage of the longer length of this particular recess to gain deeper insight into how our constituents are faring. What we learn during this particular period becomes all the more valuable because Members immediately return to Washington for the final legislative period of the session.

I wish my colleagues to hear what I heard in reference to trade while I was at home. In addition, I wish to lay before you several ideas that could serve as the basis for future legislation and action. It is evident that the recess just reinforced what I, and a few others, have been stressing for the past 4½ years I have served in this esteemed body and with little reaction until recently.

Trade is part of every facet of our economic life. That is it, pure and simple. That was, and is, the concern of everyone and it should be. Textile workers, footwear workers, retailers, farmers, high technology technicians, machine tool makers, bankers, corporate executives, importers, exporters, local and State officials, retirees, housewives, and many others are all impacted by the current international trade crisis and let us not kid ourselves—we are smack dab in the middle of a trade crisis that will make the early 1930's look like a bad day at the track. The United States is still racing along toward a 1985 trade deficit that could exceed $150 billion. We are watching our export markets erode due to fair as well as unfair competition. And we are watching able-bodied and able-minded U.S. workers sitting idle while their families' standard of living deteriorates. Such a situation makes excellent fodder for the media and political demagogues; sometimes the desire for news or political gain is more powerful than the desire for constructive answers. The adverse impact of imports and trade restrictions on American jobs and profits is easily documented, at last making our trade ills a front burner and national issue. I have long held the outspoken opinion that trade policy should receive the same attention as tax spending, or foreign policy.

It has not in the recent past, but you can bet it will from now on. Maybe the 1986 election obsession and the political search for an issue has surfaced to where something constructive can now occur.

We have a serious problem and our instinct to act is strong. It is indeed critical that action be taken and I believe Congress has an important role to play, but contrary to the view of many of my colleagues I am hesitant about encouraging Congress to set what would probably be 535 different trade policies.

We must speak with a single voice on trade and that voice must follow a unified and coherent policy that affords long, not short, term economic growth and well-being for this country as a whole. That voice must firmly seek the establishment of a fair and open market system that provides the trade access necessary to all trading nations. We, in Congress, should guide that voice—in effect serving as the trade conscience of our trade policy. We in Congress should work to firmly provide a well-thought out framework within which our trade officials can and must act.

My interest and involvement in international trade is well-known and well-documented and my preference has been to listen and learn and then suggest practical ways in which to improve U.S. trade policy. My assessment, then, as toward what direction we need to move vis-a-vis international trade policy is the result of 4½ years of practical, hands-on experience. I attended the November 1982 ministerial meeting of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade as an official U.S. Government representative. I have been a member of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group. In addition, I have been a participant in the Mexico-United States Interparliamentary Conferences.

When I examined this country's trade policy framework I found that there largely existed those who advocated more or less purely free trade policies and those who supported specific protectionist solutions to existing trade ills. One—free trade—forced the policymaker to see a world trade arena that simply does not exist while the second—protectionism—shrouded U.S. trade policy in a negative, circle-the-wagons type mentality. I am not comfortable with either view. It was becoming obvious to me that our trade focus was either black or white and reeked of naivete or negativism depending on what day of the week it was and who you happened to be talking to. We were heading straight toward the type of conflict in trade philosophy that dominated the early 1930's with such disastrous results. I discovered that there are several givens in the global trade environment that I feel must always be kept in mind:

First, protectionism has a negative effect;

Second, unfair trading practices must be eliminated;

Third, U.S. competitiveness is slipping and must be eliminated;

Fourth, multilateralism is giving way to bilateralism; and Fifth, unlike every other major trading nation, the United States speaks with not one, but several voices on international trade.

Protectionism is negative. As we invoke protectionist measures to save important jobs, we will just as surely lose others equally important as retaliation and increased prices affect other sectors of the U.S. economy. The most notable example is the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act of 1930. 1,028 economists petitioned then-President Hoover to veto Smoot-Hawley; they were ignored until 1933. An esteemed fellow Georgian who preceded me in service in this body, in 1936, Senator Richard B. Russell, had the following to say about the 1930 Tariff Act:

> The passage of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act did more to demoralize the commerce of the world than any other single act which has ever been passed by the Congress of the United States and signed by the President of the United States. It not only dried up our foreign market for agricultural commodities but it eventually paralyzed industrial production in this country. By reason of its passage there grew up all over the world a complicated system of quotas, embargoes, trade agreements, and restrictions which obstructed all of the normal channels of commerce . . .

The question is, is history going to repeat itself? The situation is too similar and thus it is all the more important to avoid the same results—results that I think can best be described as "boomerang trade legislation," policies quickly tossed out that look good during their initial flight, but that can be guaranteed to return and unintentionally hit some other part of the U.S. economy.

I recognize, however, that in order to return American trade to a level playing field and to force fair trade practices on other nations, tough action is needed. I am certain that some of you may not agree with what I propose, but I ask you to give what I have to say serious consideration. From an international trade standpoint these are difficult and desperate times. Let us try to act in a constructive way.

First, the President must immediately take a direct role in trade policy issues. As leader of the premier global economic power, the President of the United States is in a unique position to influence the creation of an open and fair world trading system. U.S. trade policy is addressed by 25 different U.S. Government agencies. Only the President can consolidate administration initiatives on trade. Without the involvement of the President it will be nearly impossible to cure the problem.

Second, we must focus our energies in a more positive direction—rebuilding the competitive strength of the United States by a commitment to new technologies and their commercial applications to new as well as traditional production.

Third, our competitiveness would be enhanced if, for instance, a personal effort were to be made to purchase domestically-produced goods and services by American consumers. Through good old American purchasing power, consumers can have an impact. I am simply saying that one way to positively help our domestic industries is to pay closer attention to what we buy. I am not saying we should no longer buy foreign-made products, but I am saying, where possible or practicable, think "U.S.A." and then buy the U.S. product. Such an effort can and would make a difference.

Fourth, use of domestic trade laws is perhaps the most effective signal that this country can send to its trading partners that we absolutely will no longer tolerate unfair trading practices and intend to pursue previously agreed upon legal means of remedy to the fullest extent. There are sufficient U.S. laws to accomplish any Presidential initiative to resolve current problems. Some are ineffective or cumbersome and need to be strengthened or streamlined for better useability. Most recently, the Congress passed, and the President signed into law, the Trade and Tariff Act of 1984. Under the provisions of the act, the concept of reciprocity, or equitable market access, became law. That provision has not been utilized. Enforcement of this trade law and others would go a long way toward giving U.S. businesses an even chance on the trade playing field. We must do whatever it takes to make the laws we have useable and enforceable. The President, with the advice of the U.S. Trade Representative and the Secretary of Commerce, should provide the Congress with their ideas on revisions to U.S. trade laws.

Fifth, existing international trade laws are in desperate need of modernization and reform. Multilateral trade agreements such as the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade [GATT] or the Multifiber Arrangement [MFA] should be revised so as to address emerging trade problems as trade increasingly is occurring outside of these agreements. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting a new round of multilateral trade negotiations within the context of a reformed GATT.

Sixth, the underlying reasons for exchange rate disparity and instability, including lagging economic growth, should be examined; alternative methods of calculating currency valuations thoroughly investigated; and appropriate reforms enacted. The disparity between the dollar and other currencies makes it difficult for U.S. exports of goods, services and commodities to remain competitive. I suggest that serious thought be given to a Bretton Woods-type of conference on the current situation; much has changed in the international currency exchanges in the last 42 years.

Seventh, we cannot allow our support of U.S. export efforts to stagnate. We must rediscover that "Yankee Trader" spirit that led this country to become the most powerful trading nation on Earth. Creative financing and aggressive marketing strategies are vital in that respect.

Eighth, reduction of Federal expenditures must remain the top priority because it is only in a responsible fiscal environment that international economic opportunity for long-term growth in the United States will be fostered. This is an area in which bipartisanship can have an immediate impact.

I hope that our recent experiences in our home States have assured trade policy and trade issues the highest priority. Consumers and businesses alike are at the mercy of a fragmented trade policymaking apparatus. We must keep in mind the impact of budget, regulatory, and other domestic policy decisions in the competitive position of the United States. Our trade problems are as numerous and diverse as our many producers. Trade must be a joint, and I emphasize the word "joint," effort between the President, the Congress, and the people. The time to act is now, but we must work together and act in a manner that will produce results, positive results, for our country and not one that will boomerang on consumers, business, and our country.

NUCLEAR ARMS CONTROL STALLED

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, last month in a column on nuclear war in the Milwaukee Sentinel, Ellen Goodman concluded that in the 40 years since Hiroshima "* * * those who lead the superpowers have done nothing, absolutely nothing, to still" the fears of world destruction in nuclear war. How about that? Have the eight Presidents who have led this country in the past 40 years done "absolutely nothing to still our fears?" Ellen Goodman offers a provocative and eloquent challenge. Certainly our leaders have not done nearly enough. But absolutely nothing? Consider what they have and have not done in concert with Soviet leaders to control nuclear arms. They have negotiated five major arms control treaties. Here they are: A limited test ban treaty; an antiballistic missile treaty; a treaty limiting the megatonnage of underground nuclear weapons explosions; and two strategic arms limitation treaties—SALT I and SALT II—limiting the nuclear arsenals of both superpowers. Some would apply the Goodman conclusions to all of these treaties, and call them meaningless. They would have a strong case for that viewpoint. After all, what was the prime purpose of the two treaties limiting nuclear weapons tests? Answer: It was to design an agreement that would stop the technological progress toward even more destructive weapons. Did they succeed? Obviously, they failed and failed dismally. Since those limits on testing, each superpower has engaged in hundreds of nuclear weapons tests. Each has greatly increased the killer efficiency of their weapons. They have increased megatonnage, throw-weight, accuracy, and penetration. Obviously, the limitations on testing and research have to date failed in their mission. So far it is true they have accomplished absolutely nothing. How about the two SALT treaties? Have they not succeeded in limiting the nuclear weapons of both superpowers? The answer is that each superpower has about 10,000 strategic nuclear weapons. Each also has about 15,000 tactical nuclear weapons. There is now a superpower total of 50,000 nuclear weapons. Some limit. The numbers are absolutely ridiculous. Each superpower has sufficient nuclear capability to weather an all-out nuclear attack from the other side and still totally devastate the adversary several times over. The SALT nuclear weapon limitation treaties are in place but the arms race speeds on. So far the Goodman challenge—that superpower leaders have done nothing to still our fears of nuclear destruction, as far as offensive nuclear weapons are concerned—seems right. Finally, there is the Antiballistic Missile Treaty of 1972—the ABM Treaty. That treaty limited the production and deployment of systems that defended against nuclear attack. Now the United States is engaged in the beginning of what promises to be the most costly single military program in history to build a massive defense against nuclear missiles at a cost that could exceed a trillion dollars. Obviously, this effort will make a complete and conspicuous nullity out of the ABM Treaty. The ABM Treaty was expressly drafted to prevent precisely what the United States is prepared to do.

So, are all five of the arms control treaties useless pieces of paper? Have all been swamped by the arms race? The answer is that every one of those treaties began a process that is critical to a peaceful nuclear world. Continuation of that process could indeed greatly lessen the prospect of nuclear war. Each treaty depended on follow-up treaties. Superpower leaders have dismally failed to pursue those follow-up treaties. The Limited Test Ban Treaties of 1963 and 1974 actually pledged—solemnly promised—both superpowers to negotiate a comprehensive verifiable ban on all nuclear weapons testing. Those treaties recognized that unless all testing ended the arms race would zoom on to Armageddon. The newest Star Wars Program has killed the rest of arms control. SALT I and II could only succeed with subsequent treaties that ended production and deployment of strategic missiles and began a cutback. Obviously, the U.S.S.R. will not agree to such a limitation if the United States presses ahead with an antimissile defense system—Star Wars—that can only succeed if the Soviets reduce the number of these offensive missiles. It is equally obvious that the ABM Treaty cannot provide an assured deterrence for both superpowers—if Star Wars threatens the credibility of the Russian deterrent. So Ellen Goodman may be right. We may now have arrived at a point where the arms control efforts of the nuclear age have been nullified by an administration that refuses to negotiate an end to nuclear testing and is pushing hard a Star Wars Program which, if it succeeds, will destroy both deterrence and any prospect for negotiating a limitation or reduction on nuclear missiles.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article to which I have referred by Ellen Goodman be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NUCLEAR FEAR HOLDS WORLD IN BONDAGE

(By Ellen Goodman)

The 40-year-old newspapers on my desk chart the terrible plot line, day by day, toward its horrific climax.

On June 20, 450 planes drop 3,000 tons of incendiary bombs on three Japanese cities, leaving behind "one solid mass of flames."

On July 27, 350 planes drop 2,200 tons of firebombs on cities with populations of 377,000.

On July 29, 550 planes drop 3,500 more tons of firebombs.

Finally, on Aug. 6, 1945, a single plane drops a single bomb, the bomb they call, "Little Boy."

In the dry words of the New York Times news summary, "One bomb hit Japan . . . but it struck with the force of 20,000 tons of TNT. Where it landed had been the city of Hiroshima; what is there now has not yet been learned."

It is hard for those of us, raised in the nuclear age, to imagine what Americans thought when they read the news 40 years ago. I have asked my elders, elders who were younger then than I am now. One, a bombardier who flew over Europe, struggles to remember: "I just thought it was a bigger bomb." Another, a Marine in the Pacific waiting to invade Japan, answers: "I thought, well, I guess I'm going to live."

Still others who read the papers on that distant summer day, with eyes glazed by years of war news, must have turned from the news to the ads that bordered it: "Looking forward to fall and a fine fall suit? Come to our third floor and select, in air-conditioned comfort, the wool suit you'll need."

The casualties may have sounded less awesome after four years of death statistics. World War II had already smudged the lines that distinguished soldier from civilian, front line from city. Some 40,000 Britons had died in the Blitz, 135,000 Germans in the firebombing of Dresden, 70,000 Japanese in one night's firebombing of Tokyo.

The 130,000 killed those first minutes in Hiroshima may have been more numbers to those already numbed. We did not yet know about skin that peeled off and faces that melted, about radiation sickness and the silent leukemia that struck years, even generations, later. We hadn't yet heard the stories of the hibakusha, the survivors.

In the first days of the atomic age, the scientists talked about their accomplishment and the military about cost-effective killing. A colonel said at a press conference that since the bomb had done the work of 2,000 planes, "That makes atomic energy far cheaper than any other way of bombing."

Yet in this seamless daily flow of history, there was also an abrupt awakening, an immediate, often subliminal, understanding that the atomic bomb had changed everything. Dailiness couldn't dull the early rumblings of existential dread.

The sounds of it were there in President Harry S. Truman's dramatic announcement: "The force from which the sun draws its power has been loosed against those who brought war to the Far East." They were in solemn cadences in the Vatican's lonely moral judgment: "The last twilight of the war is colored by mortal flames never before seen on the horizons of the universe from its heavenly dawn to this infernal era."

They were in the rush to proclaim that this bomb could be a force for good, could portend a new dawn of energy or, at least, a "club for peace."

But now the newspapers have yellowed. Even the microfilm is hard to read. We have learned in intimate detail what happened on the ground at Hiroshima and Nagasaki. Yet in mad competition with the Soviets, we collectively produced some 50,000 bombs that do indeed make the first seem like a "little boy."

The etiquette books tell us to give rubies for a 40th anniversary. But we have given far more than that in this bondage of two generations. We have given the wealth of nations to the bomb. We have sacrificed peace of mind.

On this Aug. 6, in Washington and Moscow, men will get up, eat breakfast, kiss their families goodbye and go to the office, to spend the day at nuclear war games. Diplomats will argue: How many bombs are enough? Who has more?

And all across the world, people who may not be able to explain fission, people who cannot imagine an argument that would justify extinction, will for a moment think about Harry Truman's "rain of ruin" and nuclear winter.

They'll remember that the mushroom shape of their deepest fears first rose 40 years ago over a place called Hiroshima. They will surely wonder why, in all these years, those who lead the superpowers have done nothing, absolutely nothing, to still that fear.

HOW AMERICA SINKS UNDER ITS DEBT BURDEN

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, years ago—as a matter of fact, when I first came to the Senate, I remember talking to Alvin Hansen right out here outside the Capitol—Alvin Hansen, the great Harvard expert on business cycles, argued that in the economic history of the United States there had been a remarkable, compensating symmetry in the accumulation of debt. Professor Hansen was writing at the time of the Great Depression and World War II. He contended that the alarm about the Federal Government's debt was based on a peculiar myopia. In Hansen's view critics failed to put debt in perspective. He contended that throughout America's economic history when the Federal debt increased State and local debt tended to decrease and vice versa. On occasions where overall public debt did grow rapidly, Hansen argued that private debt enjoyed a compensating decline.

It is too bad Professor Hansen is not around today. If he were, it is hard to see how he could explain the growth of debt in the past 7 or 8 years and especially in the past 2 or 3 years based on his theory of "debt-symmetry" Every member of this body—it seems that every American who has any concern for our country's economic future—is aware of the immense growth of the Federal Government's debt. We all know that within a few weeks we in the Congress will be called on to raise the national debt limit, perhaps to more than $2 trillion. Those of us, who have been in this body since 1980 or earlier, will recall that it was less than 4 short years ago that we were called on by President Reagan to increase the debt limit to a then-shocking $1 trillion. This Senator remembers talking all night, in fact, for 16 hours consecutively on September 30, 1981, in protest against what seemed to this Senator at that time to be an outrageous collapse of the Congress, fiscal responsibility.

Mr. President, can we find any solace in the Hansen symmetry argument in 1985 as we prepare to sink the Federal Government under a further debt deadweight? The answer is not just negative. It is shockingly negative. Two trillion dollars is a nice, fat, round figure that should frighten all of us. But it is only part of the whole picture. Is there a compensating drop in this country in corporate debt or individual consumer debt? For those Senators who have not taken a look at the overall, that is, the total public and private debt problem of America, prepare for a shock. The sad fact is that the total public and private debt of this country not only has failed to compensate for the explosion of the Federal Government's debt by providing a corresponding reduction, it has actually exploded far more than the Federal Government's debt. In two excellent articles in the New York Times on September 4 and 6, Leonard Silk discusses this mammoth economic problem. He points out:

Total outstanding debt in the United States has more than doubled in the past seven years, increasing from $3.3 trillion at the end of 1977 to $7.1 trillion at the end of 1984. While the federal debt was rising by $754 billion during that period, private debt was climbing by $2.3 trillion.

Now, Mr. President, we should not let those trillions bowl us over with these nominal dollars. Between 1977 and 1984 the country suffered an inflation of about 70 percent. Let us correct the nominal growth in debt to measure the increase in real terms. If we do so, we find that both the public and private debt increased steadily and sharply but by far less than the nominal figures suggest. Nevertheless, on any basis the debt of the U.S. citizen has increased. It has increased in every form—public, corporate, and for individuals. It has increased sharply in relation to the gross national product, in relation to personal income or corporate income. The typical American not only is finding that his taxes are going more and more to pay interest on the Federal Government's debt. He finds the corporation which may employ him or whose stock he may own is also more burdened by debt and is becoming increasingly more fragile and subject to collapse in the event of recession because of its increasing debt. He is also increasingly finding his big burden is likely to be the interest he must pay every month on his own mortgage, the interest payments on his car, or on the appliances he has bought for his home.

At the moment Americans except for farmers feel relatively little of this debt burden pressure. We are lulled by the blessed moderation of inflation. The immediate outlook for prices seems comforting. Because the inflation outlook is good, interest rates are also behaving like a well-trained dog. This pleasant interval of ease in meeting our interest obligations may continue for a year or two, maybe even more. But, Mr. President, make no mistake about it. Our country is riding for a fall and a big one. Every country in history that has lived far beyond its means has eventually suffered sharply accelerating inflation. Private corporations and individuals who have consistently spent more than they have taken in have run into trouble. The longer the spending beyond income has gone on, the bigger the problem. Our Federal Government is now into its fourth year of mega-deficits. Private debt has increased even more than the Federal debt in the same period.

What kind of trouble does this spell? At this very moment Israel, Argentina, and Bolivia offer vivid examples. It means inflation—big inflation—in fact very big inflation. And that means very high interest rates. And when high interest rates coincide with a massive and growing debt what does that mean? It means the cost of servicing the national debt will rise to $200 or $300 billion and far more. It means thousands of corporations and millions of individual Americans will not be able to pay interest on their debts. So what do we need? It is plain and simple. This country needs a massive infusion of good old fashioned thrift on every level and we need it now.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the two articles by Leonard Silk to which I have referred be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE EXPLOSION OF PRIVATE DEBT

(By Leonard Silk)

The rapid growth of the Federal Government's debt has been the focus of a great deal of public concern in recent years. But much less attention has been paid than is due to the even greater explosion of private debt.

Total outstanding debt in the United States has more than doubled in the past seven years, increasing from $3.3 trillion at the end of 1977 to $7.1 trillion at the end of 1984. While the Federal debt was rising by $754 billion during that period, private debt was climbing by $2.3 trillion.

In just the past two years, total debt outstanding increased by nearly $1.5 trillion. In the final quarter of 1984, total debt, private and public, was climbing at an annual rate of $1 trillion for the first time in history. Last year the Federal Government borrowed $198.8 billion to finance its deficit while private businesses and households added $535 billion to their debts.

What are the forces behind the explosion of private debt?

James J. O'Leary, economic consultant to the United States Trust Company, observes that, in the late 1970's, inflation and inflationary expectations were a driving force. Borrowers thought the rising value of the assets they brought, and the declining value of the money with which they would repay their loans, would move than justify the high interest rates they had to pay. And lenders and investors were willing to take big risks in the belief that inflation would bail out unsound loans and investments.

The drop in inflation resulting from the sharp United States and world recession of 1980-82 uncovered the unsoundness of a lot of those loans that were made in an inflationary era. Many farmers who had expanded their operations in the belief that prices of farmland, foodstuffs and fibers would keep on climbing indefinitely were caught with debts they could not handle when commodity prices dropped. Likewise, the oil glut and declining energy prices made a lot of oil loans go bad—and caused some oil producers and banks that had lent to them to go broke.

Farmers and oil producers are not the only ones caught in a bind. Deflation combined with the overexposed financial position of many businesses has resulted in the greatest failure rate since the Great Depression of the 1930's.

From 1931 through 1935 the average number of business failures per year was 20,860, for a failure rate of 126 per 10,000 concerns. During the early postwar years from 1946 through 1950, the average annual number of business failures was only 5,301, and the failure rate was 21 per thousand. But during two years, 1983 and 1984, the average annual number of failures climbed to 29,610 and the failure rate to 104 per 10,000—rate four-fifths as high as occurred during the worst years of the Great Depression.

What is remarkable and disturbing about so high a failure rate now is that it has taken place during the period of business-cycle expansion, not depression. This reflects the weakened financial structure of United States business, and it could foreshadow an even more serious wave of bankruptcies if the business cycle should turn down.

Nevertheless, the tidal wave of increasing debt rolls on. What is keeping it going with the rate of inflation down—and deflation hitting many markets around the world and here? Among the major forces for expanding debt, Mr. O'Leary observes, are these: the vast borrowings to finance mergers and acquisitions—and in some cases by corporate managements to fight off unwanted mergers or acquisitions; aggressive lending by financial institutions to achieve a positive spread between their current rate of return and their current cost of money, to restore profitability; the drive of banks and thrift institutions to lend at floating or variable rates, thereby pushing interest rate risk onto borrowers, and the interest rate "buy-downs" offered by auto companies and home builders in an effort to make sales in a time of persistently high real interest rates that would otherwise discourage their customers.

The expansion of mortgage credit, much of it on a minimum down-payment basis, has brought on a big increase in delinquencies and foreclosures on both homes and commercial properties, as real estate prices have declined in some parts of the country. The Home Loan Bank Board reports that outstanding foreclosed loans of savings and loan associations jumped 27 percent in the first quarter, with most of the increase involving commercial properties.

In a study for United States Trust, Mr. O'Leary concludes that the large increase in delinquencies and foreclosures, together with the losses incurred by lenders in all sectors of the private market, is undoubtedly a result in part of too fast an expansion of private debt and of the assumption by lenders of excessive risks.

Similarly, a study by Mel Colchamiro and William C. Freund for the New York Stock Exchange concludes that the health of American corporations has been endangered by excessive debt. As of the end of last year, 68 percent of all corporate debt financing was short-term, bringing the share of short-term debt up to 51 percent, its highest level in the past 25 years. Further, the study notes, the "quick ratio" (liquid assets as a percent of short-term liability) fell to its lowest postwar level. The so-called interest coverage ratio (pretax corporate profits to interest payments) remained at historically low levels, as did manufacturing corporations' equity-to-debt ratios.

Yet the buildup of debt goes on at the fastest rate of the postwar period. The implications of this debt explosion will be considered in another column.

[From the New York Times, Sept. 6, 1985]

PREVENTING DEBT DISASTER

(By Leonard Silk)

The huge expansion of private debt of recent years poses a threat to the financial health of major sectors of the American economy.

The most immediately threatened sector is agriculture—and the banks that have lent heavily to farmers. The Farm Credit Administration now has 402 farm banks on its problem list, and the entire farm credit system is facing a potential debacle, which could deal a heavy blow not only to the farm economy but also to the national economy and banking system. Farmers owe their creditors a total of $213 billion. A critical issue facing the Reagan Administration is whether to prepare for what could become a bailout amounting to billions of dollars in bad loans, if the depression in agriculture continues.

But is agriculture only the most conspicuously endangered sector resulting from the debt explosion? Nonfinancial business corporations have also been increasing their debts at a rapid pace. A study by the New York Stock Exchange notes that 1984 witnessed an outbreak of "mergermania" with the retirement of an estimated $84 billion to $100 billion worth of equity in merger exchanges of debt or cash for equity. Although $12 billion in equities were issued in 1984—one of the biggest years ever—the corporate equity base declined by at least $72 billion. Mergers—or canceled mergers—last year offset all the equity financing of the last half-dozen years.

Some economists fear that debt-financed mergers and leveraged buyouts withdraw credit from the rest of the economy. But Henry C. Wallich, a member of the Federal Reserve Board, argues that such fear is misplaced, maintaining that such operations do no more than reshuffle assets. The real danger, in his view, is the resulting change in the balance-sheet structure of corporations, causing a deterioration of their debt-equity ratios.

Henry Kaufman, executive director and chief economist of Salomon Brothers, interviewed by telephone in London, expressed his anxiety over the weakened financial base of corporations. "In the past year and a half," he said, "the outstanding equity of nonfinancial corporations shrank by $53 billion, but the debts of the same corporations increased by more than $250 billion." The Fed's Flow of Funds data show a net increase of nonfinancial corporations' debt by $256.9 billion in 1984 alone, bringing their net outstanding debt to more than $2 trillion, more than double its level in 1977. Their short-term debt has soared to 51 percent of their total liabilities.

Just how dangerous is this situation? Some economists contend that the danger has been overblown, arguing that the traditional ratios of debt-equity and corporate liquidity no longer hold because of the internationalization of credit markets, tax laws that encourage debt rather than equity and financial deregulation. But another school says the danger is all too real, holding to the principle that the only valid measure of a corporation's debt capacity is whether it could service its debt in a period of adversity.

For much of American agriculture, the ex post facto answer is that it went far too deeply into debt. Obviously, nobody can simulate just what the cash flow of business corporations will be in the recession or, perhaps, in the next inflation. But business failures have been rising despite almost three years of economic expansion, and a downturn could only aggravate the financial vulnerability of corporations.

What can be done now, other than for the Government to prepare for huge bailouts? One constructive step would be to reduce the Federal budget deficit that, together with the Treasury's effort to lengthen the public debt, has pushed up long-term interest rates, leading corporations to go increasingly into short-term debt. However, the outlook now is that the Federal deficits will remain high and may even worsen. The effort of banks to protect themselves by setting variable interest rates on long-term loans also means greater danger for the borrowers if inflation returns.

Another way to strengthen the corporations would be to encourage greater internal financing. Here the New York Stock Exchange study charges that President Reagan's proposed tax revisions would have a damaging effect by eliminating the Accelerated Cost Recovery System and the Investment Tax Credit, cutting company cash flows.

Mr. Kaufman urges increased Federal regulation to keep the growth of debt under better control. He would enhance the powers of the Federal Reserve System and set up a new National Board of Overseers to supervise all institutions that create credit, not just commercial banks. Indeed, he wants greater international financial oversight to cope with the immense and accelerating growth of international debt. Mr. Kaufman was in London this week pressing his case for such international oversight upon the Group of 30, a body of leading financial authorities.

He is also calling for a new official credit-rating system. He contends that the private rating concerns cannot get as much information as can the Government to do an adequate rating job. If the Government published such reports, he contends, such disclosure would push managements to take strong remedial actions and preventative steps.

Do such ideas come too late? No one can be sure, but remedial measures may be crucial if they are to prevent what is happening in agriculture from becoming a general condition of financial vulnerability.

ERIC STROM'S BAR MITZVAH

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, on September 7 Eric Strom of Stamford, CT, had his bar mitzvah in Cracow, Poland. According to the New York Times, Eric was the first boy to have a bar mitzvah in Cracow since the end of World War II.

The bar mitzvah was planned as a celebration for the Jews of Cracow. The New York Times reports that those Jews who remain in Cracow are just a few elderly, impoverished survivors of the Holocaust.

During World War II, the Nazis sent the entire population of Cracow's Jewish community to die in Auschwitz.

The Federation of Jewish Philanthropies planned and raised the expenses for the trip, and Eric was chosen for his Polish heritage.

The inspiration for the trip came last spring when an old woman in Cracow remarked to American visitors, "There's never going to be another birth, wedding, or bar mitzvah."

Mr. President, the Jewish community of Cracow still lives under the shadow of the Holocaust. It has been over 40 years since some of the most common of Jewish ceremonies were performed in Cracow's ancient Remu synagogue.

Before leaving for his bar mitzvah, Eric said, "I want to bring joy to them. I want them to know they're not forgotten."

Mr. President, in a broad sense, the survivors of the Holocaust have not been forgotten. Interest in the Holocaust is perhaps greater now than at any recent period.

But, often we forget about the suffering of the individual survivors, like the Jews of Cracow.

We should be proud of Eric Strom and the Federation of Jewish Philanthropies. They have filled an empty space left in the lives of these people by the Holocaust. They have healed, in part, a wound that was over 40 years old.

Mr. President, ratifying the Genocide Treaty would be a symbol that the United States remembers the victims of the Holocaust.

Ninety-six nations have already signed this document which pledges them to punish the perpetrators of genocide.

I urge my colleagues to vote for ratification to show survivors of the Holocaust that we have not forgotten what they endured.

MYTH OF THE DAY: TOO MANY INEFFICIENT FARMERS ARE A CAUSE OF OUR AGRICULTURAL WOES

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, a myth abounds in our Nation that a prime cause of our agricultural woes is an overabundance of inefficient farmers. Nothing could be farther from the truth. A look at the facts makes this clear.

The farm population as a percent of the total U.S. population has fallen from 15.3 percent in 1950 to a mere 2.4 percent in 1982, the latest year for which U.S. census data are available. For Wisconsin, the comparable figures are 21.1 percent in 1950 and 6.9 percent in 1980, the latest figures available.

These figures spell out the hard reality that we have already weeded out the inefficient farmers in America. What is left are the superefficient farmers whose efforts result in the agricultural productivity that is the envy of the world.

And it is this agricultural productivity that provides our clearest advantage over the Soviet Union. No group in American society is more productive and efficient than the farmer. Our farmers are producing more food than ever before—at the same time that our population is growing and we are working on ways to export more of our agricultural output.

Our taxpayer dollars are not going to prop up inefficient farmers—that is for sure. Here are additional data that support this conclusion and help to destroy the myth that says otherwise. In 1950, there were 5,388,437 farms in America. By 1982, that number had plunged to 2,240,976, a decline of 58.4 percent.

The same story holds true for Wisconsin. The total number of farms in Wisconsin in 1950 was 166,561. By 1982, that number had fallen to 82,199, which represents a drop of 51.2 percent.

Does the picture change for dairy farmers? No way. In 1950, there were 602,093 commerical dairy farms in the United States But in 1982, the figure was 163,963, or a whopping 72.8 percent dive. And in Wisconsin, there were 116,529 commercial dairy farms in 1950. By 1982, this number had dwindled to 40,088, a decrease of 65.6 percent.

Much needs to be done to improve the farm situation today. The immediate challenge facing the Senate is to produce a 1985 farm bill that will help get the job done. But in looking for the causes of our agricultural difficulties, we should dispel the myth that mounting numbers of inefficient farmers are a contributing factor.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to extend beyond the hour of 3:30 p.m., with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

LABOR DAY—AN AMERICAN TRADITION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the second day of September marked this country's official celebration of Labor Day. It is, traditionally, a day for parades, picnics, and speechmaking, commemorating and reinforcing one of America's most valuable commodities—the strong work ethic of our people.

Despite America's humble beginnings, this Nation has risen to a level of preeminence in the world economy that would have astounded our forefathers. They could not have known that their simple formula for survival in a new world would spawn the productivity and prosperity of an economic giant. But, these are the results of a people committed to achieving their personal best at whatever they choose to do in an economic system that allows them to set any goals, reach any heights, and receive their just rewards.

I grew up believing that, "if you work hard, you get ahead"; that "your only limitations are those you place on yourself"; and, in the true spirit of American optimism, "the sky's the limit." The reason you were "early to bed and early to rise" was so that you could get in a full day's work between rising and going to bed. Well, Mr. President, we have gotten ahead. We have done it through sheer, hard work. In no other place have so many people started with so little and, through their own labors, prospered.

The work ethic runs deeply through the collective spirit of Americans and continues to be a source of pride that is celebrated every year on Labor Day. Moreover, the motivating force behind a holiday of this sort is uniquely American. I believe most Americans share the belief that work is more than a means to a paycheck; for many, it is a means of personal satisfaction, identity, and moral achievement. Self-sufficiency and industriousness are their own rewards. It is not the country that has inspired the people, but the other way around. For millions of immigrants, this was the place to "make something of yourself," and it still is.

There is no better time to recognize the achievements of American workers than on Labor Day, Mr. President. I am pleased that so many Americans took the time to celebrate the day and rededicate themselves to the ideals and ambitions that will sustain this Nation for many years to come.

U.S. JAYCEES HEALTHY AMERICAN FITNESS LEADERS AWARDS CONGRESS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, September 14 marks the fourth annual U.S. Jaycees Healthy American Fitness Leaders Awards Congress, sponsored by Allstate Life Insurance and carried out in cooperation with the President's Council on Physical Fitness and Sports. These awards honor 10 individuals who have made an outstanding contribution to the promotion of physical fitness, health or nutrition.

This year's recipients have exhibited notable leadership in areas very diverse from one another, such as the media, education, and active participation in athletic sports. Their bond is the impact each has made on the Nation's awareness of the importance and merits of a wholesome lifestyle. Mr. President, at this time, I would like to recognize each recipient individually:

Edward W. Bradley, 57, is the chief executive officer of the New Jersey Governor's Council on Physical Fitness and Sports. Mr. Bradley designed and established all 21 county councils on physical fitness in New Jersey.

John Burstein, 35, has had great success with his creation of a health and fitness role model for children named "Slim Goodbody." Mr. Burstein has also recorded four record albums and authored several books dealing with fitness and health.

Irv Cross, 45, is a CBS sportscaster as well as the cohost of "NFL Today." As president of the American Running and Fitness Association, Mr. Cross is a writer for Running and Fit News, and frequently serves as a guest speaker or moderator at health and sports-related functions.

Susan Smith Jones promotes health and physical fitness as a consultant, researcher, and lecturer, and is the author of more than 150 internationally published articles on fitness and health.

Dr. Charles T. Kuntzleman, 44, is the national director of both Living Well and Feelin' Good, a cardiovascular health and fitness program for children between the ages of 5 and 9. Dr. Kuntzleman has also authored more than 50 books on fitness.

After winning four gold medals for swimming at the 1976 Olympic games, and capturing the title of Amateur Athlete of the Year in 1977, 29-year-old John Phillips Naber is now the honorary head swimming coach of the National Special Olympics. Mr. Naber also runs more than 100 swimming clinics throughout the country.

Jo-Ann Louise Owens-Nausler, 36, is the State director of health and physical education for the Nebraska Department of Education. In this capacity, Ms. Owens-Nausler presents numerous speeches and conducts seminars, workshops and clinics on health and fitness for the educational community.

Kari Anne Swenson came away from the 1984 World Biathlon Championships with two medals, only to be kidnapped 1 month later. Although Ms. Swenson was shot and wounded during this harrowing experience, she demonstrated that being physically fit is a valuable asset in the face of such adversity. Since her rescue, Ms. Swenson, 24, has resumed her athletic training.

In addition to being a physician, Michael Paul Woods holds the vice presidency of the Wisconsin Olympic Ice Rink Foundation and the U.S. International Speed Skating Association. Dr. Woods is well qualified to serve in both offices, as he is himself an Olympic speedskating competitor and coach.

Lastly, I take special pride in announcing that our distinguished colleague from Indiana, Senator RICHARD LUGAR, is one of this year's recipients of the HAFL awards. Senator LUGAR is honored for his initiative in founding the Dick Lugar Fitness Festival, which promotes fitness and informs the public of fitness programs available to them.

Mr. President, I salute and congratulate each of these 10 individuals for their contribution and leadership, and thank the U.S. Jaycees for their commendable endeavors over the years.

NATIONAL SIGHTSAVING MONTH

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to bring the attention of my colleagues and the American public that the National Society to Prevent Blindness has designated September as "National Sightsaving Month."

At no time is the saying, "An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure" more true than in our attitude toward blindness prevention.

This year, 50,000 Americans will lose their vision. An alarming statistic, for sure, particularly when we realize that half of all blindness can be prevented through the use of sound eye health and safety practices.

While one might get the impression that Americans are taking better care of themselves than ever before, watching calories, cholesterol, and calcium intake; jogging, cycling swimming, working out at a health club; the reality is that most people seldom see a doctor until something is wrong. In a recent survey undertaken by the National Society to Prevent Blindness, it was revealed that while 9 out of 10 Americans support the idea of having their eyes checked regularly, nearly 4 out of 10 adults indicated that they have not seen an eye doctor in the past 2 years. The survey further pointed up widespread misconceptions and ignorance about eye diseases and, in particular, about glaucoma, the leading cause of blindness in adults. Few realize that though this disease rarely sends out warning signals, it can be controlled if caught in time.

Moreover, adults carry over this same pattern of indifference in the care of their children's eyes. Statistics show that 1 out of every 20 children, ages 3 to 6, is already coping with vision problems, which if left untreated, may prevent them from reaching their maximum potential.

And, for those of us blessed with no eye problems, let us ensure that we continue to protect our eyesight through eye safety on the job, around the home, and in sports.

I know that all of my colleagues will want to join with me in saluting the efforts of the National Society to Prevent Blindness, who for the last 77 years has been pointing out that our vision is truly a treasure to guard.

HAROLD H. VELDE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, last Monday, Harold Himmel Velde died at the age of 75. His death represented an unexpected and tragic loss for his family, friends, and loved ones. Those of us who have served in the Congress for many years knew of Harold Velde through his tenure in the House of Representatives from 1949-57. Still others of us knew Harold through his son, Richard "Pete" Velde, who has worked for me and other Members of the Senate as a staff member and consultant, and who also headed the LEAA.

Harold Velde was an Illinois farm boy who devoted most of his adult life to public service. He graduated from Northwestern University in Evanston, IL, in 1931, and then from the University of Illinois Law School at Champaign in 1937. After being admitted to the Illinois bar, Harold practiced law for a few years, but with the advent of World War II, he joined his fellow countrymen to fight for the cause of freedom and democracy. From 1941-43, he served in the Signal Corps of the U.S. Army, and from 1943-46, he undertook the dangerous occupation of special agent for the FBI, working in the sabotage and counterespionage division.

With the conclusion of the war, he returned to his native Tazewell County and was elected county judge in 1946. Pleased with his service as the local magistrate, his constituents sent him to Washington as their Congressman in 1949. Though his service in Congress included membership on the controversial House Unamerican Activities Committee, Harold was a survivor, being reelected to three succeeding terms. In 1957, however, he decided to return home and practice law. In 1969, he returned to public service to become regional counsel to the General Services Administration. In recent years, he had been living in retirement in Sun City, AZ, with his wife, the former Dolores B. Harrington.

Mr. President. History has not kindly treated all the things Harold Velde did as a Member and, for 2 years, as chairman of the House Unamerican Activities Committee. But anyone who knew Harold Velde knew that he was a good man, a decent may—a true patriot. Though there can be legitimate dispute over his actions, there can be no dispute over his motivations. He was guided by what he felt was right, just, and in the best interests of America—a country he loved as dearly as life itself.

A frequent visitor to Washington, he will be missed in this town. With his easygoing style and unique approach to politics, talking to him was always a real pleasure. I was proud and honored to have made his acquaintance and I urge all my colleagues to join me in extending our heartfelt condolences to his wife, Dolores; son, Pete; and daughter, Jan Ketelsen.

THE NEED FOR A COMMON TONGUE

Mr. SYMMS. I wish to insert into the RECORD one of the most salient articles that I have seen to date on the English language amendment [ELA]. It appeared as a guest editorial in the Idaho Press Tribune on August 28, 1985, and was authored by the member of the Idaho State Legislature who sponsors the English language amendment for the State of Idaho, Representative RON CRANE.

Representative CRANE says that the "liberals" thrive on a "victim" class of people in our society. But in the case of maintenance-style bilingual education, the liberals have made a permanent victim class among the very people they purport to help. Representative CRANE charges that "politically ambitious liberals" do not want assimilation, but rather they want a permanent "victim" class "which will provide a dependable source of votes and power for this generation and beyond."

Representative CRANE's article may offend some, but he has the integrity to call a spade a spade and tell it just is it is. I recommend that my colleagues read this very well written article.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEED FOR A COMMON TONGUE

(EDITOR'S NOTE: Several weeks ago Caldwell resident Camilo Lopez authored a Guest Opinion outlining his opposition to an English Language Amendment sponsored at the federal level by Sen. Steve Symms. In Idaho, the Legislature has been asked to adopt a position supporting English as the nation's official language. Today's Guest Opinion is written by the sponsor of the Idaho amendment.)

(By Representative Ron Crane)

Liberals, by and large, love bilingual education, bilingual ballots and other assorted bilingual programs—not because they assist non-English speaking minorities into full fledged membership in the American mainstream, but because they prevent it.

Liberals have long thrived upon the votes of the so-called "victim" classes. Whether that be the housewife who is a "victim" of male chauvinism, or the steelworker who is a "victim" of the so-called Robber Barons.

Unfortunately for the liberals, as their "downtrodden masses" begin to achieve the American dream and enter mainstream middle class America, they also cease to be "victims" and tend to become more and more self-reliant.

Witness the nearly open rebellion in the labor unions when their leadership attempts to march the rank and file in lock-step to the voting booth. Similarly, most women now reject the shrill shrieks of the National Organization of Women.

With Hispanics, however, the liberals think they have found a virtual eternal fountain of "sufferers." Hispanics also represent (surprise, surprise) an already large and constantly increasing source of political power.

To alleviate this suffering (and to bind the loyalties of the sufferers) the liberals have invoked their time-honored, foregone solution to every problem—throw money at it (other people's money, naturally). In this case, the enormously expensive programs of bilingualism.

Aside from supposedly helping the non-English speaking minorities, bilingualism has the side benefit of bringing a multitude of brand new bureaucrats into the federal system. This mushrooming of bureaucracy swells the ranks of the liberals in that the economic survival of each new bureaucrat becomes dependent upon the continuation of the program in which he is involved.

Unfortunately the bilingual programs also tend to make permanent the very "victim" classes they purport to help.

Bilingual education is a good example. First, the name "bilingual" education is in itself a misnomer. This particular program has been besieged from its inception by complaints that many of the Spanish-speaking teachers hired for it were themselves unable to speak English.

What it and the other government bilingual programs have actually developed is a system in which Hispanics perceive they need never learn English.

The rush to promulgate bilingualism has resulted in the creation of an environment in which a permanent Hispanic subculture can flourish. A subculture in which neither the first generation immigrants nor the generations which follow will be able to gain entry to the American mainstream.

In fact, we have created a liberal's paradise—an already large and continuously increasing group of "victims" which will be unable to stand on their own and thus who will be permanently dependent upon bilingual interpreters and the handouts of big government.

Not only is this permanent Spanish-speaking subculture bad for Hispanics, but it is bad for the nation.

In the words of former U.S. Sen. S.I. Hayakawa (himself the son of Japanese immigrants), "What is it that has made a society out of the hodgepodge of nationalities, races and colors represented in the immigrant hordes that people our nation? It is language of course, that has made communication among all these elements possible. It is with a common language that we have dissolved distrust and fear. It is with language that we have drawn up the understandings and agreements and social contracts that make a society possible."

Virtually every other immigrant group, the Irish, the Germans, the Arabs, the Jews, the Koreans—all of them not only adopted America as their new nation, but English as their new language. Further, they learned the language through their own initiative.

As a result these groups have been assimilated into the society. But Camilo Lopez and his fellow liberals want it different this time.

Again quoting Sen. Hayakawa, "The 'Hispanic Caucus' and their fellow travelers look forward to a destiny for Spanish-speaking Americans separate from that of Anglo-, Italian-, Polish-, Lebanese-, Chinese-Americans and all the rest of us who rejoice in our ethnic diversity."

Camilo Lopez and other politically ambitious liberals don't want assimilation. They want a permanent "victim" class which will provide a dependable source of votes and power for this generation and beyond.

We need a state and a nation whose citizens, even if they differ in their means, methods and aspirations, at least retain the ability to talk to one another in the same language.

Theodore Roosevelt once stated "We have room for but one language here, and that is the English language, for we intend to see that the crucible turns out people as Americans . . . not hyphenated Americans."

I agree.

EXCELLENCE IN EDUCATION

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, the renewed commitment to excellence in education this country is demonstrating is one I strongly support. As chairman of the Committee on Labor and Human Resources, I commend efforts to provide incentives to students to achieve high academic goals. An example of such a worthwhile program is the Presidential Academic Fitness Award which was announced by President Reagan at the National Forum on Excellence in Education in December 1983. I applaud the President for initiating a timely program that will motivate students to excel academically.

The pilot program for graduating seniors which was directed by Secretary Bell in the Department of Education resulted in over 10,000 high schools choosing to participate. These schools presented awards to more than 229,000 students in the spring of 1984. The success of the program generated recommendations to expand the Presidential Academic Fitness Award [PAFA] to other school levels.

For the 1984-85 school year, these awards were presented to students in the exit grade of elementary and middle or junior high school, as well as to high seniors school. Secretary Bennett has been delighted with the number of students who received the Presidential Academic Fitness Award this year, over 763,000 in more than 32,500 public and private schools across the Nation. Schools participating were from every State, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, the Trust Territories, Department of Defense dependent schools, Bureau of Indian Affairs schools, and the Department of State overseas assisted schools. In my home State of Utah, there were 218 schools which presented PAFA awards to 7,159 students.

The students who receive the PAFA award must qualify based on grade point average and their score on a nationally recognized standardized test. Recipients graduating from high school must also have completed a solid core of academic courses. I commend those students who received the Presidential Academic Fitness Award and encourage them to continually pursue high academic goals.

I am optimistic that even more superintendents and principals will choose to reinforce academic efforts of their students through this Presidential award in the coming school year.

THE GRANITE SCHOOL DISTRICT AWARDS

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I have just learned that the Granite School District in my great State of Utah has been awarded two citations for outstanding educational efforts in the field of home and family living. As you know, Mr. President, I have been one who has constantly championed the home as the basic unit of our society. We are all aware that the moral fibre of our society is determined more by the hearthside values of the home than by any other force.

Moreover, Mr. President, I have also promoted the notion that the private sector can do more than the Federal Government in assisting schools achieve excellence in many fields—the preservation of and the integrity of the home being one.

The Granite School District in Salt Lake City, UT, has just been recognized by the American Vocational Association and others as having achieved the distinction of developing exemplary programs in parenthood/child development programs. The Granite School District's kindergarten through high school parent education program, which includes one elementary school, two junior high schools, and two high school courses is one from a field of 79 selected for this honor. This award, sponsored by the W.K. Kellog Foundation, is one of the most prestigous awards in the field which acknowledges the home as the basic unit in our society.

Mr. President, the second recognition of the Granite School District is the National Dairy Board Award which is awarded after looking at outstanding programs in nutrition education in the public schools. Here again, the Granite School District was chosen as one of six from a field representative of every State in the Nation.

I ask unanimous consent that the statement on "Nutrition in Good Taste," which outlines the Granite program, along with the Voc Ed Special Report which discusses the parenthood education curriculum in the Granite School District be printed in their entirety in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD immediately following my remarks. These two programs can serve as a model for other school systems to emulate in developing programs with resources other than Federal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I would also like to say at this time that J. Reed Call, superintendent of the Granite School District, and Almina Barksdale, coordinator for home economics education, should be commended for the outstanding contribution they are making in fostering better cooperation between school systems and the private sector where promoting the family and its importance as a unit in society is concerned.

EXHIBIT 1

NUTRITION WITH GOOD TASTE—GRANITE SCHOOL DISTRICT'S ELEMENTARY SCHOOL NUTRITION PROGRAM

Elementary school teachers generally do not take a college class in nutrition. This would indicate a limited knowledge of nutritional concepts and how to effectively teach them. This lack of training is one reason why few teachers in the elementary schools get involved in teaching nutrition.

With this information in mind, Granite School District, Salt Lake City, Utah, began a nutrition program in the elementary schools in 1973. One teacher with a degree in home economics was hired to develop and teach the course. It was organized so that the nutrition teacher taught a series of six 30-45 minutes lessons, one per week, for six weeks to each classroom. A worksheet, or a related puzzle, was a follow-up activity for each lesson. Optional inservice workshops were provided for elementary classroom teachers.

Presently there are four nutrition specialists serving 30 of the 60 elementary schools. Schedules are rotated each year to accommodate the entire district. This means about 14,000 students are taught nutrition by a qualified teacher each year.

The curriculum is called "Nutrition With Good Taste." A highlight in each lesson is a tasting experience that reinforces the concept taught in that lesson. In some cases the children help with the food preparation. All teaching must be done with portable equipment because the nutrition specialist moves from room to room carrying her equipment on a utility cart.

The curriculum is designed so that learning is sequential. Level "A" is for grades K-2, and focuses on acquainting the children with a wide variety of foods. Each food group is introduced, and learning activities help students identify which foods belong in each group. Other topics, such as good breakfasts, dental hygiene, cleanliness, and manners are also discussed.

The focus in Level "B", for grades 3-4, elaborates on the Basic 4 guide to good nutrition. Planning balanced meals, learning the simple functions of six nutrients (Vitamins A, C, D, Calcium, Iron, and Protein), and the food sources of these nutrients are the topics emphasized.

The focus of Level "C", for grades 5-6, is to expand the knowledge of nutrients and their functions. Planning balanced menus for a whole day and learning the six nutrient categories (protein, carbohydrates, fats, vitamins, minerals, and water) and their functions, are topics that are covered.

All concepts are taught at the cognitive levels of the students involved.

This program has been well received by students, teachers, principals and parents. The students look forward to the "nutrition lady." Some teachers have commented that there is increased attendance on nutrition days. Principals welcome the program in their school, and parents are impressed and influenced by it. The nutrition specialists must be flexible in order to accommodate the school's ongoing schedule.

Granite School District has also published a 287 page book called "Classroom Nutrition—Ideas and Projects by the Teachers of Granite School District." This is a compilation of ideas that were developed as part of the teacher inservice workshops. These workshops were held each year for elementary classroom teachers who wanted more background and ideas for teaching nutrition. The book contains ideas for worksheets, bulletin boards, food experiences, projects, etc. This publication is an excellent resource for any elementary teacher who wants new ideas for teaching nutrition.

ORGANIZATIONS UNITE TO PROMOTE PARENTING

The comprehensive K-12 parenthood education curriculum for the Granite School District in Salt Lake City, Utah, was developed by the home economics department with special state and federal funds.

The project was initiated as a result of action by the national PTA and the March of Dimes. Additional research by the Utah state and Granite District PTAs ascertained that parents want schools to do more to prepare students to be responsible parents and adults.

The four-year project resulted in the development of a five-part curriculum that includes "Parenthood Education" and "Family Life" at the senior high school level, "Teen Living" and "Family Life Units" in the junior high and middle school, and "All About Families" for grades K-6.

The PTA study found three areas of concern common to all curriculum levels. They are: interpersonal relationships, family resource management and child rearing. These areas of concern are the connecting link and focus of the project.

Objectives targeted by the PTA include:

Improving the quality of family life by developing student skills and positive attitudes dealing with self, family and peer relationships.

Identifying values and goals and recognizing their importance in the decision-making process.

Developing positive attitudes toward the care of children.

Identifying critical nurturing and parenting skills.

Developing resource management abilities.

The senior high and junior high/middle school programs also include sections on issues of immediate concern to the adolescent. These include: where to find help in crisis situations; how to cope with stress, loneliness and rejections; how to help others.

The elementary school curriculum is designed to be infused into the teacher's subject areas, rather than being a self-contained unit of study. The family focus concept encourages the students to share the lesson learnings with their families. Parents are asked to feed back to the teacher the results of this interaction.

INNER-CITY PROGRAM HELPS NEW PARENTS

The Akron family life programs have been developed to meet the needs of inner-city families with children under the age of 3. The typical client or student is an ADC recipient and undereducated. She has few positive parenting skills and has unrealistic expectations for her child's developmental progress. The typical parent is a woman in her very early 20s.

Referrals to the family life office may be from one of many community agencies or from a friend or relative of the family. Many times, the parent herself calls to ask for services.

Basic information is taken over the phone and the referral is given to the parent/child teacher, who makes a home visit within five days. She interviews the parent(s), observes the child(ren) and discusses with the parent the purpose of the program and suggests the service that seems most appropriate for the family.

Home visits are provided for the parent with a very young infant who needs help with basic infant care and with providing a stimulating learning environment. The home visits, which are funded by Title XX, Ohio Department of Public Welfare, are scheduled once a week on the same day and at the same time. The home visitors are paraprofessionals who know the community and who have been trained through extensive inservice. They provide information about community agencies and help parents make contacts.

HISPANIC HERITAGE WEEK

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, September 16 marks both the beginning of National Hispanic Heritage Week, and the 162d anniversary of Mexico's independence from Spain.

This week of commemoration provides us an important opportunity to pay tribute to the Hispanic Americans—celebrating the tremendous contributions they have made to the growth of our Nation, and refocusing attention on the special needs of this important community.

Hispanic Americans have long played an important role in the development of our society. This is particularly evident in the political arena, where the number of Hispanics holding public office, at both the local and national level, has greatly increased in recent years.

Today, Hispanic Americans have been elected as mayors, Governors, Members of Congress, and councilmembers. Prominent individuals from the Hispanic community in Michigan include Gumecindo Salas, who served until 1984 on the State board of education. Tony Benavides, Paul Vasquez, and Lee Silva are three outstanding Hispanic Americans who have been elected as city council members in the cities of Lansing, Flint, and Ecorse. Other members of the Hispanic community include George Suarez, mayor of Madison Heights, Federal Judge George La Plata, Detroit District Judge Isidoro Torres, and school board member David Rodriguez of Grand Rapids.

On the national level, Hispanic Americans in Congress, through the Hispanic Congressional Caucus, focus special attention on issues of concern to the Hispanic community. Other prominent Hispanic-Americans holding public office include Mayor Henry Cisneros of San Antonio, Federico Pena from Denver, and Governor Tony Anaya of New Mexico.

In part, the political achievements of these individuals were made possible by the support provided by the Hispanic community. Voter registration records indicate that voting among Hispanics has increased substantially over the past 4 years. It is clear that, as a voting bloc, Hispanic Americans can play a critically important role in determining the outcome of elections.

The contribution of Hispanic Americans to the cultural growth and development of this country is also significant. Their unique culture and talents have added to the diversity of our Nation in the fields of art, music, sports, and cuisine.

In acknowledging the important contributions and achievements of Hispanic Americans, we must not overlook the many problems which threaten to prevent Hispanic Americans from participating fully in our society.

Statistics from a 1983 Report of the Committee on Public Works and Transportation reveal that Hispanics are still victims of inadequate opportunity in employment, housing, and education. The median income for Hispanic families is $16,228, as compared to the national average of $23,433. Unemployment for Hispanics also remains 3 percent higher than the national average, and there are twice as many Hispanics living below the Federal poverty level than average.

In the area of education, Hispanic Americans remain one of the least educated groups in our country. Only 44.5 percent of Hispanic Americans ever complete high school, and of those who do, only 7.7 percent continue on to college.

As the fastest-growing minority group in our country today, we must pay special attention to the challenges facing Hispanic Americans. As we work together to overcome the obstacles which make it difficult for Hispanic Americans to participate fully in our society, we build an America which can offer greater opportunity to all Americans.

AMERICAN SUCCESS STORY—M. JACOB & SON

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, on September 24, 1985, the M. Jacob & Sons Co. will celebrate the beginning of its second century in Detroit.

The history of this company, and its founder, is a typical story of immigrant hopes, dreams, and success in a free society.

The legacy left by the founder Max Jacob is rich, not in power and wealth, but in terms of hard work, innovation, commitment, and quality of service to customers.

In 1885, American industry was quickly moving forward. For 21-year-old Max Jacob, a recent immigrant from Lithuania, anything was possible. He was a rugged individualist who recognized bottles as his key to success in America.

In the beginning, Max Jacob bought used bottles; he washed, sorted, sold, and delivered them—a need no other business filled at that time—establishing the first bottle distributorship in the country.

The company was a one-man operation. Patent medicines and prescriptions remedies required bottles. There were 21 breweries in Detroit; there were plenty of bottles for Jacobs and his new company. His customer list grew quickly, he bought a fine horse and wagon and his profits began to rise. In the beginning, bottles were hand-blown. But, the development of automatic machinery changed the industry and the scope of Max Jacob's enterprise.

By the time he was 45, Max Jacob's sons were joining his business. They diversified the company and began to supply their containers and closures to companies other than breweries, up to then their major customers.

As the company grew and progressed, a grandson added plastic containers to the glass line; this was a huge step forward for the firm. And today, there is a great-grandson who has moved the firm further ahead by creating a division which supplies major mass merchandisers across America.

Four generations of the Jacob family have established M. Jacob & Sons as the oldest and one of the largest container suppliers in the United States. Each new generation has contributed its talents, and the firm has experienced those ups and downs which go with economic depressions and recessions, national crisis, and changes in technology.

But, Mr. President, there is more to this story than just a successful business venture.

In the best tradition of community service, M. Jacob & Sons this year received the "Contractor of the Year" award from the Jewish Vocational Service and Community Workshop of Detroit. The award is given annually to the firm with "outstanding cooperation in the advancement of a rehabilitation program for the vocationally handicapped workers" served by this agency.

And, in the best tradition of historical endowment, the ceremonies on September 24 will be highlighted by the company's presentation of its antique bottle collection to historic Greenfield Village.

Finally, it should be noted that the ceremonies on the 24th will take place at the Max Jacob House located on the campus of Wayne State University. Mr. Jacob lived in this home in the second decade of this century, and the home has been renovated with the help of his descendants and today houses the offices of the art history department of the University and its extensive slide library.

Mr. President, I am pleased to bring the story to the attention of my colleagues in the Senate. It is with pride that the citizens of Detroit help M. Jacob & Sons into its second century. I want to congratulate the descendants, the proud family members who will gather on September 24 to remember the past, celebrate the present, and plan for a bright future.

THE SCHOOL PRAYER AMENDMENT

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, it is my understanding that a little later in the day the distinguished Senator from North Carolina, Senator HELMS, will offer a proposal to provide for a school prayer amendment. The amendment, as I understand it, would strip the courts of their authority with respect to school prayer.

Mr. President, this Senator strongly believes in school prayer, very strongly. I think school prayer makes sense. If anybody disagrees with the notion that it makes sense, they should recall what happens here, what happened this morning, what happens whenever the Senate comes into session. The Chaplain leads off with a prayer. That is the high point of the day. I have been listening to those prayers for 28 years. They are always inspiring, uplifting.

Mr. President, they are like other prayers. I have heard thousands and thousands of prayers. In fact, I went to a prep school in my childhood where we had prayers at every meal, we had prayers in the chapel, which we had every single night and twice on Sunday. We always had different ministers give the prayer. I was a Catholic; it was a Protestant school.

I cannot remember a single prayer that was not an inspiration and good. I think we are all better off if we are exposed as much as possible to prayer. I think many, many people do not get that opportunity.

Having said that, Mr. President, I must say I am going to strongly oppose the Helms position. I do so because what he is proposing, in stripping the courts of authority, would have an appalling effect on the Constitution and set a precedent which, it seems to me, would provide a very, very bad situation in which, if Congress disagreed or the Senate disagreed with the Supreme Court, we would strip it of authority. It would certainly leave a shambles of the Constitution.

So, for that reason, I will oppose the Helms position, and I hope that we can find a form in which we can vote on school prayer without devastating the Constitution in the process.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

(Mr. DENTON assumed the chair.)

TAMPERING WITH CONSTITUTIONAL PROCEDURES

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I should like to join with my distinguished and very senior friend [Mr. PROXMIRE] whose early exposure to school prayer obviously has done him nothing but good; I share so many of his views in this matter, most particularly the view that we should not tamper with the constitutional procedures of the United States of America as it approaches its third century. Nor should we attempt to strip from the Supreme Court its right to hear whatever cases are brought before it, which it decides have constitutional merit.

The importance of the matter of Court-stripping derives in singular measure from the fact that it is arguably within the powers of the Congress to do so. The Constitution does provide that Congress can restrict the appellate jurisdiction of the Court, and the Court accepted this in Ex parte McCardle, a Civil War case having to do with a Mississippi editor who was arrested on charges of publishing incendiary and libelous articles.

Legal scholars since have differed on this question, but as my distinguished and learned friend from Wisconsin knows, no less a person than Justice Owen Roberts, after his retirement from the bench in an address in New York City before the New York Bar Association, suggested that while he was the last person to favor tinkering with the Constitution, it might well be in order to amend the Constitution to deal with this ambiguity. There is no question that in judicial practice, as it has emerged from the time of Marbury versus Madison, the Court's independence of the Congress with respect to what matters it will or will not consider has been complete, with the one exception of 1868. For us to stand here and frivolously strip the Court of a power to decide what cases to hear would be to impose upon the separation of powers and the balance within the constitutional system, in a manner that has not been contemplated in a century. Surely, the framers of the Constitution did not intend this consequence; they shared John Marshall's interpretation, later accepted by Presidents and accepted by Congress, that in the end, the Court would and should determine what the Constitution says.

If we do this, would the Senator from Wisconsin dare to suggest where we might stop, if we strip the Court of the power to hear cases in regard to school prayer?

Do we next strip it of the power to take issues concerning free speech? Do we strip it of the power to consider all first amendment rights, freedom of the press, religion, and assembly, and then move to the right of the search and seizure? Find a provision in the Bill of Rights which is not endangered. It would required no more than a majority of this Congress, this body and the other body, to say no, that a particular right as contemplated by the Constitution cannot be adjudged by the Court. In such a world, the Constitution could be violated and there would be no sure remedy.

Mr. President, is there a better formula for bringing chaos to a system that has endured two centuries? That we contemplate this is baffling.

I say to my distinguished and learned friend, it is not surprising that along with the distinguished Presiding Officer, there are only three of us on the floor of the Senate. I dare suggest that there are Members too appalled to come and speak or too embarrassed to come and speak. We are an empty Chamber as we contemplate a measure of the most profound constitutional consequence.

The Senator has been kind to sit and hear me out, but may I ask him, does he not consider that if we were to adopt this measure today, we would put in jeopardy every right contained in the Bill of Rights?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I wholeheartedly agree with my good friend from New York. I am so happy that he was on the floor when I made my brief statement. he has very generously referred to me as learned, which is not the case, but I am delighted to be flattered. The Senator from New York obviously has an understanding and a grasp of this situation that exceeds that of virtually every other Member of the Senate. I think his point is indisputable. There is no question about it. regardless of how a person may feel about this particular provision, school prayer—some favor it, some oppose it. As I say, I enthusiastically favor it—there is no way—no way—that you can justify stripping the Supreme Court. As the Senator has said so well, if we start there, there is no end to it—freedom of speech, the entire Bill of Rights, the whole Constitution is vulnerable. I think that completely must overweigh any consideration we may have for the immediate advantage we might achieve.

So I am delighted my good friend from New York has spoken with such force and eloquence and knowledge. I thank him.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I thank my friend from Wisconsin.

It is staggering. We have dealt with this measure. We had it on the floor in 1982. We have debated it year after year.

It is something beyond my imagination that this matter, having been debated and having been disposed of in 1982, should be back here 4 years later.

I said earlier, and I repeat, that the particular peril and poignancy of this issue and the measure before us is that there is an arguable constitutional basis.

Article III, section 2, of the Constitution, describing the jurisdiction of the U.S. Supreme Court, states:

. . . the Supreme Court shall have appellate Jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make.

In the aftermath of the Civil War, Congress did move to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court in a habeas corpus matter. The Court, in ex parte McCardle, acknowledged its lack of jurisdiction, based on the law. Later, the Court affirmed that it would hear the same matter in other circumstances. So you might say that the Court did not, in the end, submit to the will of Congress—as in my judgment it ought not to have done.

I said earlier, and I repeat, that the framers at the Philadelphia convention who wrote article III, section 2, had a number of matters in mind. We all do accept the fact that the exact intention of many of the procedural measures in the Constitution is not known. There is no record of the debate. No notes were taken. But have no doubt about what the Constitution means in all its essential provisions. It means what it says.

However, it is also the case that in trying to contemplate the workings of the new Supreme Court, there was a matter to be dealt with in the context of the existing courts of 13 States, and they thought it would be wise simply to let Congress work out the details.

They did not at that point foresee the actions of the Court under John Marshall, who made the necessary and wholly happy judgment that, in the end, somebody would have to decide what the Constitution says, and that the proper role of the Court is to declare what the law is—including the highest law, the law of the Constitution itself.

So we began the practice of the Supreme Court ruling on what is constitutional and what is not. It was a slowly evolving practice, beginning with Marbury versus Madison.

If I am not mistaken—the distinguished Presiding Officer [Mr. DENTON], were he free to speak from his podium, might correct me—I do not believe that the Court ruled a measure unconstitutional thereafter for a long period, until the Dred Scott decision. But we have developed a system in which the Court rules on matters of constitutionality with great frequency and changes its mind, ruling a matter unconstitutional in one decade and finding differently in another; as was true most recently with the Court's decision on February 19 of this year in San Antonio Transit Authority versus Garia overruling the 1976 National League of Cities versus Usery decision; There was also a case, not distant, in which an issue was resolved as unconstitutional in one year and the Court changed its mind the following year, and so stated. I believe the two decisions were Carter versus Carter Coal Co., in 1936, and NLRB versus Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., in 1937. Any human institution is subject to that kind of correction. And why not? The system serves.

Here we are in the 99th Congress, approaching the 200th anniversary of the constitutional system, a written constitutional system. No constitution in the history of the world has persisted as ours has done. And here we put it all in jeopardy with the chaos, the bitterness, the confusion, the contention, and the catastrophe that would emerge from the sudden discovery that there was no place in our system which could rule what are the rights of the citizen under the Constitution—rules decided and settled.

The very proposition that we can deny the Supreme Court the right to hear cases brought under the first amendment puts in jeopardy every entitlement of the Bill of Rights—every provision.

With respect to the powers of government, as described in the respective articles of the Constitution that delineate what exactly it is that Congress may do, the President may do, and the courts may do, I do not in any way lessen their significance to our system of government. They describe it. But I remind this Chamber that the precise question of individual rights was omitted from the final test of the American Constitution, under the theory that the framers were drawing up a list of the powers that were to be made available to a central government, limited and specified powers.

It followed in logic and law that no grant of authority not given could be exercised. In logic, that was a compelling argument. In reality, that was the grasp of reality that so marked the genius of our framers. It was not a good argument, for the simple reason that what was implicitly understood by one generation might not be understood by the next and could not be disproved in the absence of written evidence.

So the first question to which the Senate and the House of Representatives addressed themselves was the specific designation of rights of citizens that this Congress could not infringe upon, even though in logic it had no right to begin with.

Let us not be too dependent on logic, said the men who had fought a revolution and struggled with a confederation, and were learned beyond anything we could hope for today in the realities of government and the history of governments.

Say it right there and start out with the first amendment, which says Congress shall make no law—and it lists—with respect to freedom of speech, freedom of assembly, the establishment of religion, and the freedom of the press.

I do not claim to be as much an authority as a historian or a parliamentarian would be, but to my knowledge we have never until this last decade begun to discuss whether we should strip the Court of its specific appellate jurisdiction with regard to a first amendment issue. The legislation under which the ex parte McCardle case came forward was not such legislation. It was legislation having to do with powers of government in the Civil War, a war between the States.

The first amendment affirms the right of speech, the right of assembly, the right of freedom of religion, Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion or restricting the free exercise thereof. After removing jurisdiction here, shall we then go the 2, and to the 3, the 4, the 5, the 6, the 7, the 8, the 9, and the 10th amendments. The 10th amendment simply reaffirms the original understanding of the framers that no power shall be exercised save that which is granted by the Constitution. Those that remain are reserved to the States or to the people themselves.

The imagination is all but stilled at contemplating what might happen if this legislation should pass. It is a thought that has not occurred to us as a people. It is a proposal that has not been judged in this body save once before as memory serves me, and that was in 1982, in August of that year, when we discussed a similar measure.

At that time, Mr. President, I took the liberty of calling attention to one of the inscriptions on the walls of our Chamber which is also on our great seal: Novus Ordo Seclorum, a new cycle of the ages, a new standard of Government. We set up something special in Philadelphia in 1787. It has served us as no people could ever have hoped to have been served. It has preserved the freedom of speech. It has preserved the freedom of the press. Go around the world and find where else they exist as here.

Sometimes the Court has preserved our rights against the efforts of the Executive and the efforts of the legislative body to infringe on those freedoms. In the end it has been the Supreme Court of the United States that has upheld them, and Congress and the Executive in their wisdom and prudence have acceded it that role.

It is a role as imbued in our constitutional fabric as any practice in this Nation. And here we are contemplating stripping it from our liberties. Strip the power of the Supreme Court to judge whether the liberties of the American people and their institutions have been infringed upon in violation of the Constitution, and you have for practical purposes stripped those liberties and rights from that Constitution.

I do not wish to be apocalyptic. I recognize that what begins as something potential need not in the end reach an extreme; Yet it might.

I ask, Mr. President, would anyone come to the floor of the U.S. Senate and propose to abolish freedom of the press? No. We would not ever start that; besides, the first thing that would be said is that it would be unconstitutional.

We will take the equivalent step if we adopt this measure.

I might just draw attention, Mr. President, to one matter particularly troubling to this Senator, and that is the growing atmosphere which somehow seems to want to call network television news to account for the things it reports about the world, as if somehow the bearer, the messenger, was responsible for the message.

We have had a year of unprecedented charges made against network news.

I might interrupt here to note that in the effort to get us news, two brave and extraordinarily skilled and professional television journalists, Neal Davo and William Latch, were shot down in cold blood in a tinhorn rebellion coup, a military coup in Thailand just 2 days ago. In using the word "tinhorn," I use the words of Mr. Tom Brokaw of "NBC News," who was speaking with sadness and poignancy on behalf of his fellow journalists at NBC, about the death of two of their colleagues, a concern shared throughout the profession.

If we can strip the Supreme Court of its authority to hear cases on the free exercise of religion under the first amendment or the establishment of religion under the first amendment, we can strip from television news the first amendment rights of freedom of the press which they enjoy, and which we need as a nation and the Court will protect as an institution—but which in the hysteria of the moment present just a little bit in this Chamber today could be taken away.

Mr. President, I have nothing to add to what I have said, save to plead with this body to be faithful to the oath each of us takes. We take an oath to uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States. It is not an oath to ensure that tobacco allotments are continued and flourish. It is not an oath to see that mass transit funds are appropriated, or commodity prices for wheat are maintained, or any of the other things which necessarily preoccupy us in the day-to-day work of the Senate. Our oath is to uphold the Constitution, to protect the Constitution, and that is the decision we are going to make in this body before this day is closed.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

NATIONAL FAMILY WEEK

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the pending business.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A House message on Senate Joint Resolution 31 to designate the week of November 24 through November 30, 1985 as National Family Week.

The Senate resumed consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments to Senate Joint Resolution 31.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

SCHOOL PRAYER

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I wish to speak briefly on this because it is an issue that does concern me. I have great respect for the sincerity of the sponsors of this amendment. My father happens to be a Lutheran minister; my brother is a Lutheran minister. I understand the yearning that people have for a sense of ideals and idealism and moral values.

But there are things that a government can do well and there are things that government cannot do well. Government is good at providing aid to students who want to go to college. These pages who one of these days are going to be going to college, I hope we can have good student aid programs for that. We are good at that. We are good at constructing highways, including highways in North Carolina and Illinois.

But I think there are areas where government has to be careful, where we would have to be cautious. One of the distinguished predecessors of the Senator from North Carolina was Senator Sam Ervin, who warned us that we have to be very careful about this entanglement of Government in religion.

There are areas where we can encourage, where there is no problem; for example, giving tax exempt status. We give it to the Lutheran Church or the Baptist Church or the Catholic Church or the Jewish Synagogue or to the Society of Atheists or anyone else who has religious conviction. But when government starts to promote religion, I think we have to be very, very careful.

I remember when I was stationed in the Army in Germany. I happened to be in a community that was Lutheran; and in Germany every community is, by tradition, either Luthern or Catholic. I attended the local Lutheran services there and you had a handful of people. It was the official religion, it was encouraged, received State support, financial support, but it did not have the vitality that it does in a community in Illinois or a community in North Carolina. So I think we have to be careful.

There is a second thing that bothers me in this area. I have a colleague over in the House, DAN GLICKMAN, a Member of the House from Wichita, KS. When DAN GLICKMAN was in the fourth grade, every morning he was excused from the fourth grade classroom while they had a school prayer. Then, every morning he was brought back in. DAN GLICKMAN happened to be Jewish in a community that is overwhelmingly non-Jewish. Every morning little DANNY GLICKMAN was being told, "You are different." All the other fourth graders were being told, "DANNY GLICKMAN is different."

I do not think that is a very healthy thing. I think we have to be very, very careful as we move ahead in this area of church-state relations.

Again, as I said in opening my remarks, I respect the sincerity of my colleague from North Carolina, and those who are supporting this. But this is an area where I think we have to be very, very careful. We do not want Government running religion, and we do not want religion running the Government. We need a healthy mix but we have to be awfully careful on that mix. We have a prayer by a Chaplain that opens this session. But it is completely voluntary. In fact, it is so voluntary there are not too many of us here when we have that opening prayer by the Chaplain ordinarily in the morning.

But I think that is the way it has to be. We have to set it up in such a way that things can be completely voluntary, and that we do not demand that fourth-graders make decisions in the matter of religion that the Government imposes on them.

So, with all due respect to my distinguished colleague from North Carolina, I am going to be voting against his amendment.

I will be pleased to yield to my colleague from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, PAUL SIMON knows me personally. He is the most delightful gentleman I have ever met. He is persuasive, he is a hard worker, and he is dedicated to what he believes. I do not find a great deal wrong with what the distinguished Senator from Illinois has said. In the first place, I agree with him. I do not think the Government should promote religion. I have never proposed that. Second, we have to decide, however, whether we are talking about freedom of religion or freedom from religion. I think that is the question.

The Supreme Court, whether the Senator wishes to acknowledge it or not, has gotten this Government involved in religion with a very unwise and unneeded decision. It was promoted by a woman named Madalyn Murray. She is now Madalyn Murray O'Hair. I do not know whether the Senator has ever met the man who was then the little boy around whom this controversy centered. His name is Bill Murray. Bill Murray is going around this country today apologizing for what his mother did to him—using him. He will tell you, if you ask him, that one of the most important things that needs to be done in this country is to get our priorities straight, and to restore the right of voluntary prayer to the schoolchildren of America.

What I am proposing is not a constitutional amendment. It is not "court stripping" as is so often charged. It is simply the implementation of article III of the Constitution of the United States. I am sure the Senator is familiar with that. Article III of the Constitution provides the Congress of the United States with the authority, and I think the duty, to limit the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court and/or the other Federal courts when in the judgment of the Congress of the United States the Supreme Court has exceeded its purview. That is all I am seeking to do—to take this matter out of the Federal Government and put it back where it was for all the years since this Republic was established—put it in the hands of the individual States. There was not any problem until Madalyn O'Hair and others initiated lawsuits which resulted in the unfortunate decisions by the Supreme Court.

We ought to get the Government out of it. I agree with the Senator. I certainly do not believe that the Government should promote any religion. Nor do I believe the Government ought to forbid religion. The question is freedom of religion. It is not a question of freedom from religion.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. SIMON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I thank the Chair.

If I may just respond very briefly, the Court got involved originally with this issue when the New York Board of Regents said every schoolchild in the State of New York will recite this prayer. It seems to me the Supreme Court ruled properly that Government cannot be dictating what the people pray. I have never met Madalyn Murray O'Hair or her son. Their original case was in Champaign County, IL, as a matter of fact—in my State. But the first Supreme Court ruling came in that New York Board of Regents case. It seems to me that that Court ruling is sound.

When we say voluntary prayer, the question comes up: Whose prayer? I happen to be a Lutheran. Do we take Lutheran prayer; do we take Baptist prayer? We have a State represented in this Senate where a good percentage of the population is Buddhist. I do not know how many people in North Carolina would like to have a Buddhist prayer opening the school in the morning. I think we are getting into quicksand that we are better off avoiding. Again, I have great respect for the Senator from North Carolina and his sincerity on this thing. But I think there are things the Government can properly do to encourage religion, like having tax-exempt status. I think there are things that we ought to avoid. I think the Senator from North Carolina, with all due respect, has touched on one of those things that we ought to avoid.

Mr. HELMS. Will my friend yield?

Mr. SIMON. I am pleased to yield.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Senator most sincerely.

One of the byproducts of the campaign to preserve this unfortunate series of Supreme Court decisions is that a myth has grown up that the people of various denominations and faiths cannot get along. My children are out of school. I have five grandchildren. I will not go into how great they are. But three of them are in school. I hope the day never comes when anybody suggests that they should leave the classroom because some prayer may be offensive. I would want them to listen to the Jewish prayer, or Catholic prayer, or whatever. I happen to be a Baptist. And I am convinced that the Baptist Christian faith, as long as it is faithful to the truth, has nothing to fear.

Let me tell the Senator what I did for a week in August. I do not know whether you know this or not. But I may be the only Baptist deacon who participated in the dedication of a Jewish synagogue in Jerusalem. I went to Jerusalem the first week in August to help dedicate a synagogue which was built by the father of the distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. HECHT].

I believe Mr. Hecht, Sr., is 95 or 96 years old. He has devoted a great deal of resources to building things in Israel—hospitals, orphanages, a synagogue.

I would say to the Senator that while I always intend to be true to my Baptist upbringing, I was never more impressed than I was on the occasion of the dedication of that synagogue.

So rather than to imagine that we are going to pull ourselves apart by restoring to little children the right to prayer in school, I say let us examine the Jewish faith, the Christian faith, Catholicism, whatever, because presumably all of us worship the same God.

The prayer to which the Senator alluded, which has been regarded as horrendous, the one prepared by the New York regents, let me read it. It is a terrible thing that they propose for the little children as prayer. I will read you verbatim exactly what they propose:

> Almighty God, we acknowledge our dependence upon Thee, and we beg Thy blessings upon us, our parents, our teachers, and our Country.

This is the prayer recommended by the New York State Board of Regents to local school districts which was struck down as unconstitutional by the U.S. Supreme Court in the infamous case of Engel versus Vitale in 1962. The Court held that, even when recited by students on a voluntary basis, this simple prayer was unconstitutional in American public schools.

Mr. President, almost a quarter century has now passed since the Supreme Court first banned voluntary group prayer in the public schools. A generation of Americans has now grown up without the basic freedom to pray at school—a freedom enjoyed by every previous generation of Americans.

As we begin a new school year in September 1985, the time has come to end this gross deprivation of religious liberty and to restore the fundamental right to engage in voluntary school prayer.

Fortunately, the framers of the Constitution gave Congress explicit authority to provide a check on usurpations of power by the Supreme Court. My legislation uses this authority, contained in article III of the Constitution, to withdraw Federal court jurisdiction over school prayer cases, thereby returning the issue to the States, localities, and parents where it belongs and where it was before the Supreme Court rulings of the early 1960's.

Mr. President, religious liberty is too important to leave exclusively in the hands of judicial elites more concerned about imposing their own political views on the Nation than in objectively interpreting the words of the Constitution. My legislation will effectively replace the nonsense of Federal judges on school prayer over the previous two decades with the common sense and practical experience of the American people over the prior 170 years.

Mr. President, the legislation I propose today is substantially similar to the legislation that twice passed the Senate in 1979, only to die in the House Judiciary Committee without ever reaching the House floor for a vote. It is also substantially similar to the amendment I offered in 1982 which received 53 votes in favor of it on a tabling motion before later being set aside on another procedural motion.

The point here, Mr. President, is that this legislation is familiar to the Senate and has received substantial support in the recent past.

Mr. President, the purpose of this legislation is to restore freedom to the States to allow voluntary prayer, Bible reading, and religious meetings in public schools. Through a series of Supreme Court decisions, this freedom—elementary to the drafters of the Constitution—has been taken away from the States. It is time we in Congress restored this fundamental American liberty.

Mr. President, my legislation takes advantage of the congressional authority, given explicitly in article III, sections 1 and 2, of the Constitution, to regulate the general jurisdiction of the inferior Federal courts and the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. It curtails such jurisdiction so that Federal courts no longer have the power to hear cases involving voluntary prayer, Bible reading, and religious meetings in the public schools.

The result is that such cases become exclusively a matter for the States to handle as they see fit. In effect, prayer would be a local option. This result is fully consistent with the original purpose of the establishment clause of the first amendment, which was to prohibit the establishment of a national church and to leave the remaining issues of church-state relations strictly with the States.

Mr. President, some of my friends have advocated that we adopt a constitutional amendment to correct the courts and restore the freedom to pray in the schools. This is one approach among many which the Constitution allows, and it is an approach that I have supported in the past and still favor today.

But, Mr. President, it is not the only way for Congress to correct erroneous Federal court rulings, nor in my opinion is it the best. The Constitution provides several other more direct ways for Congress to check abuses of the judicial branch, including control of jurisdiction, Senate confirmation of judicial appointments, specific congressional enforcement of constitutional provisions, and impeachment.

As is well known, the constitutional amendment process was intentionally set up to be difficult. The normal procedure is for a two-thirds vote in both Houses of Congress followed by ratification by three-quarters of the State legislatures. This procedure presents an extremely heavy burden to meet. The framers of the Constitution specifically wanted it this way to protect the constitutional text from constant change.

If, however, Congress relegates itself solely to the amendment process to correct judicial errors and usurpations, then the very difficulty of the amendment process will be used to protect, not the constitutional text, but distortions of it. Thus, in the face of usurping Federal judges, the amendment process would serve to subvert the Constitution rather than to preserve it.

In this school prayer matter, Mr. President, the problem has arisen, not because of the text of the Constitution, but because of outright judicial distortions of that text. The text is fine, and the text never prohibited voluntary prayer in the public schools, as American history and experience before the Supreme Court's first prayer decision in 1962 so clearly attest. The text leaves the matter of school prayer, along with other matters of church-state relations, exclusively up to the States. Thus, although we could add a specific constitutional amendment on school prayer, we need not do so in order to restore this fundamental freedom.

The problem in the prayer matter, as in so many areas of constitutional law, is runaway Federal judges bent on imposing their own personal views of good public policy on the American public irrespective of the Constitution. More often than not in recent years, these views have been hostile to both the Constitution and longstanding American traditions. It is no understatement to say that American society has been radically altered in the recent past because of activist Federal judges.

We in Congress have tolerated this judicial usurpation long enough in many areas of the law, and particularly in the area of school prayer. It is time to put a stop to this usurpation and school prayer is a good place to start.

Mr. President, there is at least one Federal judge in this country who has given the correct interpretation of the Constitution with respect to the first amendment and school prayer. Although his judicial brethren higher up overturned his ruling, his opinion will stand for years to come as the definitive statement of how the first amendment was actually intended to work in this area of the law.

I am referring, of course, to the decision of Judge Brevard Hand of Alabama in Jaffree v. Board of School Commissioners of Mobile County, 554 F. Supp. 1104 (S.D. Alabama 1983). It clearly demonstrates the errors of the Supreme Court in banning voluntary group prayer. I ask unanimous consent that the Hand opinion, including footnotes, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the opinion was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[U.S. District Court, S.D. Alabama, S.D.]

JAFFREE v. THE BOARD OF SCHOOL COMMISSIONERS OF MOBILE COUNTY

Jan. 14, 1983

CIV. A. NO. 82-0554-H

MEMORANDUM OPINION

Hand, Chief Judge.

Prelusion

If in the opinion of the People, the distribution or modification of the Constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way in which the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Farewell Address by George Washington, reprinted in R. Berger, Government by Judiciary 299 (1977).

Ishmael Jaffree, on behalf of his three (3) minor children, seeks declaratory and injunctive relief. In the original complaint Mr. Jaffree sought a declaration from the Court that certain prayer activities initiated by his children's public school teachers violated the establishment clause of the first amendment to the United States Constitution. He sought to have these prayer activities enjoined.

A trial was held on the merits on November 15-18, 1982. After hearing the testimony of witnesses, considering the exhibits, discovery, stipulations, pleadings, briefs, and legal arguments of the parties, the Court enters the following findings of fact and conclusions of law.

Footnotes at end of article.

I. Findings of Fact

Ishmael Jaffree is a citizen of the United States, a resident of Mobile County, Alabama, and has three (3) minor children attending public schools in Mobile County, Alabama; Jamael Aakki Jaffree, Makeba Green and Chioke Saleem Jaffree.

Defendants, Annie Bell Phillips (principal) and Julia Green (teacher) are employed at Morningside Elementary School, where Jamael Aakki Jaffree attended school during the 1981-82 school year. Defendants Betty Lee (principal) and Charlene Boyd (teacher) are employed at E.R. Dickson Elementary School where Chioke Saleem Jaffree attended during the 1981-82 school year. Defendants, Emma Reed (principal) and Pixie Alexander (teacher) are employed at Craighead Elementary School where Makeba Green attended school during the 1981-82 school year. Each of these defendants is sued individually and in their official capacity. Each of the schools is part of the system of public education in Mobile County, Alabama.

Dan Alexander, Dr. Norman Berger, Hiram Bosarge, Norman Cox, Ruth F. Drago and Dr. Robert Gilliard are members of the Board of School Commissioners of Mobile County, Alabama. As commissioners, each of these defendants collectively is charged by the laws of the State of Alabama with administering the system of public instruction for Mobile County, Alabama. These defendants are sued only in their official capacity.

Dr. Abe L. Hammons is the Superintendent of Education for Mobile County, Alabama. Defendant Hammons has direct supervisory responsibilities over all principals, teachers and other employees of the Mobile County Public School System. This defendant is sued only in his official capacity.

Defendant Boyd, as early as September 16, 1981, led her class at E.R. Dickson in singing the following phrase:

God is great, God is good,
Let us thank him for our food,
bow our heads we all are fed,
Give us Lord our daily bread.
Amen!

The recitation of this phrase continued on a daily basis throughout the 1981-82 school year.

Defendant Boyd was made aware on September 16, 1981, that the minor plaintiff, Chioke Jaffree, did not want to participate in the singing of the phrase referenced above or be exposed to any other type of religious observances. On March 5, 1982, during a parent-teacher conference. Ms. Boyd was told by Chioke's father that he did not want his son exposed to religious activity in his classroom and that, in Mr. Jaffree's opinion, the activity was unlawful. Again, on March 11, 1982, Ms. Boyd received a handwritten letter from Mr. Jaffree which again advised her that leading her class in chanting the referenced phrase was unlawful. This letter further advised Ms. Boyd that if the practice was not discontinued that he would take further administrative and judicial steps to see that it was. Finally, Ms. Boyd was made aware of the contents of a letter drafted by Mr. Jaffree, dated May 10, 1982, which had been sent to Superintendent Hammons complaining about the prayer activity in Ms. Boyd's classroom. Notwithstanding Mr. Jaffree's protestations, the recitation of the prayer continued.

Defendant Lee learned on March 8, 1982, that Mr. Jaffree had complained about the prayer activities which were being conducted in defendant Boyd's classroom. Ms. Lee directly spoke with Mr. Jaffree on March 11, 1982, and learned from him that he was opposed to the prayer activities in Ms. Boyd's class and that he felt the same to be unconstitutional. On the same day, Ms. Lee called Mr. Larry Newton, Deputy Superintendent, who informed her that the prayer activity in Ms. Boyd's class could continue on a "strictly voluntary basis."

Defendant Pixie Alexander has led her class at Craighead in reciting the following phrase:

God is great, God is good,
Let us thank Him for our food.

Further, defendant Pixie Alexander had her class recite the following, which is known as the Lord's Prayer:

Our Father, which are in heaven, hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread and forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors. And lead us not into temptation but deliver us from evil for thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The recitation of these phrases continued on a daily basis throughout the 1981-82 school year.

Defendant Pixie Alexander learned on May 24, 1982, that Mr. Jaffree had complained, through a letter dated May 10, 1982, to defendant Hammons, about her leading her class in the above-referenced prayer activity. After Ms. Alexander learned of Mr. Jaffree's May 10, 1982 letter, she continued to lead her class in reciting the referenced phrases.

Ms. Green admitted that she frequently leads her class in singing the following song:

For health and strength and daily food,
we praise Thy name, Oh Lord.

This activity continued throughout the school year, despite the fact that Ms. Green had knowledge that plaintiff did not want his child exposed to the above-mentioned song. See defendant Green's response to plaintiffs' Interrogatories Nos. 21, 22, 50 and 51.

Upon learning of the plaintiffs' concern over prayer activity in their schools, defendants Reed and Phillips consulted with teachers involved, however, neither defendant advised or instructed the defendant teachers to discontinue the complained of activity.

Prior to the 1981-82 school year, defendants Reed, Phillips, Boyd, and to a lesser extent, Green, each knew the Board of School Commissioners of Mobile County had a policy regarding religious activity in public schools. However, not one of the teachers sought or received advice from the board or the superintendent prior to the plaintiff's initial complaint regarding whether their classroom prayer activities were consistent with the policy.

The policy on religious instruction adopted by the Board of School Commissioners of Mobile County reads as follows:

Religious instruction

Schools shall comply with all existing state and federal laws as these laws pertain to religious practices and the teaching of religion. This policy shall not be interpreted to prohibit teaching about the various religions of the world, the influence of the Judeo-Christian faith on our society, and the values and ideals of the American way of life.

School attendance is compulsory in the State of Alabama. Alabama Code § 16-28-3 (1975).

The complaint in this case was later amended to include allegations against Governor Fob James and various state officials. The claims against the state officials were severed, Fed.R.Civ.P. 21, and they are the subject of a separate order which the Court entered today.

This recitation of the findings of fact is not intended to be an all-inclusive statement of the facts as they were produced in this case. Because of the following opinion the Court is of the impression that the facts above-recited constitute a sufficient recitiation for deciding this case. However, in the event there is a disagreement with the conclusions reached by this Court, the Court does not desire to be precluded from a further recitation of appropriate fact as may be essential to further conclusions in the case. Examples of what the Court alludes to is the factual bases for consideration of the questions of freedom of speech, whether or not secular humanism is in fact a religion, and the propriety of the free exercise of religion.

II. Conclusion of law

A. Subject-Matter Jurisdiction

[1, 2] This action is brought under 42 U.S.C. § 1983.[1] The complaint alleges that the subject-matter jurisdiction of the Court "is evoked pursuant to Title 28, Sections 1343(3) and (4), and Sections 2201 and 2202 of the United States Code." See Complaint at 2 (filed May 28, 1982). Neither of the two amended complaints add anything to this jurisdictional allegation.[2]

[3, 4] The complaint alleges that rights guaranteed to the plaintiffs under the first and fourteenth amendments have been violated.[3] The subject-matter jurisdiction of a federal court over a claim arising under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 rests upon 28 U.S.C. § 1343(3). While the complaint does not allege that subject-matter jurisdiction is vested in the court under the general, federal-question jurisdictional statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1331, certainly subject-matter jurisdiction is vested under that provision since a federal district court has "original jurisdiction of all civil actions arising under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States," 28 U.S.C. § 1331, exclusive of the amount-in-controversy. Thus, the Court concludes that it has subject-matter jurisdiction over the claims alleged by the plaintiffs.[4]

B. School-Prayer Precedent

The United States Supreme Court has previously addressed itself in many cases to the practice of prayer and religious services in the public schools. As courts are wont to say, this court does not write upon a clean slate when it addresses the issue of school prayer.

Viewed historically, three decisions have lately provided general rules for school prayer. In Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421, 82 S.Ct. 1261, 8 L.Ed.2d 601 (1962), Abington v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203, 83 S.Ct. 1560, 10 L.Ed.2d 844 (1963), and Murray v. Curlett, 374 U.S. 203, 83 S.Ct. 1560, 10 L.Ed.2d 844 (1963), the Supreme Court established the basic considerations. As stated, the rule is that "[t]he First Amendment has erected a wall between church and state. That wall must be kept high and impregnable. We could not approve the slightest breach." Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1, 18, 67 S.Ct. 504, 513, 91 L.Ed. 711 (1947) (per Black, J.).

In Engel v. Vitale parents of public school students filed suit to compel the board of education to discontinue the use of an official prayer in the public schools. The prayer was asserted to be contrary to the beliefs, religions, or religious practices of the complaining parents and their children. In Engel the board of education, acting in its official capacity under state law, directed the principals to cause the following prayer to be said aloud by each class at the beginning of the day in each homeroom: "Almighty God, we acknowledge our dependence upon Thee, and we beg Thy blessings upon us, our parents, our teachers and our Country." 370 U.S. at 422, 82 S.Ct. at 1262. This prayer was adopted by the school board because it believed the prayer would help instill the proper moral and spiritual training needed by the students.

The parents argued that the school board violated the establishment clause of the first amendment when it directed that this prayer be recited in the public schools. The first amendment provides, in relevant part, that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof . . . ." U.S. Const. amend. I. The Supreme Court found "that by using its public school system to encourage recitation of the Regent's prayer, the State of New York ha[d] adopted a practice wholly inconsistent with the Establishment Clause." Id. at 422, 82 S.Ct. at 1262. The Court found this prayer to be a religious activity. The prayer constituted "a solemn avowal of divine faith and supplication for the blessing of the Almighty. The nature of such prayer has always been religious . . . ." Id. at 424-25, 82 S.Ct. at 1264-65. The Court noted that "[i]t [wa]s a matter of history that this very practice of establishing governmentally composed prayers for religious services was one of the reasons which caused many of our early colonists to leave England and seek religious freedom in America." Id. at 425, 82 S.Ct. at 1264. Therefore, according to the Court, the prayer "breache[d] the constitutional wall of separation between Church and State." Id.

Citing historial documents, the Court observed that [b]y the time of the adoption of the Constitution, our history shows that there was a widespread awareness among many Americans of the danger of a union of Church and State. These people knew, some of them from bitter personal experience, that one of the greatest dangers to the freedom of the individual to worship in his own way lay in the Government's placing its official stamp of approval upon one particular kind of prayer or one particular form of religious services . . . . The First Amendment was added to the Constitution to stand as a guarantee that neither the power nor the prestige of the Federal Government would be used to control, support, or influence the kinds of prayer the American people can say—that the people's religions must not be subjected to the pressures of government or change each time a new political administration is elected to office. Under the Amendment's prohibition against governmental establishment of religion, as reinforced by the prohibitions of the Fourteenth Amendment, government in this country, be it state or federal, is without power to prescribe by law any particular form of prayer which is to be used as an official prayer in carrying on any program of governmentally sponsored religious activity. Id. at 429-30, 82 S.Ct. at 1266 (emphasis added).

The assertion by the Court that the establishment clause of the first amendment applied to the states was unaccompanied by any citation to authority. This conclusion was reached supposedly upon its examination of historical documents.

In dissent, Mr. Justice Stewart argued that the majority in Engel misinterpreted the first amendment. As Mr. Justice Stewart saw it, an official religion was not established by letting those who wanted to say a prayer say it. To the contrary, Mr. Justice Stewart thought "that to deny the wish of those school children to join in reciting this prayer is to deny them the opportunity of sharing in the spiritual heritage of our Nation." Id. at 445, 82 S.Ct. at 1274-75. As Mr. Justice Stewart saw the problem, our country is steeped in a history of religious tradition. That religious tradition is reflected in countless practices common in our institutions and governmental officials. For instance, the United States Supreme Court has always opened each day's session with the prayer "God save the United States and this Honorable Court." Id. at 446, 82 S.Ct. at 1275. Each President of the United States has, upon assuming office, sworn an oath to God to properly execute his presidential duties. Our national anthem, "The Star-Spangled Banner," contains these verses:

Blest with the victory and peace, may the heav'n rescued land

Praise the Pow'r that hath made and preserved us a nation!

Then conquor we must, when our cause it is just,

And this be our motto "In God is our Trust." Id. at 449, 82 S.Ct. at 1277. The Pledge of Allegiance to the Flag contains the words "one Nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all." Id. (emphasis in original). Congress added this in 1954. Mr. Justice Stewart believed that the Regent's prayer in New York had done no more than "to recognize and to follow the deeply enriched and highly cherished spiritual traditions of our Nation—traditions which came down to us from those who almost two hundred years ago avowed their 'firm Reliance on the Protection of divine Providence' when they proclaimed the freedom and independence of this brave new world." Id. at 450, 82 S.Ct. at 1277.

Following the decision by the Supreme Court in Engel, the Court decided Abington v. Schempp and Murray v. Curlett. In Abington, a state law in Pennsylvania required that [a]t least ten verses from the Holy Bible shall be read, without comment, at the opening of each public school on each school day. Any child shall be excused from such Bible reading, or attending such Bible reading, upon the written request of his parent or guardian. 374 U.S. 205, 83 S.Ct. 1562. The Schempp family, husband and wife and two of their three children, brought suit to enjoin enforcement of this statute. The Schempps contended that their rights under the fourteenth amendment of the United States Constitution were being violated.

Each morning at the Abington Senior High School between 8:15 a.m. and 8:30 a.m., while students were attending their homerooms, selected students would read ten verses from the Holy Bible. These Bible readings were broadcast to each room in the school building. Following the Bible readings the Lord's Prayer was recited. As with the Bible readings, the Lord's Prayer was broadcast throughout the building. Following the Bible readings and the Lord's Prayer, a flag salute was performed. Participation in the opening exercises, as directed by the Pennsylvania statute, was voluntary.

No prefatory statement, no questions, no comments, and no explanations were made at or during the exercises. Students and parents were advised that any student could absent himself from the classroom or, should he elect to remain, not participate in the exercises.

In Murray v. Curlett, the Board of School Commissioners of Baltimore City adopted a rule which "provided for the holding of opening exercises in the schools of the city, consisting primarily of 'reading, without comment, of a chapter in the Holy Bible and/or the use of the Lord's Prayer.' " 374 U.S. at 211, 83 S.Ct. at 1565. An athiest, Mrs. Madalyn Murray, objected to the Bible reading and the recitation of the Lord's Prayer. After receiving the objection the board specifically provided that the Bible reading and the use of the Lord's Prayer should be conducted without comment and that any child could be excused from participating in the opening exercises or from attending them upon the written request of his parent or guardian.

Because of the similarity of the issues in both the Abington case and the Murray case the Supreme Court consolidated both cases on appeal and decided them together. The Court recognized that "[i]t is true that religion has been closely identified with our history and government. . . . 'The history of man is inseparable from the history of religion. And . . . since the beginning of that history many people have devoutly believed that "More things are wrought by prayer than this world dreams of." ' " Abington School District v. Schempp, 374 U.S. at 212-13, 83 S.Ct. at 1566 (quoting Zorach v. Clauson, 343 U.S. 306, 313 72 S.Ct. 679, 683, 96 L.Ed. 954 (1952)). Notwithstanding this recognition by the Court that the early history of this country, together with the history of man, was inseparable from religion the Court found the Bible reading and the recitation of the Lord's Prayer to be an unconstitutional abridgement of the first amendment prohibition that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof . . . ." U.S. Const. amend. I.

The Court noted that the first amendment prohibited more than governmental preference of one religion over another. Rather, the first amendment was intended " 'to create a complete and permanent separation of the spheres of religious activity in civil authority by comprehensively forbidding every form of public aid or support for religion.' " Id. 374 U.S. at 217, 83 S.Ct. at 1568 (quoting Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 31-2, 67 S.Ct. 519 (1947)). The Court reviewed several of its precedents which touched on the establishment of religion, and concluded that " '[t]here cannot be the slightest doubt that the First Amendment reflects the philosophy that Church and State should be separated. And so far as interference with the "free exercise" of religion and an "establishment" of religion are concerned the separation must be complete and unequivocal. The First Amendment within the scope of its coverage permits no exception; the prohibition is absolute.' " Id. 374 U.S. at 219-20, 83 S.Ct. at 1569-70 (quoting Zorach v. Clauson, 343 U.S. 306, 312, 72 S.Ct. 679, 683, 96 L.Ed. 954 (1952)). The Court in Abington reasoned from its own precedent rather than independently reviewing the historical foundation of the first and the fourteenth amendments. The Court held that the Bible reading and the recitation of the Lord's Prayer in both cases were religious exercises. The "rights," id. at 224, 83 S.Ct. at 1572. of the plaintiffs were being violated. The religious character of the Bible reading and the recitation of the Lord's Prayer were not mitigated by the fact that students were allowed to absent themselves from their homerooms upon request of their parents. "The breach of neutrality that is today a trickling stream may all too soon become a raging torrent . . . ." Id. at 225, 83 S.Ct. at 1573.

The principles enunciated In Engel v. Vitale, Abington v. Schempp, and Murray v. Curlett have been distilled to this: "To pass muster under the Establishment Clause, the governmental activity must, first, reflect a clearly secular governmental purpose; second, have a primary effect that neither advances nor inhibits religion; and third, avoid excessive government entanglement with religion. Committee for Public Education & Religious Liberty v. Nyquist, 413 U.S. 756, 773, 93 S. Ct. 2955, 2965, 37 L.Ed.2d 948 (1973)." Hall v. Board of School Commissioners. 656 F.2d 999, 1002 (5th Cir. 1981). "If a statute [or official administrative directive] violates any of these three principles, it must be struck down under the Establishment Clause." Stone v. Graham, 449 U.S. 39, 101, S.Ct. 192, 193, 66 L.Ed.2d 199 (1980) (holding that a Kentucky statute requiring posting of copy of Ten Commandments on walls of each public school classroom in state had pre-eminent purpose which was plainly religious in nature, and statute was thus violative of establishment clause and that avowed secular purpose was not sufficient to avoid conflict with first amendment; emphasis added).

Indeed, in this circuit, prayer in public schools is per se unconstitutional. "Prayer is an address of entreaty, supplication, praise, or thanksgiving directed to some sacred or divine spirit, being, or object. That it may contemplate some wholly secular objective cannot alter the inherently religious character of the exercise." Karen B. v. Treen, 653 F.2d 897, 901 (5th Cir. 1981).

In sum, under present rulings the use of officially-authorized prayers or Bible readings for motivational purposes constitutes a direct violation of the establishment clause. Through a series of decisions, the courts have held that the establishment clause was designed to avoid any official sponsorship or approval of religious beliefs. Even though a practice may not be coercive, active support of a particular belief raises the danger, under the rationale of the Court, that state-approved religious views may be eventually established.

Although a given prayer or practice may not favor any one sect, the principle of neutrality in religious matters is violated under these decisions by any program which places tacit government approval upon religious views or practices. While the purpose of the program might be neutral or secular, the effect of the program or practice is to give government aid in support of the advancement of religious beliefs. Thus the programs are held invalid without any consideration as to whether they excessively entangle the state in religious affairs.

In contrast, the Supreme Court has permitted the use of the Bible in a literature course where the literary aspects of the Bible are emphasized over its religious contents. Abington School District v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203, 225, 83 S.Ct. 1560, 1573, 10 L.Ed.2d 844 (1963). So long as the study does not amount to prayer or the advancement of religious beliefs, a teacher may discuss the literary aspects of the Bible in a secular course of study. Finally, the Supreme Court permits religious references in official ceremonies, including some school exercises, on the basis that these references are part of our secularized traditions and thus will not advance religion. Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421, 435 n. 21, 82 S.Ct. 1261, 1269 n. 21, 8 L.Ed.2d 601 (1962).

In the face of this precedent the defendants argue that school prayers as they are employed are constitutional. The historical argument which they advance takes two tacks. First, the defendants urge that the first amendment to the U.S. Constitution was intended only to prohibit the federal government from establishing a national religion. Read in its proper historical context, the defendants contend that the first amendment has no application to the states. The intent of the drafters and adoptors of the first amendment was to prevent the establishment of a national church or religion, and to prevent any single religious sect or denomination from obtaining a preferred position under the auspices of the federal government.

The corollary of this historic intent, according to the defendants, was to allow the states the freedom to address the establishment of religions as an individual prerogative of each state. Stated differently, the election by a state to establish a religion within its boundaries was intended by the framers of the Constitution to be a power reserved to the several states.

Second, the defendants argue that whatever prohibitions were initially placed upon the federal government by the first amendment that those prohibitions were not incorporated against the states when the fourteenth amendment became law on July 19, 1868. The defendants have introduced the Court to a mass of historical documentation which all point to the intent of the Thirty-ninth Congress to narrowly restrict the scope of the fourteenth amendment. In particular, these historical documents, according to the defendants, clearly demonstrate that the first amendment was never intended to be incorporated through the fourteenth amendment to apply against the states. The Court shall examine each historical argument in turn.

In the alternative, the defendant-intervenors argue that if the first amendment does bar the states from establishing a religion then the Mobile County schools have established or are permitting secular humanism, see infra note 41 (discussion of secular humanism), to be advanced in the curriculum and, being a religion, it must be purged also. Such a purge, maintain the defendant-intervenors, is high impossible because such teachings have become so entwined in every phase of the curriculum that it is like a pervasive cancer. If this must continue, say the defendant-intervenors, the only tenable alternative is for the public schools to allow the alternative religious views to be presented so that the students might better make more meaningful choices.

C. First Amendment as Forbidding Absolute Separation [5]

"'[T]he real object of the [F]irst amendment was not to countenance, much less to advance Mohammedanism, or Judaism, or infidelity, by prostrating Christianity, but to exclude all rivalry among Christian sects and to prevent any national ecclesiastical establishment which would give to an hierarchy the exclusive patronage of the national government.'" [6] The establishment clause was intended to apply only to the federal government. Indeed when the Constitution was being framed in Philadelphia in 1787 many thought a bill of rights was unnecessary. It was recognized by all that the federal government was the government of enumerated rights. Rights not specifically delegated to the federal government were assumed by all to be reserved to the states. Anti-Federalists, however, insisted upon a Bill of Rights as additional protection against federal encroachment upon the rights of the states and individual liberties. Excerpted testimony of James McClellan at 5-6 (trial testimony).

The federalists, who were the proponents of the Constitution, acceded to the demand of the Anti-Federalists for a Bill of Rights since, in the opinion of all, nothing in the Bill of Rights changed the terms of the original understanding of the federal convention. It was thought by all that the Bill of Rights simply made express what was already understood by the convention: namely, the federal government was a government of limited authority and that authority did not include matters of civil liberty such as freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and freedom of religion. Id. at 8-13.

The prohibition in the first amendment against the establishment of religion gave its states, by implication, full authority to determine church-state relations within their respective jurisdictions. "Thus the establishment clause actually had a dual purpose: to guarantee to each individual that Congress would not impose a national religion, and to each state that it was free to define the meaning of religious establishment under its own state constitution and laws. The federal government, in other words, simply had no authority over the states respecting the matter of church-state relations."[7]

At the beginning of the Revolution established churches existed in nine of the colonies. Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina. South Carolina, and Georgia all shared Anglicanism as the established reglion common to those colonies. See McCellan, Supra note 6, at 300. Congregationalism was the established religion in Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Connecticut. New York, on the other hand, allowed for the establishment of Protestant religions. [8] Three basic patterns of church-state relations dominated in the late eighteenth century. In most of New England there was the quasi-establishment of a specific Protestant sect. Only in Rhode Island and Virginia were all religious sects disestablished. "But all of the states still retained the Christan religion as the foundation stone of their social, civil and political institutions. Not even Rhode Island and Virginia renounced Christianity, and both states continued to respect and acknowledge the Christian religion in their system of law."[9] At the time the Constitution was adopted ten of the fourteen states refused to prefer one Protestant sect over another. Nonetheless, these states placed Protestants in a preferred status over Catholics, Jews, and Dissenters.[10]

The pattern of church-state relations in new states entering the Union after 1789 did not differ substantially from that in the original fourteen. By 1860—and the situation did not radically change for the next three quarters of a century—the quasi-establishment of a specific Protestant sect had everywhere been rejected; quasi-establishment of the Protestant religion was abandoned in most but not all of the states; and the quasi-establishment of the Christian religion still remained in some areas. A new pattern of church-state relations, the multiple or quasi-establishment of all religions in general, i.e., giving all religious sects a preferred status over disbelievers (the No Preference Doctrine) became widespread throughout most of the Union. Thus at the turn of the century, for example, no person who denied the existence of God could hold office in such states as Arkansas, Mississippi, Texas, North Carolina, or South Carolina.[11]

[5] The first amendment in large part was a guarantee to the states which insured that the states would be able to continue whatever church-state relationship existed in 1791. Excerpted testimony of James McClellan at 13 (from trial).

D. Washington, Madison, Adams, and Jefferson

The drafters of the first amendment understood the first amendment to prohibit the federal government only from establishing a national religion. Anything short of the outright establishment of a national religion was not seen as violative of the first amendment. For example, the federal government was free to promote various Christian religions and expend monies in an effort to see that those religions flourished. This was not seen as violating the establishment clause. R. Cord, Separation of Church and State 15 (1982).

The intent of the framers of the first amendment can be understood by examining the legislative proposals offered contemporaneously with the debate and adoption of the first amendment. For instance, one of the earliest acts of the first House of Representatives was to elect a chaplain. James Madison was a member of the congressional committee who recommended the chaplain system. On May 1, 1789 the House elected as chaplain, the Reverend William Linn. $500.00 was appropriated from the federal treasury to pay his salary. Even though the first amendment did not become part of the Constitution until 1791, has James Madison believed in the absolute separation of Church and State as some historians have attributed to him. James Madison would certainly have objected on this principle alone to the election of a chaplain.[12] At the Constitutional Convention on June 28, 1787 Dr. Benjamin Franklin suggested that a morning prayer might speed progress during the debates. Franklin told the Convention and its President, George Washington, that he had lived a long time. The longer he lived the more persuaded he was "that God Governs in the affairs of men."[13] Franklin "therefore beg[ged] leave to move—that henceforth prayers imploring the assistance of Heaven, and its blessings on our deliberations, be held in this Assembly every morning before we proceed to business, and that one or more of the clergy of this City be required to officiate in that Service—"[14] Franklin's motion was not adopted for political reasons. Alexander Hamilton and others thought that the motion might have been proper at the beginning of the convention but that if the motion were adopted during the convention the public might believe that the convention was near failure. For this reason, which was wholly political, the issue was resolved by adjournment without any vote being taken.[15]

Presidential proclamations, endorsed by Congressman James Madison when Washington was President, dealing with Thanksgiving, fasting, and prayer are all important in understanding Madison's views on the proper role between church and state.[16] Congress proposed a joint resolution on September 24, 1789, which was intended to allow the people of the United States an opportunity to thank Almighty God for the many blessings which he had poured down upon them. The resolution requested that President George Washington recommend to the citizens of the United States a day of public thanksgiving and prayer. Congress intended that the people should thank Almighty God for affording them an opportunity to establish this country.[17] This proclamation was submitted to the President the very day after Congress had voted to recommend to the states the final text of what was to become the first amendment to the United States Constitution.[18] As President, Madison issued four prayer proclamations. Excerpted testimony of James McClellan at 19.

Thomas Jefferson is often cited along with James Madison as a person who was absolutely committed to the separation of church and state. The historical record, however, does not bear out this conclusion.

While Jefferson undoubtedly believed that the church and the state should be separate, his actions in public life demonstrate that he did not espouse the absolute separation evidenced in the modern decisions by the United States Supreme Court. For example, on October 31, 1803, President Jefferson proposed to the United States Senate a treaty with the Kaskaskia Indians which provided that federal money was to be used to support a Catholic priest and to build a church for the ministry of the Kaskaskia Indians. The treaty was ratified on December 23, 1803. As Professor Cord points out in his book,[19] President Jefferson could have avoided the explicit appropriation of funds to support a Catholic priest and a Catholic church by simply leaving a lump sum in the Kaskaskia treaty which could have been used for that purpose. However, President Jefferson was not at all reluctant—for ought that appears on the historical record—to specifically appropriate money for a Catholic mission.

Unlike Presidents Washington, Madison, and Adams, when Jefferson was President he broke with the tradition of issuing executive religious proclamations. In Jefferson's view the establishment clause and the federal division of power between the national government and the states foreclosed executive religious proclamations. While refusing to issue executive religious proclamations, President Jefferson recognized that "no power to prescribe any religious exercise, or to assume authority in religious discipline, has been delegated to the General Government. It must then rest with the States, as far as it can be in any human authority." [20] Thus, of the first four Presidents, all of whom were close to the adoption of the Federal Constitution and the first amendment, only President Jefferson did not issue executive religious proclamations, and only President Jefferson thought that executive religious proclamations were not constitutional.

But even President Jefferson signed into law bills which provided federal funds for the propagation of the gospel among the Indians.[21] Based upon this historical record Professor Cord concludes that Jefferson, even as President, did not interpret the establishment clause to require complete independence from religion in government.

In sum, while both Madison and Jefferson led the fight in Virginia for the separation of church and state, both believed that the first amendment only forbade the establishment of a state religion by the national government. "Jefferson was neither at the Constitutional Convention nor in the House of Representatives that framed the First Amendment. The two Presidents who were at the Convention, Washington and Madison, and the President who framed the initial draft of the First Amendment in the House of Representatives, James Madison, issued Thanksgiving Proclamations." [22] The Court agrees with the studied conclusions of Dr. Cord that "it should be clear that the traditional interpretation of Madison and Jefferson is historically faulty if not virtually unfounded . . . ." [23]

One thing which becomes abundantly clear after reviewing the historical record is that the founding fathers of this country and the framers of what became the first amendment never intended the establishment clause to erect an absolute wall of separation between the federal government and religion. Through the chaplain system, the money appropriated for the education of Indians, and the Thanksgiving proclamations, the federal government participated in secular Christian activities. From the beginning of our country, the high and impregnable wall which Mr. Justice Black referred to in Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1, 18, 67 S.Ct. 504, 513, 91 L.Ed. 711 (1947), was not as high and impregnable as Justice Black's revisionary literary flourish would lead one to believe.

Yet, despite all of this historical evidence, only last month the Supreme Court wrote that the purpose of the first amendment is twofold: to foreclose state interference with the practice of religious faiths, and to foreclose the establishment of a state religion familiar in other Eighteenth Century systems. Religion and government, each insulated from the other, could then coexist. Jefferson's idea of a "wall," see Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. (8 Otto) 145, 164 [25 L.Ed 244] (1878), quoting Reply from Thomas Jefferson to an address by a committee of the Danbury Baptist Association (January 1, 1802), reprinted in 8 Works of Thomas Jefferson 113 (Washington ed. 1861), was a useful figurative illustration to emphasize the concept of separateness. Some limited and incidental entanglement between church and state authority is inevitable in a complex modern society, see, e.g., Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602, 614 [91 S.Ct. 2105, 2112, 29 L. Ed.2d 745] (1971); Waltz v. Tax Commission, 397 U.S. 664, 670 [90 S.Ct. 1409, 1412, 25 L.Ed.2d 697] (1970), but the concept of a "wall" of separation is a signpost.

Larkin v. Grendel's Den, Inc., —— U.S. ——, ——, 103 S.Ct. 505, 510, 74 L.Ed.2d 297 (1982) (emphasis added). Enough is enough. Figurative illustrations should not serve as a basis for deciding constitutional issues.

[6] For this Court, Professor Robert Cord, see supra note 5, irrefutably establishes that Thomas Jeffersons address to the Danbury Baptist Association cannot be relied upon to support the conclusion that Jefferson believed in a wall between church and state. "By this phrase Jefferson could only have meant that the 'wall of separation' was erected 'between Church and State' in regard to possible federal action such as a law establishing a national religion or prohibiting the free exercise of worship." Id. at 115. Overall the conduct of Thomas Jefferson was consistent with the conclusion that he believed, like all the other drafters of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights, that the states were free to establish religions as they saw fit.[24]

E. First Amendment as Applied to the States

[7, 8] As has been seen up to this point the establishment clause, ratified in 1791, was intended only to prohibit the federal government from establishing a national religion. The function of the establishment clause was two-fold. First, it guaranteed to each individual that Congress would not impose a national religion. Second, the establishment clause guaranteed to each state that the states were free to define the meaning of religious establishment under their own constitution and laws.

The historical record clearly establishes that when the fourteenth amendment was ratified in 1868 that its ratification did not incorporate the first amendment against the states. The debates in Congress at the time the fourteenth amendment was being drafted, the re-election speeches of the various members of Congress shortly after the passage by Congress of the fourteenth amendment, the contemporaneous newspaper stories reporting the effect and substance of the fourteenth amendment, and the legislative debates in the various state legislatures when they considered ratification of the fourteenth amendment indicate that the amendment was not intended to apply the establishment clause against the states because the fourteenth amendment was not intended to incorporate the federal Bill of Rights (the first eight amendments) against the states.

At the beginning the Court should acknowledge its indebtedness to Professor Charles Fairman, then a professor of law in Political Science at Stanford University, for the scholarly article which he published in 1949[25] Professor Fairman examined in detail the historical evidence which Mr. Justice Black relied upon in Adamson v. California, 332 U.S. 46, 47, 67 S.Ct. 1672, 1673, 91 L.Ed. 1903 (1947), where Mr. Justice Black concluded that the historical events that culminated in the adoption of the fourteenth amendment demonstrated persuasively that one of the chief objects of the fourteenth amendment was to make the Bill of Rights applicable to the states.[26]

1. Debates

The paramount consideration in defining the scope of any constitutional provision or legislative enactment is to ascertain the intent of te legislature. The intention of the legislature may be evidenced by statements of the leading proponents.[27] If statements of the leading proponents are found, those statements are to be regarded as good as if they were written into the enactment. "The intention of the lawmaker is the law." Hawaii v. Mankichi, 190 U.S. 197, 212, 23 S.Ct. 787, 788, 47 L.Ed. 1016 (1903).

Looking back, what evidence [i]s there . . . to sustain the view that Section 1 was intended to incorporate Amendments I to VIII? [C]ongressman Bingham . . . did a good deal of talking about "immortal bill of rights" and one spoke of "cruel and unusual punishments." Senator Howard, explaining the new privileges and immunities clause, said that it included the privileges and immunities of Article IV, Section 2—"whatever they may be"—and also "the personal rights guarantied [sic] and secured by the first eight amendments. . . ." That is all. The rest of the evidence bore in the opposite direction, or was indifferent. Yet one reads in Justice Black's footnote that, [Adamson v. California, 332 U.S. 46, 72 n. 5 [67 S.Ct. 1672, 1686 n. 5, 91 L.Ed. 1903] (1947)].

A comprehensive analysis of the historical origins of the Fourteenth Amendment, Flack, The Adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment (1908), 94, concludes that "Congress, the House and the Senate, had the following objects and motives in view for submitting the first section of the Fourteenth Amendment to the States for ratification:

1. To make the Bill of Rights (the first eight Amendments) binding upon, or applicable to, the States.

2. To give validity to the Civil Rights Bill.

3. To declare who were citizens of the United States.

We have been examining the same materials as did Flack, and have quoted far more extensively than he. How can he on that record reach the conclusion that Congress proposed by Section 1 to incorporate Amendments I to VIII?

Fairman, Does the Fourteenth Amendment Incorporate the Bill of Rights, 2 Stan.L. Rev. at 65-66 (1949). Porfessor Flack explained that the incorporation was based upon remarks of Congressman Bingham and Senator Howard at the time the Thirty-ninth Congress voted upon the fourteenth amendment. Only those two said anything which could be construed as suggesting the result reached by Justice Black and the modern Supreme Court decisions.

Throughout the debates in the House over the meaning of the fourteenth amendment Professor Fairman shows convincingly that Congressman Bingham had no clear concept of what exactly would be accomplished by the passage of the fourteenth amendment. The explanations offered by Congressman Bingham to his colleagues were inconsistent and contradictory.[28]

Together with Congressman Bingham's statements which suggested incorporation were remarks by Senator Howard. Senator Howard spoke with more preciseness than Congressman Bingham. Thus, his interpretation carries much greater weight than that of Congressman Bingham. Yet, because of the circumstances under which he spoke, his statements are subject to question when held out as representative of the majority viewpoint. By sheer chance Senator Howard acted as spokesman for the joint committee when explaining the purpose of the fourteenth amendment to the Senate. The joint committee had been chaired by Senator Fessenden. Chairman Fessenden became sick suddenly and Senator Howard thus became the spokesman for the Joint Committee. "Up to this point [Senator Howard's] participation in the debates on the Civil Rights Bill and the several aspects of the Amendment had been negligible. Poles removed from Chairman Fessenden, who 'abhorred' extreme radicals. Howard . . . was 'one of the most . . . reckless of the radicals,' who had 'served consistently in the vanguard of the extreme Negrophiles.'"[29] Professor Raoul Berger notes with some sarcasm that it is odd that a radical such as Senator Howard should be taken as speaking authoritatively for a committee in which the conservatives outnumbered the radicals and where there was a strong difference of opinion between the radicals and the conservatives. R. Berger, supra note 26, at 147.

On May 23, 1866, Senator Howard rose in the Senate, referred to the illness of Fessenden, and stated that he would "present 'the views and the motives which influenced the committee, so far as I understand [them].' After reading the privileges and immunities listed in Corfield v. Coryell, [6 Fed.Cas. 546, No. 3230 (C.C.E.D.Pa.1823),] he said, 'to these privileges and immunities . . . should be added the personal rights guaranteed and secured by the first eight amendments.' That is the sum and substance of Howard's contribution to the 'incorporation' issue."[30]

Raoul Berger notes in his analysis of the incorporation question that the remark of Senator Howard was tucked away in the middle of a long speech, that Howard was a last minute substitution for the majority chairman, that Howard was in the minority on the committee, and that after Howard was through speaking Senator Poland stated that the fourteenth amendment secured nothing beyond what was intended in the original privileges and immunities clause of Article IV Section 2. R. Berger, supra note 26, 148-49. Senator Doolittle followed Senator Poland with some additional remarks which were designed to reassure those whose votes had already been won in favor of passage of the fourteenth amendment that indeed the amendment was limited to known objectives, which objectives were not intended to encompass the federal Bill of Rights.

The scholarly analyses of Professors Fairman and Berger persuasively show that Mr. Justice Black misread the congressional debate surrounding the passage of the fourteenth amendment when he concluded that Congress intended to incorporate the federal Bill of Rights against the states. See infra p. 42-44 (discussion of Blaine Amendment). So far as Congress was concerned, after the passage of the fourteenth amendment the states were free to establish one Christian religion over another in the exercise of their prerogative to control the establishment of religions.

2. Popular Understanding

An examination of popular sentiment across the country reveals that the nation as a whole did not understand the adoption of the fourteenth amendent to incorporate the federal Bill of Rights against the states. Inferentially, that is to say that the people understood that each state was free to continue to support one Christian religion over another as the people of that state saw fit to do. The leading constitutional scholar upon whom Justice Black relied in Adamson v. California,

Mr. Flack[,] examined a considerable number of Northern newspapers and reported (an admission against the thesis he was defending) the following observation: "There does not seem to have been any statement at all as to whether the first eight Amendments were to be made applicable to the States or not . . . ." Presumably this excluded the press reports of May 24 on Senator Howard's speech of the 23d: for the New York Herald and the New York Times, which Mr. Flack had before him, did quote in full the passage where it said that the personal rights guaranteed by the first eight amendments were among the "privileges and immunities."

Other newspaper files have been examined in preparing the [article of Professor Fairman] and no instance has been found to vary what has been set out above. Fairman, supra note 25, at 68 (footnotes omitted).[31]

Charles Fairman quotes at length from the campaign speeches of five senators who, presumably, heard Senator Howard's speech of May 23, 1866. Not one of the senators mentioned anything about the Bill of Rights when commenting to the electorate about Section 1. Likewise, the five Republicans, including Congressman Bingham, never mentioned that the privileges and immunities clause would impose the federal Bill of Rights upon the states. Along with Professor Fairman, the Court takes the historical record to conclusively show that the general understanding of the nation at large, as illustrated by contemporaneous newspaper reports, demonstrates that the people of this country did not understand the fourteenth amendment to incorporate the establishment clause of the first amendment against the states.

3. Campaign Speeches

After the submission of the fourteenth amendment to the states on June 16, 1866 the members of the Thirty-Ninth Congress began to busy themselves with the prospect of re-election in the fall. The statements which the members of Congress made during their campaign speeches are certainly relevant in ascertaining the intent of the Thirty-ninth Congress with regard to the scope and effect of the fourteenth amendment. All of these speeches were contemporaneous expressions of the intent of Congress. Professor Fairman provides many instances of speeches made on the campaign hustings. See generally, Fairman, supra note 25, at 68-78. None of the members of Congress indicated in their campaign speeches that the fourteenth amendment was intended to incorporate the federal Bill of Rights against the states. The general consensus with regard to the effect of the fourteenth amendment was that it covered the same ground as the Civil Rights Act of 1866. Id. at 72 (remarks of Senator Lyman Trumbull, the sponsor of the Civil Rights Bill).

4. State-Legislative Debates

The fourteenth amendment was submitted to the states for their ratification on June 16, 1866. By June, 1867, twelve legislatures had ratified the amendment. By July 28, 1868 the fourteenth amendment had been promulgated.

Professor Fairman combed the relevant legislative materials to see exactly what each state legislature thought the effect of the fourteenth amendment would be. Along with Fairman, the Court finds it important to note not only what was said but what was not said. Had the fourteenth amendment been understood to incorporate the federal Bill of Rights against the states in many instances states would have been required to make radical changes. For instance it was frequent in many states for people to be prosecuted for felonies without an indictment from a grand jury. It was equally common for a jury of less than twelve people to sit in judgment in a felony prosecution. Some states failed to preserve the right to a jury trial and suits at common law where the amount in controversy exceeded $20.00.

The Court will not repeat Professor Fairman's analysis in each state. Only a few states need to be highlighted to convey the popular understanding of the effect of the fourteenth amendment upon the right of states to establish a religion. In New Hampshire, only five months after the promulgation of the fourteenth amendment—in December, 1886—the Supreme Court of New Hampshire had occassion to interpret a provision of the state constituton which provided that the legislature could "authorize towns, parishes, and religious societies 'to make adequate provison . . . for the support and maintenance of public Protestant teachers of piety, religion, and morality.'"[32] Moreover, Article VI of the Bill of Rights from the New Hampshire Constitution encouraged "the public worship of the diety. . . ." The question before the Supreme Court of New Hampshire was whether certain parishioners of the First Unitarian Society of Christians in Dover could fire the preacher. The preacher had begun using text from Emerson interchange-ably with text from the Bible. While Wardens of the church supported the preacher, certain pew owners were outraged. The pew owners sought an injunction restraining the preacher from occupying the meeting house. The trial court granted relief.

On appeal, in a 276-page report neither the opinion of the court nor the dissent made a single reference to the fourteenth amendment. Both opinions, however, had much to say about New Hampshire's policy in ecclesiastical matters. The opinion of the court referred to the first amendment and quoted Story's Commentaries:

[T]he whole power over the subject of religion is left exclusively to the State governments, to be acted upon according to their own sense of justice and the State constitutions . . .

Probably at the time of the adoption of the amendment now under consideration, the general if not the universal sentiment in America was, that Christianity ought to receive encouragement from the state, so far as not incompatible with the private rights of conscience and the freedom of religious worship: Fairman, supra note 25, 87 (citations omitted).

As Professor Fairman notes: "[I]n December 1868—five months after the promulgation of the Fourteenth Amendment—the New Hampshire court regarded the matter of an establishment of religion as being still 'left exclusively to the State governments.'" Id.

[9] The historical record shows without equivocation that none of the states envisioned the fourteenth amendment as applying the federal Bill of Rights against them through the fourteenth amendment. It is sufficient for purposes of this case for the Court to recognize, and the Court does so recognize, that the fourteenth amendment did not incorporate the establishment clause of the first amendment against the states.[33]

5. Supreme Court Decisions

Decisions by the United States Supreme Court rendered contemporaneously with the ratification of the fourteenth amendment indicate that the Court did not perceive the fourteenth amendment to incorporate the federal Bill of Rights against the states. In Twitchell v. Pennsylvania, 74 U.S. (7 Wall.) 321, 19 L.Ed. 223 (U.S. 1869), the Supreme Court held that the fifth and sixth amendments of the Constitution do not apply to the states. This holding was consistent with the earlier, well-known holding in Barron v. Baltimore, 32 U.S. (7 Peters) 243, 8 L.Ed. 672 (1833).

In Barron v. Baltimore the question presented to the court was whether the City of Baltimore was required to compensate Barron under the fifth amendment for the taking of his property for public purposes. When the City of Baltimore paved some streets, streams of water had been diverted in the vicinity of Barron's wharf. The water had deposited large amounts of sand around the wharf. The sand deposits made these waters too shallow for ocean-going ships to load and unload cargo at the wharf. Chief Justice John Marshal held that Barron's claim raised no appropriate federal question because the fifth amendment was a constitutional limitation applied only against the federal government.[34]

Another decision of the United States Supreme Court, decided in 1870, recognized that the federal Bill of Rights did not control the states.[35] After much deliberation over the question whether jury findings made in state court were reviewable in federal court, the Supreme Court noted that it was "admitted" that the limitations of the seventh amendment [36] did not apply to the states.

F. Blaine Amendment

The discussion up to this point has focused upon the incorporation of the federal Bill of Rights generally through the fourteenth amendment. Events which postdated the adoption of the fourteenth amendment show that the lawmakers of the Thirty-ninth Congress did not intend that the establishment clause would become binding upon the states with the ratification of the fourteenth amendment. [A] conclusive argument against the incorporation theory, at least as respects the religious provisions of the First Amendment, is the Blaine Amendment proposed in 1875. McClellan, Christianity and the Common Law, in Joseph Story and the American Constitution 118, 154 (1971) (quoting O'Brien, Justice Reed and the First Amendment, 116 (n.d.). At the behest of President Grant, James Blaine of Maine introduced a resolution in the Senate in 1885 which read: "No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." Id. at 154. (emphasis in original). Importantly, the Congress which considered the Blaine Amendment included twenty-three members of the Thirty-ninth Congress, the Congress which passed the fourteenth amendment.

Not one of the several Representatives and Senators who spoke on the proposal even suggested that its provisions were implicit in the amendment ratified just seven years earlier. Congressman Banks, a member of the Thirty-ninth Congress, observed: "If the Constitution is amended so as to secure the object embraced in the principle part of this proposed amendment, it prohibits the States from exercising a power they now exercise." Senator Frelinghuysen of New Jersey urged the passage of the "House article," which "prohibits the States for the first time, from the establishment of religion, from prohibiting its free exercise." Senator Stevenson, in opposing the proposed amendment, referred to Thomas Jefferson: "Friend as he [Jefferson] was of religious freedom, he would never have consented that the States . . . should be degraded and that the Government of the United States, a government of limited authority, a mere agent of the States with prescribed powers, should undertake to take possession of their schools and of their religion." Remarks of Randolph, Christiancy, Kernan, Whyte, Bogy, Easton, and Morton give confirmation to the belief that none of the legislators in 1875 thought the Fourteenth Amendment incorporated the religious provisions of the First. Id. (quoting O'Brien, Justice Reed and the First Amendment 116-17 (emphasis added)).

The Blaine Amendment, which failed in passage, is stark testimony to the fact that the adoptors of the fourteenth amendment never intended to incorporate the establishment clause of the first amendment against the states, a fact which Black ignored. This was understood by nearly all involved with the Thirty-ninth Congress to be the effect of the fourteenth amendment.

G. Proper Interpretative Perspective

[10,11] The interpretation of the Constitution can be approached from two vantages. First, the Court can attempt to ascertain the intent of the adoptors, and after ascertaining that attempt apply the Constitution as the adoptors intended it to be applied. Second, the Court can treat the Constitution as a living document, chameleon-like in its complexion, which changes to suit the needs of the times and the whims of the interpreters. In the opinion of this Court, the only proper approach is to interpret the Constitution as its drafters and adopters intended. The Constitution is, after all, the supreme law of the land. It contains provisions for amending it; if the country as a whole decided that the present test of the Constitution no longer satisfied contemporary needs then the only constitutional course is to amend the Constitution by following its formal, mandated procedures. Amendment through judicial fiat is both unconstitutional and illegal. Amendment through judicial fiat breeds disrespect for the law, and it undermines the very basic notion that this country is governed by laws and not by men. See generally Breast, The Misconceived Quest for the Original Understanding, 60 B.U.L. Rev. 204 (1980) (discussing various approaches to constitutional interpretation).

Let us have faith in the rightness of our charter and the patience to persevere in adhering to its principles. If we do so then all will have input into change and not just a few.

H. Stare Decisis

[12] What is a court to do when faced with a direct challenge to settled precedent? [37] In most types of cases "it is more important that the applicable rule of law be settled than that it be settled right." Burnet v. Coronado Oil & Gas Co., 285 U.S. 393, 406, 52 S.Ct. 443, 447, 76 L.Ed. 815 (1932) (Brandeis, J., dissenting). This general rule holds even where the court is persuaded that it has made a serious error of interpretation in cases involving a statute.[38] However, in cases involving the federal constitution, where correction through legislative action is practically impossible, a court should be willing to examine earlier precedent and to overrule it if the court is persuaded that the earlier precedent was wrongly decided. Id. at 407, 52 S.Ct. at 447. "A judge looking at a constitutional decision may have compulsions to reverse past history and accept what was once written. But he remembers above all else that it is the Constitution which he swore to support and defend, not the gloss which his predecessors may have put on it." Douglas, Stare Decisis, 49 Colum.L.Rev. 735, 736 (1949).

Certainty in the law is important. Yet, a rigid adherence to stare decisis "would leave the resolution of every issue in constitutional law permanently at the mercy of the first Court to face the issue, without regard to the possibility that the revelant case was poorly prepared or that the judgment of the Court was simply ill-considered. The danger is particularly great where the court has moved too far in an activist direction; in such a situation, legislative correction of the error is liable to be virtually impossible." Maltz, Commentary: Some Thoughts on the Death of Stare Decisis in Constitutional Law, 1980 Wis.L.Rev. 476, 492 (1980).

[T]he "wall of separation between Church and State" that Mr. Jefferson built at the University [of Virginia] which he founded did not exclude religious education from the school. The difference between the generality of his statements on the separation of Church and State and the specificity of his conclusions on education are considerable. A rule of law should not be drawn from a figure of speech. McCollum v. Board of Education, 333 U.S. 203, 247, 68 S.Ct. 461, 482, 92 L.Ed. 649 (1948) (per Reed, J., dissenting).

"[T]he ultimate touchstone of constitutionality is the Constitution itself and not what we have said about it." Graves v. O'Keefe, 306 U.S. 466, 491-92, 59 S.Ct. 595, 603-04, 83 L.Ed. 927 (1939) (Frankfurter, J., concurring). "By placing a premium on 'recent cases' rather than the language of the Constitution, the Court makes it dangerously simple for future Courts using the technique of interpretation to operate as a 'continuing Constitutional Convention.'" Coleman v. Alabama, 399 U.S. 1, 22-23, 90 S.Ct. 1999, 2010-11, 26 L.Ed.2d 387 (1970) (Burger, C.J.). "Too much discussion of constitutional law is centered on the Court's decisions, with not enough regard for the text and history of the Constitution itself." R. Berger, Government by Judiciary: The Transformation of the Fourteenth Amendment 296 (1977).[39]

This Court's review of the relevant legislative history surrounding the adoption of both the first amendment and of the fourteenth amendment, together with the plain language of those amendments, leaves no doubt that those amendments were not intended to forbid religious prayers in the schools which the states and their political subdivisions mandate.

I. Summary

"Th[e] mountain of evidence has become so high, one may have lost sight of the few stones and pebbles that made up the theory that the Fourteenth Amendment incorporated Amendments I to VIII." Fairman, supra note 25, at 134. Suffice it to say that the few stones and pebbles provide precious little historical support for the view that the states were prohibited by the establishment clause of the first amendment from establishing a religion.[40]

More than any other provision of the Constitution, the interpretation by the United States Supreme Court of the establishment clause has been steeped in history. This Court's independent review of the relevant historical documents and its reading of the scholarly analysis convinces it that the United States Supreme Court has erred in its reading of history. Perhaps this opinion will be no more than a voice crying in the wilderness and this attempt to right that which this Court is persuaded is a misreading of history will come to nothing more than blowing in the hurricane, but be that as it may, this Court is persuaded as was Hamilton that "[e]very breach of the fundamental laws, though dictated by necessity impairs the sacred reverence with ought to be maintained in the breast of the rulers towards the constitution." R. Berger, supra note 26, at 299 (quoting Federalist No. 25 at 158).

[13]. Because the establishment clause of the first amendment to the United States Constitution does not prohibit the state from establishing a religion, the prayers offered by the teachers in this case are not unconstitutional. Therefore, the Court holds that the complaint fails to state a claim for which relief could be granted.

J. Conclusion

There are pebbles on the beach of history from which scholars and judges might attempt to support the conclusions that they are wont to reach. That is what Professors Flack, Crosskey and the more modern scholars have done in attempting to establish a beachhead, as did Justice Black, that there is a basis for their conclusions that Congress and the people intended to alter the direction of the country by incorporating the first eight amendments to the Constitution. However, in arriving at this conclusion, they, and each of them, have had to revise established principles of constitutional interpretation by the judiciary. Whether the judiciary, inadvertently or eagerly, walked into this trap is not for discussion. The result is that the judiciary has, in fact, amended the Constitution to the consternation of the republic. As Washington pointed out in his Farewell Address, see p. i supra, this clearly is the avenue by which our government, can and ultimately, will be destroyed. We think we move in the right direction today, but in so doing we are denying to the people their rights to express themselves. It is not what we, the judiciary want, it is what the people want translated into law pursuant to the plan established in he Constitution as the framers intended. This is the bedrock and genius of our republic. The mantle of office gives us no power to fix the moral direction that this nation will take. When we undertake such course we trample upon the law. In such instances the people have a right to complain. The Court loses its respect and our institution is brought low. This misdirection should be cured now before it is too late. We must give no future generation an excuse to use this same tactic to further their ends which they think proper under the then political climate as for instance did Adolph Hitler when he used the court system to further his goals.

What is past is prologue. The framers of our Constitution, fresh with recent history's teachings, knew full well the propriety of their decision to leave to the peoples of the several states the determination of matters religious. The wisdom of this decision becomes increasingly apparent as the courts wind their way through the maze they have created for themselves by amending the Constitution by judicial fiat to make the first amendment applicable to the states. Consistency no longer exists. Where you cannot recite the Lord's Prayer, you may sing his praises in God Bless America. Where you cannot post the Ten Commandments on the wall for those to read if they do choose, you can require the Pledge of Allegience. Where you cannot acknowledge the authority of the Almighty in the Regent's prayer, you can acknowledge the existence of the Almighty in singing the verses of America and Battle Hymn of the Republic. It is no wonder that the people perceived that justice is myoptic, obtuse, and janus-like.

If the appellate courts disagree with this Court in its examination of history and conclusion of constitutional interpretation thereof, then this Court will look again at the record in this case and reach conclusions which it is not now forced to reach.[41]

III. Order

It is therefore ordered that the complaint in this case be dismissed with prejudice. Costs are taxed against the plaintiffs. Fed. R. Civ.P. 54(d).

CIV. A. NO. 82-0792-H.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT, S.D. ALABAMA, S.D.

Jan. 14, 1983.

Action was brought to challenge the Alabama "Prayer Law" as being in violation of Federal and State Constitutions. The District Court, Hand, Chief Judge, held that in view of fact that federal claims of unconstitutionality were dismissed short of trial, court in exercise of discretion would dismiss pendent claims under State Constitution.

All claims for relief dismissed, and injunction previously entered dissolved.

FEDERAL COURTS ⚖ 18

In view of fact that federal claims of unconstitutionality of state "Prayer Law" were dismissed short of trial, court in exercise of discretion would dismiss pendent claims under State Constitution. Ala.Code 1975, §§ 16-1-20, 16-1-20.1, 16-1-22.1; U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 1.

Ronnie L. Williams, Mobile, Ala., for plaintiffs.

Anne Neamon, pro se and for petitioners as Friend of Court Citizens for God and Country.

Fob James, III, pro se.

Charles S. Coody, Counsel Director, Div. of Legal Services, Dept. of Education, Montgomery, Ala., for defendants, Tyson, Creel, Cherry, Higginbotham, Poole, Martin, Allen and Roberts.

Bob Sherling, Mobile, Ala., for intervenors.

Maury D. Smith, David R. Boyd, Montgomery, Ala., for Gov. James.

Order

HAND, Chief Judge.

The complaint in this case challenges Senate Bill 8, Alabama Act 82-735, popularly known as "the Prayer Law", Senate Bill 61 (1982), Ala.Code § 16-1-20 (silent meditation), and Ala.Code § 16-1-22.1.

I. The Allegations

The complaint in this case alleges that Senate Bill 61 (1982), Senate Bill 8 (1982) and Ala.Code § 16-1-20.1 violate the rights of the plaintiffs to be free from the state endorsement and establishment of any religion.

Senate Bill 61 (1982) provides:

To prescribe a period of time in the public schools, not to exceed fifteen minutes, for the study of the formal procedures followed by the United States Congress which study shall include the reading verbatum of one of the opening prayers given by either the House or the Senate Chaplain at the beginning of the meeting of the United States House or Senate.

Be it enacted by the Legislature of Alabama:

Section I. At the commencement of the first class of each day in all grades in all public schools the teacher in charge of the room in which said class is held shall, for a period of time not exceeding fifteen minutes, instruct the class in the formal procedure followed by the United States Congress. The study shall include, but not be limited to, the reading verbatim of one of the opening prayers given by either the House or the Senate Chaplain at the beginning of the meeting of the House or Senate. Any student may select an opening House or Senate prayer from the Congressional Record for use by the class.

Senate Bill 8 (1982) provides as follows:

To provide for a prayer that may be given in the public schools and educational institutions of this state.

Be it enacted by the Legislature of Alabama:

Section I. From henceforth, any teacher or professor in any public educational institution within the State of Alabama, recognizing that the Lord God is one, at the beginning of any homeroom or any class, may lead the willing students in the following prayer to God:

Almighty God, You alone are our God. We acknowledge You as the Creator and Supreme Judge of the world. May Your justice, Your truth, and Your peace abound this day in the hearts of our countrymen, in the counsels of our government, in the sanctity of our homes and in the classrooms of our schools. In the name of our Lord. Amen.

Ala.Code Section 16-1-20.1 provides: At the commencement of the first class of each day in all grades in all public schools, the teacher in charge of the room in which each such class is held may announce that a period of silence not to exceed one minute in duration shall be observed for meditation or voluntary prayer, and during any such period no other activity shall be engaged in.

II. Claims for Relief

The state laws are challenged under two separate theories. First, the laws are attacked as being violative of the first amendment to the United States Constitution. The first amendment provides in part that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof . . . ." U.S. Const. Amend. I.

The second basis for attacking the laws rests upon a pendent, state-law claim. The amended complaint alleges that the laws in question violate the guarantee of religious freedom found in the Alabama State Constitution. The relevant section provides:

That no religion shall be established by law; that no preference shall be given by law to any religious sect, society, denomination, or mode of worship; that no one shall be compelled by law to attend any place of worship; nor to pay any tithes, taxes, or other rate for building or repairing any place of worship, or for maintaining any minister or ministry; that no religious test shall be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under this state; and that the civil rights, privileges, and capacities of any citizen shall not be in any manner affected by his religious principles. Ala. Const. art. I, § 3.

Today in the companion case, Jaffree v. Board of School Commissioners of Mobile County, 554 F.Supp. 1104, the Court holds that the establishment clause of the first amendment to the United States Constitution does not bar the states from establishing a religion. In light of the reasoning in that opinion the Court holds that the claims in this case fail to state any claim for which relief could be granted under the federal Constitution.

However, in this case, in addition to the claims for relief under the federal Constitution the plaintiffs have alleged claims under the Alabama State Constitution. Ordinarily, these claims would be within the pendent jurisdiction of the court. Pendent jurisdiction is discretionary. The usual rule is that a federal court should decide any state-law claims which arise from a common nucleus of operative facts and which could ordinarily be expected to be brought in the same action. One well-recognized exception to the exercise of pendent jurisdiction lies where the federal claim is dismissed short of trial. Here this case is being dismissed short of trial, and the Court holds that the better exercise of discretion which is consistent with the limited subject-matter jurisdiction of a federal court mandates that the claims in this case be dismissed.

III. Order

It is hereby ordered that the claims for relief under the federal Constitution be dismissed for failure to state a claim. It is further ordered that the pendent, state-law claims be dismissed.

The injunction which this Court previously entered is dissolved.

Costs are taxed against the plaintiffs.

FOOTNOTES

[1] 42 U.S.C. § 1983 provides:

Every person who, under color of any statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage, of any State or Territory, subjects, or causes to be subjected, any citizen of the United States or other person within the jurisdiction thereof to the deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution and laws, shall be liable to the party injured in an action at law, suit in equity, or other proper proceeding for redress.

[2] Initially, it should be noted that neither 28 U.S.C. §§ 2201 nor 2202 afford any subject-matter jurisdiction to a federal court as the complaint alleges. These sections provide only a remedy.

The operation of the Declaratory Judgment Act is procedural only. By passage of the Act, Congress enlarged the range of remedies available in the federal courts but it did not extent their subject-matter jurisdiction. Thus there must be an independent basis of jurisdiction, under statutes equally applicable to actions for coercive relief, before a federal court may entertain a declaratory judgment action. 10 C. Wright and A. Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 2766. 841 (1973) (footnotes omitted)

Likewise, 28 U.S.C. § 1343(4) does not afford subject matter jurisdiction to a federal court over claims brought under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. Section 1343(4) affords subject matter jurisdiction to the federal court only over those claims which are brought under "any Act of Congress providing for the protection of civil rights . . ." "Standing alone. § 1983 clearly provides no protection for civil rights since . . . §1983 does not provide any substantive rights at all." Chapman v. Houston Welfare Rights Organization, 441 U.S. 600, 618, 99 S.Ct. 1905, 1916, 60 L.Ed.2d 508 (1979).

[3] In fact, the complaint alleges that "(t)his cause of action arises under the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution . . ." See Complaint at 2. This Court has previously explained that no implied cause of action exists under either the first or fourteenth amendments, at least when the first amendment is applied to persons acting under color of state law. The very purpose for enacting 42 U.S.C. § 1983 was to provide a remedy to vindicate the rights afforded by the federal Bill of Rights when persons acting under color of state law violated those rights. It would be incongruous to imply a remedy where Congress has expressly afforded a remedy. See Strong v. Demopolis City Board of Education, 515 F.Supp. 730, 732 n. 1 (S.D.Ala.1981)(per Hand, J.).

[4] "[T]he existence of a claim for relief under § 1983 is 'jurisdictional' for purposes for invoking 28 U.S.C. § 1343, even though the existence of a meritorious constitutional claim is not similarily required in order to invoke jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1331. See Bell v. Hood, 327 U.S. 678, 682 [66 S.Ct. 773, 776, 90 L.Ed. 939] (1946); Mt. Healthy [City School District v. Doyle], 429 U.S. 274, 278-79 [97 S.Ct. 568, 571-72 (1977).]" Monell v. Department of School Services, 436 U.S. 658, 716, 98 S.Ct. 2018, 2048, 56 L.Ed.2d 611 (1978).

[5] At the start the Court should acknowledge its indebtedness to several constitutional scholars. If this opinion will accomplish its intent, which is to take us back to our original historical roots, then much of the credit for the vision lies with Professor James McClellan and Professor Robert L. Cord. Their work and the historical sources cited in their work have proven invaluable to the Court in this opinion. See R. Cord, Separation of Church and State: Historical Fact and Current Fiction (1982); P. McGuigan & R. Rader, A Blueprint for Judicial Reform (eds. n.d.); J. McClellan, Joseph Story and the American Constitution, 118-159 (1971) (Christianity and the Common Law).

[7] Id.

[8] Id. at 300. Professor McClellan documents in great detail the political struggle which raged through the various colonies during the Revolution and afterwards to disestablish certain religions throughout the colonies. The establishment of one religion over another in the respective colonies was purely a political matter. The political strength of the various followers determined which religion was established. Like any other political decision, when the political strength of the minorities reached that of the majority, the state disestablished what had formerly been the majority religion. See e.g., id. at 301-308.

[10] Id.

[11] Id. at 311. Professor McClellan cites numerous examples in which the states required adherence to a Christian religion. For instance, witnesses were considered competent to testify only if they affirmed a belief in the existence of a Christian God. Id.

[16] The views of James Madison are often cited by those who insist upon absolute separation between church and state. Madison was one of the drafters of the first amendment. An uncritical cursory examination of some of Madison's writings would lead one to the conclusion that Madison favored absolute separation between church and state. However, to reach this conclusion is to misunderstand the views of Mr. Madison.

As Professor Cord explains in his book, Madison was concerned only that the federal government should not establish a national religion. Nondiscriminatory aid to religion and support for various Christian religions was not viewed by Madison as unlawful. See R. Cord, supra note 5, at 25-26 (examining drafts of the establishment clause submitted by Madison).

[18] Professor Cord discusses in detail a document which Madison wrote late in his life known as the Detached Memoranda. Some historians have taken the Detached Memoranda as a blanket condemnation of religious proclamations issued by Presidents Jefferson, Madison, and Jackson. From this, some historians argue that James Madison believed that absolute separation was mandated by the establishment clause. The Supreme Court has relied upon the Detached Memoranda to justify its position of absolute separation in Abington School District v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203, 225 (1963) ("[I]n the words of Madison, 'it is proper to take alarm at the first experiment on our liberties.' ").

Professor Cord suggests that the Detached Memoranda reflected nothing more than a shift in Madison's views as he grew older. The Detached Memoranda was written long after Madison had left office and long after the first amendment had been drafted. R. Cord, supra note 5, 29-36.

The explanation of Professor Cord that Madison is an old man, no longer in office, who regretted some of his past actions, is, to the Court, reasonable. Not all historcial facts can easily be squared. Professor Cord emphasizes his point by analogizing to something which former President Nixon might write upon reflecting on his tenure as president. It would be odd, hypothesizes Professor Cord, if Mr. Nixon were to publish a book in his later years which concluded that taping conversations, without all parties being aware of the recording, is morally wrong and clearly a flagrant violation of the constitutional right to privacy. It would be nonsense, in the view of Professor Cord, for a Nixon biographer to conclude that Richard Nixon believed that the surreptitious tapings of conversations in the Oval Office were immoral and unconstitutional. R. Cord, supra note 5, at 36. Similarly, it is faulty to judge what Madison believed to be the scope of the establishment clause at the time he drafted the clause by looking to views expressed late in his life when there are numberous expressions of his intent contemporaneous with the period in which the establishment clause was drafted.

[21] Professor Cord chronicles the federal support provided to the Moravian Brethren at Bethlehem in Pennsylvania. The function of the Brethren was to civilize the Indians and to promote Christianity. First passed on July 27, 1787, the resolution supporting the Brethren was supported by every President, including Thomas Jefferson. The legislation supporting the Brethren was sectarian in character. Professor Cord reads this history to conclude that had this sort of interaction between church and state been thought to be unconstitutional then certainly the early Congresses and Presidents would not have authorized expenditure of federal money. R. Cord, supra note 5, at 39-46.

[24] Since the states were historically free to establish a religion it follows that some irritation by non-believers or those in the religious minority was a necessary consequence of establishment. The complaint alleges that "[a]ll of the minor Plaintiffs are exposed to ostracism from their peer group class members if they do not participate in these daily devotional activities." Complaint at 5. The children "all have suffered and continue to suffer severe emotional distress from being forced to participate, via peer group pressure, in devotional observances orchestrated by the defendants." Id. at 7. This physchological pressure naturally flows anytime a state takes an official position on an issue. It does not make an establishment unconstitutional. For example, laissez-faire industrialists feel coerced when a state adopts tough environmental laws. Unemployed workers feel pressure from peer groups when the unemployed worker takes advantage of a state labor law which allows him to cross a union picket line to break a strike. Someone, somewhere, feels coerced or pressured anytime the state takes a position. The Constitution, however, does not protect people from feeling uncomfortable. A member of a religious minority will have to develop a thicker skin if a state establishment offends him. Tender years are no exception.

[25] Fairman, Does the Fourteenth Amendment Incorporate the Bill of Rights? 2 Stan L. Rev. 5 (1949).

[26] Mr. Justice Black spent nearly twenty years mulling over the criticisms leveled by Professor Charles Fairman. Finally, he had this to say:

> What I wrote [in Adamson v. California, 332 U.S. 46, 47 [67 S.Ct. 1672, 1673, 91 L.Ed. 1903] (1947),] in 1947 was the product of years of study and research. My appraisal of the legislative history [which surrounded the adoption of the fourteenth amendment and upon which Mr. Fairman relied so heavily] followed 10 years of legislative experience as a Senator of the United States, not a bad way, I suspect, to learn the value of what is said in legislative debates, committee discussions, committee reports, and various other steps taken in the course of passage of bills, resolutions, and proposed constitutional amendments.

My brother Harlan's objections to my Adamson dissent history, like that of most of the objectors, relies most heavily on a criticism written by Professor Charles Fairman and published in the Stanford Law Review. 2 Stan.L.Rev. 5 (1949). I have read and studied this article extensively, including the historical references, and am compelled to add that in my view it has completely failed to refute the inferences and arguments that I suggested in my Adamson dissent. Professor Fairman's "history" relied very heavily on what was "not" said in the state legislatures that passed on the Fourteenth Amendment. Instead of relying on this kind of negative pregnant, my legislative experience has convinced me that it is far wiser to rely on what "was" said, and most importantly, said by the men who actually sponsored the Amendment in the Congress. I know from my years in the United States Senate that it is to men like Congressman Bingham, who steered the amendment through the House, and Senator Howard, who introduced it in the Senate, that members of Congress look when they seek the real meaning of what is being offered. And they vote for or against a bill based on what the sponsors of that bill and those who oppose it tell them it means. The historical appendix to my "Adamson" dissent leaves no doubt in my mind that both its sponsors and those who opposed it believed the Fourteenth Amendment made the first eight amendments of the Constitution (the Bill of Rights) applicable to the states. Duncan v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 145, 165-66, 88 S.Ct. 1444, 1455-56, 20 L.Ed.2d 491 (1968) (Black J., dissenting).

Charles Fairman "conclusively disapproved Black's contention, at least, such as the weight of the opinion among disinterested observers." A. Bickel, The Least Dangerous Branch 102 (1962). Along with Alexander Bickel, Professor Raoul Berger agrees that Charles Fairman's analysis was right on the mark. R. Berger, Government by Judiciary: The Transformation of the Fourteenth Amendment, 137 n. 11 (1977).

[27] For example, Professor Raoul Berger cites several cases which recite this common principle of construction. See e.g., Wright v. Vinton Branch, 300 U.S. 440, 463, 57 S.Ct. 556, 562, 81 L.Ed. 736 (1937); Wisconsin Railroad Commission v. C.B. & Q. RR. Co., 257 U.S. 563, 589, 42 S.Ct. 232, 238, 66 L.Ed. 371 (1922). See R. Berger, supra note 26, at 136-37 & 137 n. 13.

[28] Professor Fairman has quoted exhaustively from the Congressional Globe. The various speeches of Congressman Bingham made in support of the fourteenth amendment are quoted in detail. See Fairman. Does the Fourteenth Amendment Incorporate the Bill of Rights? 2 Stan.L.Rev. 5, 24-25 (1949).

The analysis of Professor Fairman is attacked vigorously by William Crosskey, then a professor of law at the University of Chicago Law School. Crosskey, Charles Fairman, "Legislative History," and the Constitutional Limitations on State Authority 22 U.Chi.L.Rev. 1 (1954). Crosskey quotes at length from the Bingham article and from the Congressional Globe in an effort to discredit the explanation offered the historical facts by Professor Bingham.

The debate between the two scholars was pitched. Much of Crosskey's analysis consisted of little more than ad homineum attacks on Professor Fairman. The attacks were answered in a reply article written by Professor Fairman. Fairman, A Reply to Professor Crosskey, 222 U.Chi.L.Rev. 144 (1954). After reading the original articles of both Fairman and Crosskey, the rebuttal of Fairman, and many other articles on the question, the Court is persuaded that the weight of the disinterested scholars supports the analysis of Professor Fairman. The work of Professor Crosskey impresses the Court as being designed to reach a result. Namely, Crosskey was interested in providing a constitutional basis to support the desegregation decision of the United States Supreme Court in Brown v. Board of Education 347 U.S. 483, 74 S.Ct. 686, 98 L.Ed. 873 (1954). For instance in an effort to explain a serious ambiguity in a Bingham speech, Professor Crosskey explains that the speech would make perfect sense if one assumes that Bingham had been reading directly from a text of the Constitution, that he had a copy of the document in his hand and that he was waiving the copy while he spoke in Congress. "You're fudging, Professor Crosskey! You don't know that Bingham had been reading from the Constitution." Fairman, A Reply to Professor Crosskey, 22 U.Chi.L.Rev.144, 152 (1949).

One scholar, Michael Kent Curtis, argues that Professor Raoul Berger had improperly analyzed the incorporation question by blindly following the lead of Charles Fairman and ignoring the work of William Crosskey. Curtis, The Bill of Rights as a Limitation on State Authority: A Reply to Professor Berger, 16 Wake Forest L.Rev. 45 (1980). No lesser a light than Henry M. Hart, Jr., then a professor of law at Harvard Law School, remarked that "(t)he Don Quixote of Chicago breaks far too many lances in his on-slaughts upon the windmills of constitutional history to permit detailed review of each adventure." Hart Book Review, 67 Harv. L. Rev. 1456 (1954). While the comment was, strictly speaking, directed to a recently released book by Professor Crosskey, the thrust of the comment holds true for the scholarship of Professor Crosskey. Professor Henry Hart had little use for the typical analytical method employed by Professor Crosskey: slanderous, ad homineum attacks on those historical actors who supported views contrary to those which Professor Crosskey expected to find in a historical record. Professor Hart compared Professor Crosskey to Senator Joseph McCarthy from Wisconsin, id. at 1475 ("In the true hit-and-run style popularized by the Senator from the adjacent state to the north, [Wisconsin being north of Illinois] Professor Crosskey, having made th[e] ugly charge [That James Madison deliberately, not inadvertently, falsified some of his notes in 1836 to suit his own purposes at that time], promises to consider in a later volume whether it is true,") Professor Hart is of the general opinion that the scholarship of Professor Crosskey amounted to little more than a "confident tone, nice printing, and an abundance of notes and appendices referring to obsscure documents and esoteric word meanings." Id. at 1486.

[31] Crosskey, Charles Fairman, "'Legislative History'" and the Constitutional Limitations on State Authority, 22 U.Chi.L.Rev. 1 (1954). In particular, Professor Crosskey is critical of the newspaper examination conducted by Professor Fairman. By Crosskey's count, Fairman and Flack together examined ten newspapers. Id. at 100-101. Crosskey points out that there were nearly 5,000 newspapers in circulation in 1870. Thus, if Flack and Fairman examined only ten of these newspapers then, concludes Crosskey, the two ignored a substantial source of evidence in their inquiry. Certainly, at the least, accordingly to Crosskey, neither Flack nor Fairman are entitled to make any conclusions about what the newspapers of the day reflected as the popular understanding of the effect of the fourteenth amendment.

The Court has studied the Crosskey criticism of Professor Fairman and rejects it. The work of the two scholars serves as the cornerstone for both camps in the debate vel non whether the fourteenth amendment was intended to incorporate the federal Bill of Rights. Compare R. Berger, supra note 26, 134-156 (rejecting incorporation of the federal Bill of Rights) with Curtis, The Bill of Rights as a Limitation on State Authority: A Reply to Professor Berger, 16 Wake Forest L.Rev. 45 (1980) (following Crosskey).

[33] It is always difficult to wade through the mass of historical research which has been done on both sides of the issue. For instance, while the defendant-intervenors introduced Professor Robert L. Cord's book, Separation of Church and Stat: Historical Fact and Current Fiction in support of the historical record upon which they are relying. Professor Cord concludes, in part, that a) the fourteenth amendment did incorporate the establishment clause against the states, id. at 101, and b) the Lord's Prayer, being distinctly Christian in character, or any other prayer which is readily identified with one religion rather than another is impermissible under the establishment clause, id. at 162-65.

The Court rejects the conclusion of Professor Cord that the fourteenth amendment incorporated the establishment clause against the states. Professor Cord uncritically adopted the analysis of the United States Supreme Court in reaching his conclusion. In only a footnote does Professor Cord refer to the scholarship of Professor Charles Fairman; then only does Professor Cord note that there has been some "controversy" surrounding the incorporation issue.

Assuming arguendo that the establishment clause had been incorporated against the states then Professor Cord would be correct in his conclusion that any activity which is religiously identifiable would be barred. See infra note 41 for the Court's discussion regarding secular humanism.

[34] In Barron v. City of Baltimore, the Court noted:

> But it is universally understood, it is a part of the history of the day, that the great revolution which established the Constitution of the United States was not effected without immense opposition. Serious fears were extensively entertained that those powers which the patriot statemen who then watched over the interests of our country, deemed essential to union, and to the attainment of those invaluable objects for which union was sought, might be exercised in a manner dangerous to liberty. In almost every convention by which the Constitution was adopted amendments to guard against the abuse of power were recommended. These amendments demanded security against the apprehended encroachments of the general government—not against those of the local governments.

In compliance with a sentiment thus generally expressed, the quiet fears were thus extensively entertained amendments were proposed by the required majority in congress, and adopted by the States. These amendments contained no expression indicating an intention to apply them to the state governments. The court cannot so apply them. Barron v. City of Baltimore, 32 U.S. (7 Pet.) 243, 250, 8 L.Ed. 672 (1883) (emphasis added).

[35] Justices of the Supreme Court of New York v. United States, 65 U.S.: (9 Wall.) 274, 19 L.Ed. 658 (1870).

[36] In part the seventh amendment provides that "no fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise reexamined in any Court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law." U.S. Const. amend. VII.

[37] Abraham Lincoln once said, " 'Stand with anybody that stands right. Stand with him while he is right and part with him when he does wrong.' " Jaffa, In Defense of Political Philosophy, 34 National Review 36 (1982) (emphasis in original).

[38] While stare decisis has more force in cases which determine the meaning of statutes as opposed to interpreting the Constitution, the Supreme Court has frequently reversed itself where it thinks an earlier decision involving the construction of a statute is in error. In Monell v. Department of Social Services, 436 U.S. 658, 98 S.Ct. 2018, 56 L.Ed.2d 611 (1978), the Supreme Court identified four factors which it considers when faced with the question whether to overrule a prior decision which involves a statute. The factors are: 1) whether the decisions in question misconstrued the meaning of the statute as revealed in its legislative history; 2) whether overruling the decisions would be inconsistent with more recent expressions of congressional intent; 3) whether the decisions in question constituted a departure from prior decisions; and 4) whether overruling these decisions would frustrate legislative reliance on their holdings. Id. at 695-701, 98 S.Ct. at 2038-2041.

[39] Mr. Justice Stevens recently addressed the problem whether a court should follow authority which it believes to have been incorrectly decided. In a case which involved the construction of a statute, parents of Negro school children sued under the Civil Rights Act of 1866 (now 42 U.S.C. § 1982) for alleged discriminatory admission to private schools, which discrimination was based solely upon race. Runyon v. McCrary, 427 U.S. 160, 96 S.Ct. 2586, 49 L.Ed.2d 415 (1976). The statute upon which the suit was based, 42 U.S.C. § 1981, was passed prior to the adoption of the fourteenth amendment. It provides in part that "[a]ll persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall have the same right in every State . . . to make and enforce contracts . . . as enjoued by white citizens. . . ." In Runyon two children were denied admission to private schools in Virginia solely because they were Negro. The Supreme Court held that seciton 1981 prohibits private, commercially-operated, nonsectarian schools from denying admission to prospective students solely because of race. Mr. Justice Stevens concurred in the opinion of the Court, but his thoughts on stare decisis are noteworthy.

Mr. Justice Stevens felt compelled to join the opinion of the Court based upon a prior decision of the Court, Jones v. Alfred H. Mayer Co., 392 U.S. 409, 88 S.Ct. 2186, 20 L.Ed.2d 1189 (1968). However, the language of the Civil Rights Act of 1866 and its historical setting left "no doubt in [Mr. Justice Stevens'] mind that the construction of [42 U.S.C. § 1982] would have amazed the legislators who voted fo it." Runyon v. McCrary, 427 U.S. at 189, 96 S.Ct. at 2603. Given a clean slate Mr. Justice Stevens would have allowed private, commercially-operated, nonsectarian schools the right to deny admission to prospective students solely because of race. He would have reached this result not because he thought that it was socially preferable to the result reached by the Supreme Court, but simply because the intent of Congress and the legislative history surrounding the adoption of 42 U.S.C. § 1981 mandated such a result.

Where Mr. Justice Stevens was unwilling to dissent from his brethren in a case involving statutory construction, this Court feels a stronger tug from the Constitution which it has sworn to support and to defend.

[40] Professor Fairman has summarized concisely in several pages all of the stones and pebbles which could conceivably be relied upon to support the conclusion that the fourteenth amendment intended to incorporate the federal Bill of Rights against the states. See Fairman, supra note 25, 134-35.

[41] One of the first of these considerations is whether the teachers and those students who desire to express the simple prayers have any rights to freedom of speech. Compare what the Court observed in the order which granted the preliminary injunction in the companion case, 82-0792-H, against the state on the first amendment right of students to pray at school. 544 F.Supp. 727 at 732-33. The evidence in the case demonstrates that the school board took no active part in any decision made by the teachers to utilize the simple prayer that they have. The school board nor any of the official body of the school administration encouraged or discouraged these teachers from exercising their own will in the matter. Nor does the evidence indicate that those students who opted for this type of exercise were coerced into participating or not participating.

In dealing with matters religious the exercise of first amendment rights are highly circumscribed. The same does not appear to be true in dealing with first amendment rights in expressing one's opinions in all other matters whether they be expressions of moral concern or immoral concern.

The second major area that this Court must concern itself with should this judgment be reversed is that raised by the evidence produced by the intervenors dealing with other religious teachings now conducted in the public schools to which no attention has apparently been directed and to which objection has been lodged by the intervenors.

There are many religious efforts abounding in this country. Those who came to these shores to establish this present nation were principally governed by the Christian ethic. Other religions followed as the population grew and the ethnic backgrounds were diffused. By and large, however, the Christian ethic is the predominant ethic in this nation today unless it has been supplanted by secular humanism. Delos McKown, witness for the plaintiff, expressed himself as believing that secular humanism has been more predominant through the years than we have imagined and indeed was more akin to the beliefs of George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, Benjamin Franklin, and others of that era. Delos McKown also testified that secular humanism is not a religion, though he ultimately waffled on this point. The reason that this can be important to the decision of this Court is that case law deals generally with removing the teachings of the Christian ethic from the scholastic effort but totally ignores the teaching of the secular humanist ethic. It was pointed out in the testimony that the curriculum in the public schools of Mobile County is rife with efforts at teaching or encouraging secular humanism—all without opposition from any other ethic—to such an extent that it becomes a brainwashing effort. If this Court is compelled to purge "God is great, God is good, we thank Him for our daily food" from the classroom, then this Court must also purge from the classroom those things that serve to teach that salvation is through one's self rather than through a diety. Indeed, the Supreme Court in Abington School District v. Schempp; 374 U.S. 203, 225, 83 S.Ct. 1560, 1573, 10 L.Ed.2d 844 (1963) (quoting Zorach v. Clauson, 343 U.S. 306, 314, 72 S.Ct. 679, 684, 96 L.Ed. 954) (1952), noted that "the State may not establish a 'religion of secularism' in the sense of affirmatively opposing or showing hostility to a religion, thus preferring those who believe in no religion over those who do believe."

That secular humanism is a religion within the definition of that term which the "high wall" must exclude is supported by the finding in Torcaso v. Watkins, 367 U.S. 488, 495 n. 11, 81 S.Ct. 1680, 1684 n. 11, 6 L.Ed.2d 982 (1961), which recognized that secular humanism is a religion in the traditional sense of the word and also in the statement of the 276 intellectuals who advocate the doctrine of secular religion as delineated in the Humanist Manifesto I and II. (Defendant-intervenors exhibit #10).

Textbooks which were admitted into evidence demonstrated many examples in the way this theory of religion is advanced. The intervenors maintain that their children are being so taught and that this Court must preclude the Mobile County School Board from continuing to advance such a religion or in the alternative to allow instruction in the schools that would give a child an opportunity to compare the ethics of each religion so as to make their own credibility or value choices. To this extent, this Court is impressed that the advocacy of the intervenors on the point of necessity makes them parties plaintiff and to this extent they should be realigned as such inasmuch as both object to the teaching of certain religions.

This Court is confronted with these two additional problems that must be resolved if the appellate courts adhere to their present course of interpreting history as did Mr. Justice Black. Should this happen then this Court will hunker down to the task require by the appellate decisions. A blind adherence to Justice Black's absolutism will result in an engulfing flood of other cases addressed to the same point raised by intervenors. The Court will be called upon to determine whether each book or any statement therein advances secular humanism in a religious sense, a never-ending task. Already the involvement of this Court with determining state activities in such things as prison cases, occupies one-third of its docket. This Court can anticipate no less of a burgeoning docket brought about by this incursion into what is legitimately a state concern.

The founding fathers were far wiser than we. They were content to allow the peoples of the various states to handle these matters as they saw fit and were patient in permitting the processes of change to develop orderly by established procedure. They were not impatient to bring about a change because we think today that it is the proper course or to set about to justify by misinterpretation the original intent of the framers of the Constitution. We must remember that "He, who reigns within Himself, and rules passions, desires, and fears, is more a king" Milton, Paradise Regained. If we, who today rule, do not follow the teachings of history then surely the very weight of what we are about will bring down the house upon our head, and the public having rightly lost respect in the integrity of the institution, will ultimately bring about its change or even its demise.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, it never fails that when I offer this prayer legislation the debate quickly turns from the substance of the school prayer issue to a discussion of the power of Congress to limit the Supreme Court's jurisdiction. Obviously, Senators are free to discuss any aspect of this issue that strikes their fancy. But, Mr. President, the power of Congress to enact my legislation is, in fact, clear and unassailable.

I direct my colleagues' attention to the article III, section 2, of the Constitution which provides in part:

The Supreme Court shall have appellate Jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make.

Although this provision prompts much discussion these days about "court stripping" and "threats to the independence of the judiciary," the framers of the Constitution had far different concepts in mind. In Federalist No. 80, Alexander Hamilton wrote about the judicial powers conferred in the Constitution. He said:

If some partial inconveniences should appear to be connected with the incorporation of any of them (judicial powers) into the plan, it ought to be recollected that the national legislature will have ample authority to make such exceptions and to prescribe such regulations as will be calculated to obviate or remove these inconveniences.

John Marshall, in the Virginia ratifying convention, said:

Congress is empowered to make exceptions to the appellate jurisdiction, as to law and fact, of the Supreme Court. These exceptions certainly go as far as the legislature may think proper for the interest and liberty of the people. 3 Debates on the Federal Constitution 560 (J. Elliott 2d ed. 1888).

In talking about congressional checks on the judiciary, Hamilton and Marshall point directly to article III, section 2. Their commentary, along with other legislative history, affirms what a reading of the provision plainly indicates. That is, Congress has clear authority to restrict Supreme Court appellate jurisdiction.

An article in the William and Mary Law Review by Ralph A. Rossum eliminates any possible doubt on this point. Mr. Rossum goes to great lengths to refute every argument advanced against the power of Congress to limit Supreme Court appellate jurisdiction. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Rossum article, entitled "Congress, the Constitution, and the Appellate Jurisdiction of the Supreme Court: The Letter and the Spirit of the Exceptions Clause," 24 William and May Law Review 385 (1983), be printed, including footnotes, at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From 24 William & Mary Law Review 385 (1983)]

CONGRESS, THE CONSTITUTION, AND THE APPELLATE JURISDICTION OF THE SUPREME COURT: THE LETTER AND THE SPIRIT OF THE EXCEPTIONS CLAUSE

(By Ralph A. Rossum)*

I. INTRODUCTON

Writing in a 1979 issue of The Public Interest, Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan puzzled over the question, "What do you do when the Supreme Court is wrong?"[1] Short of impeachment, the only responses he could identify were "debate, litigate, legislate."[2] He never so much as acknowledged the existence, much less the possible employment, of Congress' power to curtail the appellate jurisdiction of the Court.[3] Events, however, have passed Senator Moynihan by. Over a score of bills were introduced in the Ninety-Seventh Congress to deprive the Supreme Court of appellate jurisdiction either to hear cases involving such issues as abortion rights and voluntary prayer in the public schools or to order school busing to achieve racial balance. Many of these same proposals were reintroduced in the Ninety-Eighth Congress.[4] These measures have in turn prompted considerable scholarly attention and controversy. Symposia in Judicature,[5] the Villanova Law Review,[6] and the Harvard Journal of Law and Public Policy,[7] seminars sponsored by the American Enterprise Institute[8] and the Free Congress Research and Education Foundation,[9] hearings before the Subcommittee on the Constitution of the Senate Judiciary Committee,[10] and the foreward to the Harvard Law Review's analysis of the 1980 Term of the United States Supreme Court[11] all have been devoted to the questions of whether and to what extent Congress can or should strip the Court of appellate subject matter jurisdiction.

On the surface, these measures would appear to be wholly within the constitutional authority of Congress.[12] After all, article III, section 2 of the United States Constitution provides that in all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be Party, the Supreme Court shall have original Jurisdiction. In all the other Cases before mentioned the Supreme Court shall have appellate Jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make.[13]

For many students of constitutional law, the simple reading of these words ends the matter.[14] The language is clear and, for them, conclusive. As Justice Noah Swayne observed in the United States v. Hartwell[15] over a century ago: "If the language be clear it is conclusive. There can be no construction where there is nothing to construe."[16]

This understanding of Congress' power to curtail the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is reinforced by Ex Parte McCardle,[17] the only Supreme Court decision that has directly addressed this issue. In this post-Civil War case, the Court unanimously upheld a law that stripped the Court of authority to hear appeals from persons imprisoned during the Civil War who sought release from custody under an 1867 habeas corpus statute. Republican leaders in Congress feared that the Supreme Court, which had already indicated hostility toward the Reconstruction program, would use McCardle to hold much of that program unconstitutional. Consequently, Congress repealed the 1867 act on which McCardle's appeal was founded. This was an obvious attempt by Congress to use the exceptions clause to deprive the Court of its appellate power to review the substantive constitutionality of congressional acts. Moreover, the repealing act was not passed until after the case already had been argued before the Supreme Court. Nonetheless, the Court at once dismissed the case for want of jurisdiction. As Chief Justice Chase explained:

We are not at liberty to inquire into the motives of the Legislature. We can only examine into its power under the Constitution; and the power to make exceptions to the appellate jurisdiction of this court is given by express words.

What, then, is the effect of the repealing Act upon the case before us? We cannot doubt as to this. Without jurisdiction the court cannot proceed at all in any cause. Jurisdiction is the power to declare the law, and when it ceases to exist, the only function remaining to the court is that of announcing the fact and dismissing the cause.[18]

For many scholars, then, the constitutional text, supplemented by the Court's reflections on it in McCardle, answers any questions concerning the constitutionality of measures restricting the jurisdiction of the Court. As they see it, the only real question raised by congressional initiatives diminishing the Court's appellate jurisdiction is "the wisdom of doing so."[19]

Not everyone, however, is willing to concede that these measures raise only policy questions.[20] Opinion on the constitutionality of congressional curtailment of the Court's appellate jurisdiction is divided, for there are those who argue that such a power could destroy the Court's power of judicial review and, ultimately, undermine our constitutional system of separation of powers.[21] They fear that if Congress had the power to deprive the Supreme Court of its appellate jurisdiction, Congress could constitutionally "deny litigants Supreme Court review in cases involving bills of attainder, ex post facto laws, freedom of speech, press and religion, unreasonable search and seizure, equal protection of the laws, right to counsel, and compulsory self-incrimination."[22] This parade of imaginary horrors convinces some commentators that Congress can no longer claim with good conscience the authority to curtail the Court's appellate jurisdiction,[23] and should Congress nevertheless proceed to exercise this authority, the Supreme Court ought not to tolerate it,[24] but rather ought to invalidate the offending measure.[25]

Those who argue against Congress' power to make exceptions to the Court's appellate jurisdiction find themselves in a most uncomfortable bind. They are forced to deny an explicit power of Congress, expressly granted by the Constitution, in order to protect the Court's implicit power of judicial review, a power which has no textual basis.[26] To extricate themselves from this bind, they commonly advance an argument that has much in common with the argument advanced by the Court in United Steelworkers of America v. Weber.[27] In that case, Justice Brennan observed that "a thing may be within the letter of the statute and yet not within the statute, because not within its spirit . . . ."[28] Similarly, those who would limit Congress' power to curtail the Court's appellate jurisdiction argue that congressional power to make exceptions may be within the letter of article III and yet not constitutional, because not compatible with the spirit of judicial review.[29] Justice Rehnquist, dissenting in Weber, remarked that Justice Brennan's line of argument was worthy "not of jurists such as Hale, Holmes, and Hughes, but of escape artists such as Houdini . . . ."[30] The same criticism is appropriate with regard to the interpretation of the exceptions clause, and perhaps even more so. At least in Weber, if the Court were mistaken in preferring the statute's spirit over its letter, the mistake could be easily rectified, because "Congress may set a different [statutory] course if it so chooses."[31] A mistaken interpretation of the exceptions clause would be difficult to rectify, however, because a different course can be set only by constitutional amendment.

The debate over Congress' power to make exceptions has been curious. One side cites the letter of article III and concludes that Congress' power over the Court's appellate jurisdiction is absolute: "The power to make exceptions to Supreme Court appellate jurisdiction is a plenary power. It is given in express terms and without limitation, regardless of the more modest uses that might have been anticipated . . . . In short, the clause is complete exactly as it stands."[32] The opposition in this debate invokes the spirit of judicial review and insists that "the long accepted power of ultimate resolution of constitutional questions by the Supreme Court" must not be disturbed.[33] Given the nature of this debate, neither side can win, because each is talking past the other.[34] There is, however, a clear loser—the Constitution, which is presented as a fatally flawed document that neither says what it means nor means what it says. This Article asserts that the Constitution is not flawed in this respect and that the spirit of judicial review is altogether consistent with the letter of Congress' powers under article III. This Article will examine the arguments on behalf of Congress' power to make exceptions to the Court's appellate jurisdiction and systematically challenge the spirited objections of those who seek to protect the Court's power to interpret the Constitution by ignoring the Constitution.

II. THE ARGUMENT FOR PLENARY CONGRESSIONAL POWER

Those who argue that Congress has plenary power over the Court's appellate jurisdiction present a straightforward case based on three kinds of evidence: the text of the Constitution; the intention of the framers; and the firm, consistent, and unwavering understanding of the Supreme Court. Although further consideration of the clear and conclusive words of article III is unnecessary, an examination of what the framers meant when they used those words and how the Supreme Court has interpreted them is in order.

A. The intent of the framers

No evidence in the records either of the Federal Convention of 1787 or of the various state ratifying conventions would indicate that Alexander Hamilton's words in The Federalist, No. 80 were not representative of the understanding of virtually the entire founding generation. In that essay, Hamilton reviewed in detail the powers of the federal judiciary and observed that "[i]f some partial inconveniences should appear to be connected with the incorporation of any of them into the plan, it ought to be recollected that the national legislature will have ample authority to make such exceptions and to prescribe such regulations as will be calculated to obviate or remove these inconveniences." [35]

The Federal Convention spent very little time debating the jurisdiction of the federal judiciary.[36] On July 24, nearly two months after the Convention began, the delegates agreed to submit the various resolutions they had approved to the Committee of Detail, so that it might "report a Constitution comfortable to the Resolutions passed by the Convention." [37] Their submission concerning the federal judiciary was most rudimentary: "[T]he jurisdiction of the national Judiciary shall extend to Cases arising under the Laws passed by the general Legislature, and to such other Questions as involve the national Peace and Harmony." [38] Nevertheless, the Committee of Detail transformed this vague resolution into language that is almost identical to article III, section 2. After defining the Supreme Court's original jurisdiction, the committee provided that "in all the other cases before mentioned, it [jurisdiction] shall be appellate, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Legislature shall make." [39]

Although the Report of the Committee of Detail was presented to the Convention on August 6, 1787, the judicial article was not taken up for consideration until August 27. On that date, Dr. Samuel Johnson of Connecticut suggested that the power of the judiciary ought to extend to equity as well as law—and moved to insert the words "both in law and equity" after the words U.S.[40] This proposal was adopted. After an intervening discussion, "Mr. Governeur Morris [of Pennsylvania] wished to know what was meant by the words 'In all the cases beforementioned it (jurisdiction) shall be appellate with such exceptions &c,' whether it extended to matters of fact as well as law—and to cases of Common law as well as Civil law." [41] James Wilson, the principal architect of the draft reported by the Committee of Detail, answered that the committee meant "facts as well as law & Common as well as Civil law." [42] No comments were forthcoming from other members of the Committee, presumably indicating their agreement with Wilson's answer. To remove all doubt, however, Mr. Dickinson of Delaware moved to add the words "both as to law & fact" after the word "appellate," which was agreed to by unanimous consent.[43]

Acceptance of this addition concluded the discussion.[44] No questions were raised concerning Congress' plenary power to make exceptions. The conclusion is inescapable: both the words chosen by the delegates and the discussion surrounding their choice of these words suggest an unlimited congressional power over the Court's appellate jurisdiction. John Marshall accurately summarized the delegates' intentions when he declared in the Virginia Ratifying Convention that "Congress is empowered to make exceptions to the appellate jurisdiction, as to law and fact, of the Supreme Court. These exceptions certainly go as far as the legislature may think proper for the interest and liberty of the people." [45]

B. The Court's consistent support for plenary congressional power

Although "the ultimate touchstone of constitutionality is the Constitution itself and not what [the judges] have said about it," [46] it is nevertheless significant to observe that the Supreme Court's holdings concerning the exceptions clause are altogether consistent with both the express words of article III, section 2, and the manifest intention of the framers.[47] The Court, of course, has addressed directly an actual congressional contraction of its appellate jurisdiction only once.[48] Nevertheless, it has on numerous occasions taken the opportunity to reflect more generally on the nature and extent of Congress' article III powers. A brief consideration of these reflections reveals the Court's firm and unwavering understanding from the opening days of the republic to the present.

In the first of the relevant cases, Wiscart v. Dauchy,[49] Chief Justice Oliver Ellsworth acknowledged that "even the [Court's] appellate jurisdiction is . . . qualified; inasmuch as it is given 'with such exceptions, and under such regulations, as Congress shall make.' " [50] He then drew what he considered to be the necessary conclusion from the Court's qualified jurisdiction: "If Congress has provided no rule to regulate our proceedings, we cannot exercise an appellate jurisdiction; and if the rule is provided, we cannot depart from it." [51] Ellsworth's opinion is especially weighty, as he had been a delegate to the Federal Convention and had served on the Committee of Detail that drafted the exceptions clause.

Ellsworth's conception of the Court's jurisdiction continued in an unwavering line through five consecutive chief justices.[52] Thus, Chief Justice John Marshall in United States v. More [53] argued that an affirmative grant of certain appellate power by Congress is an implied denial of all appellate power not mentioned: "[A]s the jurisdiction of the court has been described, it has been regulated by Congress, and an affirmative description of its power must be understood as a regulation, under the constitution, prohibiting the exercise of other powers than those described." [54] Marshall elaborated upon this argument in Durousseau v. United States: [55]

The appellate powers of this court are not given by the judicial act. They are given by the constitution. But they are limited and regulated by the judicial act, and by such other acts as have been passed on the subject. When the first legislature of the Union proceeded to carry the third article of the constitution into effect, they must be understood as intending to execute the power they possessed of making exceptions to the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court. [56]

Marshall's successor, Chief Justice Taney, likewise acknowledged the utter dependency of the Court's appellate jurisdiction upon acts of Congress: "By the Constitution of the United States, the Supreme Court possesses no appellate power in any case, unless conferred upon it by act of Congress; nor can it, when conferred, be exercised in any other form, or by any other mode of proceeding, than that which the law prescribes." [57]

Chief Justice Chase's statements in McCardle concerning the letter of article III, section 2 have already been considered.[58] Chase not only recognized Congress' power over the Court's appellate jurisdiction, but also made an important contribution to our understanding of the role of the Court: "[J]udicial duty is not less fitly performed by declining ungranted jurisdiction than in exercising firmly that which the Constitution and the laws confer." [59]

Finally, in The "Francis Wright," [60] Chief Justice Waite affirmed and extended what his predecessors had argued:

What [the appellate powers of the Supreme Court] shall be, and to what extent they shall be exercised, are, and always have been proper subjects of legislative control. Authority to limit the jurisdiction necessarily carries with it authority to limit the use of the jurisdiction. Not only may whole classes be kept out of the jurisdiction altogether, but particular classes of questions may be subjected to re-examination and review, while others are not.[61]

In the same opinion, Waite also referred to "the rule, which has always been acted on since, that while the appellate power of this court under the Constitution extends to all cases within the judicial power of the United States, actual jurisdiction under the power is confined within such limits as Congress sees fit to prescribe." [62]

Not all judicial support for the opinion that the letter of article III, section 2 is clear and conclusive comes from eighteenth and nineteenth century jurists. For example, while dissenting on other issues in Yakus v. United States,[63] Justice Wiley Rutledge unequivocally affirmed that "Congress has plenary power to confer or withhold appellate jurisdiction." [64] Similarly, in National Mutual Insurance Co. v. Tidewater Transfer Co.,[65] Justice Frankfurter noted that:

Congress need not establish inferior courts; Congress need not grant the full scope of jurisdiction which it is empowered to vest in them; Congress need not give this Court any appellate power; it may withdraw appellate jurisdiction once conferred and it may do so even while a case is sub judice. Ex parte McCardle . . . .[66]

For many, then, the words of the Constitution, the intention of the founding generation, and the unwavering opinion of the Supreme Court all clearly, consistently, and unequivocally reveal a constitutional plan for the courts:

[That plan is] quite simply that the Congress could decide from time to time how far the federal judicial institution should be used within the limits of the federal judicial power; or, stated differently, how far judicial jurisdiction should be left to the state courts, bound as they are by the Constitution as "the supreme law of the Land . . . any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding." [67]

III. ARGUMENTS AGAINST ABSOLUTE CONGRESSIONAL POWER OVER THE COURT'S APPELLATE JURISDICTION

Those who place the spirit of judicial review over the letter of article III and who insist that Congress' power under the exceptions clause is either limited or nonexistent make a variety of arguments that can be reduced to seven general headings.[68] One contention is that those who rely on the letter of article III have misconstrued the language of that article. A second contention insists that Ex Parte McCardle[69] is a very narrow holding with little or no application beyond its facts. A third argument asserts that the power Congress originally possessed under article III, section 2 has been effectively repealed by the passage of time. A fourth argument contends that Congress cannot make exceptions that would destroy the essential role of the Supreme Court. A fifth and related contention maintains that Congress' power to curtail the Court's jurisdiction is qualified by the constitutional principles of separation of powers and federalism. A sixth claim argues that Congress is limited in its ability to make exceptions by other constitutional provisions, such as those found in the Bill of Rights and the fourteenth amendment. Finally, a seventh argument contends that congressional contraction of the Court's appellate jurisdiction cannot be unconstitutioally motivated, that is to say Congress cannot have as its goal or objective the displacement of a disfavored judicial precedent.

What animates those who make these arguments is their conviction that the spirit of judicial review is jeopardized by the letter of article III. Because of those who contend that Congress has plenary power over the Court's appellate jurisdiction generally have been content to rely simply on the letter of the Constitution and have felt no particular obligation to rebut these arguments, these general claims have gone largely unchallenged.[70] Little effort has been made to show that the traditional concept of judicial review[71] is wholly consonant with the letter of article III. In the following analysis of these arguments, such an effort will be made.

A. The argument from textual construction

The first of the argument against Congress' plenary powers under the exceptions clause is that those who rely on the letter of article III have misconstrued the meaning of its words. Variations of this argument exist, with Leonard Ratner focusing on how the word "exceptions" was commonly used at the time of the Federal Convention,[72] and with such scholars as Irving Brant,[73] Henry Merry,[74] and Raoul Berger[75] concerning themselves with the meaning of the phrase "both as to Law and Fact."

From a survey of dictionaries existing at the time of the Federal Convention, Ratner finds that an exception was generally defined "as an exclusion from the application of a general rule or description."[76] This definition indicates that "an exception cannot destroy the essential characteristics of the subject to which it applies."[77] On this basis, Ratner argues that Congress' power to make exceptions to the Court's appellate jurisdiction is not plenary; any exceptions it makes must be narrower in application than the description of the Court's entire appellate jurisdiction.[78] This ostensible limitation on Congress' power, however, is essentially meaningless. If an exception implies some residuum of jurisdiction, Congress can meet this test by excluding everything but, for example, patent cases. As one of the interlocutors in Henry Hart's famous dialogue remarks: "This is so absurd, and it is so impossible to lay down any measure of a necessary reservation, that it seems to me the language of the Constitution must be taken as vesting plenary control in Congress."[79]

A more ingenious, if ultimately no more successful variation of this argument against Congress' plenary power under article III, section 2 focuses on the meaning of the phrase, "both as to Law and Fact." Those who make this argument refuse to concede that the framers of the Constitution intended to vest Congress with the power to effect the wholesale destruction of judicial review. Rather, they insist, the "sole purpose of the exceptions clause was to permit Congress to limit appellate jurisdiction over question of fact in cases at law."[80] Irving Brant, a noted historian, provides the most recent and sophisticated version of this argument. He contends that as a result of an unfortunate placement of commas in the phrase, "Jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact," the words "both as to Law and Fact" appear to be a parenthetical, and the modifying clause beginning "with such Exceptions" seems to attach to "Jurisdiction," when in fact, what the entire exceptions clause was meant to modify is simply appellate jurisdiction of questions of fact.[81]

At the time of the Federal Convention, considerable diversity in legal practice existed among the states, both with respect to cases in common and civil law and particularly with respect to cases in equity and maritime jurisdiction. Re-examination of factual issues was permitted in some states, but was not permitted in others. Under its appellate jurisdiction, the Supreme Court inevitably would be called upon to review cases where questions of fact were central and at issue. This prospect, however, raised the spectre of the Supreme Court having the power to overturn a jury's findings of fact in a criminal case. According to Brant, the problem faced by the Convention was to draft a provision that would permit the Court to review questions of fact in civil, equity, and maritime cases, but that would prevent it from abusing this power by retrying facts found by juries in criminal cases. Given the tremendous diversity among the states, drafting a constitutional clause to resolve this problem was all but impossible. Therefore, Brant argues, the framers took the easy way out and drafted language (albeit, Brant concedes, poorly punctuated language) that left the whole issue for handling by the Congress through the medium of the exceptions clause. The exceptions clause thus was "fashioned to meet the principal criticism of the appellate jurisdiction, its inclusion of matters of 'fact.'"[82]

Despite Brant's ingenuity, and that of Merry and Berger as well, this interpretation of the exceptions clause ultimately fails. This interpretation cannot be reconciled with the actual words and punctuation of the Constitution. Had the framers intended what Brant alleges they intended, they obviously were possessed of the necessary skills to have conveyed clearly that intention.[83] Similarly, Brant's interpretation cannot be squared with the proceedings of the Convention. What the Committee of Detail presented to the Convention in no way suggested that Congress' power to make exceptions to the Court's appellate jurisdiction was limited to the treatment of factual issues. Quite the contrary, the only discussion in the Convention relating to the exceptions clause centered on whether the Court was to have power to review questions of fact, not whether Congress' power to curtail the Court's jurisdiction was limited to such questions.[84]

Nor can Brant's interpretation survive exposure to the post-Convention statements of Edmund Randolph and Alexander Hamilton. When the exceptions clause was before the Virgina State Ratifying Convention, Randolph, who had participated in the Federal Convention, declared that "[i]t would be proper to refer here to any thing that could be understood in the federal court. [Congress] may except generally both as to law and fact, or they may except as to law only, or fact only."[85] Alexander Hamilton also stressed that Congress' power to make exceptions applied to law as well as to facts: "The supreme court will possess an appellate jurisdiction, boh as to law and fact, in all the cases referred to them, but subject to any exceptions and regulations which may be thought advisable."[86] Hamilton remarked that the propriety of Congress' power to except matters of law from the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction "has scarcely been called into question."[87] "[C]lamors have been loud," he noted, only with respect to granting the Court any appellate jurisdiction over matters of fact.[88] In an effort to quiet the fear of those alarmed by the prospect of any appellate retrial of facts found by a jury, Hamilton declared, again clearly contrary to Brant's contention, that "the Supreme Court shall possess appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, and that this jurisdiction shall be subject to such exceptions and regulation as the national legislature may prescribe."[89] All of this merely reaffirms Hamilton's assurance that if any "inconveniences" should arise from the powers the Constitution grants to the federal judiciary, Congress will have authority to make such exceptions and to prescribe such regulations as it believes necessary "to obviate or remove these inconveniences."[90]

Finally, Brant's interpretation is fundamentally at odds with an unwavering line of judicial opinion beginning with Chief Justice Ellsworth, himself a delegate to the Federal Convention and a member of the Committee of Detail, and extending to the present.[91]

B. Reliance on ex parte McCardle

A second major argument against Congress' claim to plenary power under article III, section 2 centers on the meaning of Ex Parte McCardle.[92] Rather than supporting Congress' claim as is commonly maintained, several scholars contend that McCardle concedes nothing to Congress.[93] They note that in McCardle, the Court carefully pointed out that the repealing act of 1868[94] did not affect judicial authority to issue writs of habeas corpus under section 14 of the Judiciary Act of 1789:

> Counsel seem to have supposed, if effect be given to the repealing act in question, that the whole appellate power of the court, in cases of habeas corpus is denied. But this is an error. The [repealing] act of 1868 does not except from that jurisdiction any cases but appeals from the Circuit Courts under the act of 1867. It does not affect the jurisdiction which was previously exercised.[95]

These scholars further note that this statement was reaffirmed a few months later in Ex Parte Yerger.[96] In Yerger, on a petition for habeas corpus, the Court reviewed a circuit court decision denying the writ to a civilian awaiting trial by a military commission for violating the Reconstruction

Acts. Without the slightest hesitation, the Supreme Court unanimously sustained its jurisdiction and held that the repealing act of 1868 did not affect its authority under the Judiciary Act of 1789 to issue the writ.[97] Thus, these scholars argue, McCardle does not sanction congressional impairment of the Court's jurisdiction:

The [repealing] statute did not deprive the Court of jurisdiction to decide McCardle's case; he could still petition the Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus to test the constitutionality of his confinement. The legislation did no more than eliminate one procedure for Supreme Court review of decisions denying habeas corpus relief while leaving another equally efficacious one available.[98]

These scholars also look to United States v. Klein,[99] decided two years after Yerger, in which the Court held that Congress could not enact legislation to eliminate an area of jurisdiction in order to control the results in a particular case. Klein sued in the Court of Claims under an 1863 statute that allowed the recovery of land captured or abandoned during the Civil War if the claimant could prove he had not assisted in the rebellion.[100] Relying on an earlier Supreme Court decision [101] that a presidential pardon proved conclusively that the recipient of the pardon had not aided the rebellion, Klein prevailed in the Court of Claims. While the government's appeal to the Supreme Court was pending, Congress passed a statute providing that a presidential pardon would not support a claim for captured property, and that acceptance of a pardon for participation in the rebellion, without a disclaimer of the facts recited, was conclusive evidence that the claimant had aided the enemy.[102] Futhermore, the statute provided that on proof of such pardon and acceptance, which could be heard summarily, the jurisdiction of the federal judiciary in the case should cease, and the Court of Claims should forthwith dismiss the suit of such claimant.[103] As Chief Justice Chase remarked: "The substance of this enactment is that an acceptance of a pardon, without disclaimer, shall be conclusive evidence of the acts pardoned, but shall be null and void as evidence of the rights conferred by it both in the Court of Claims and in this court on appeal." [104] The Supreme Court held the act to be unconstitutional because it subverted the judicial process by prescribing "a rule for the decision of a cause in a particular way," [105] and it also infringed upon the constitutional power of the executive by impairing the effect of a pardon.[106]

These efforts to construe McCardle narowly and to employ Yerger and Klein to protect the spirit of judicial review from the letter of article III, section 2, however, are unsuccessful. Neither McCardle nor Yerger in any way suggests that the Court would have been justified in invalidating the act of 1868 if the act had excepted from the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction cases arising under section 14 of the Judiciary Act of 1789. Quite the contrary, as Chief Justice Chase noted in McCardle, judicial duty entails the refusal to exercise ungranted jurisdiction as well as the obligation to exercise jurisdiction when it is conferred by the Constitution or by law.[107] McCardle and Yerger are wholly faithful to Justice Chase's understanding. In McCardle, the Court declined to exercise jurisdiction that had been positively excepted by the repealing act of 1868. In Yerger, the Court firmly exercised jurisdiction that the Judiciary Act of 1789 conferred and which the repealing act in no way limited. Thus, the Court on both occasions acted consistently with Chief Justice Marshall's observation in Cohens v. Virginia:[108] "We have no more right to decline the exercise of jurisdiction which is given, than to usurp that which is not given. The one or the other would be treason to the constitution." [109]

Similarly, reliance on Klein is misplaced. Klein involved a congressional attempt to forbid the Court from giving the effect to evidence which, in the Court's judgment, such evidence should have, and directed the Court to give the evidence an effect precisely contrary.[110] In Klein, Congress sought to curtail the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to obtain a particular result in a specific case; by so doing, Congress "inadvertently passed the limit which separates the legislative from the judicial power." [111] Congress' action in Klein is altogether different from congressional contractions of the Court's jurisdiction that seek merely to shift the determination of any result, whatever that result might be, to the lower federal or state courts, both of which are also bound by the Constitution as the supreme law of the land.[112] Shifting jurisdiction to lower federal or state courts is wholly permissible, and the Court in Klein declared as much, acknowledging that "if this Act did nothing more . . . [than] simply deny the right of appeal in a particular class of cases, there could be no doubt that it must be regarded as an exercise of the power of Congress to make 'such exceptions from the appellate jurisdiction' as should seem to it expedient." [113]

C. The contraction of Congress' power due to the passage of time

A third argument against the letter of article III operates from the perspective of what Justice Rehnquist has called the "living Constitution with a vengeance." [114] This argument is based on the premise that congressional "control over the Court's appellate jurisdiction has in effect now been repealed by the passage of time and by the recognition that exercise of such power would be in the truest sense subversive of the American tradition of an independent judiciary." [115] C. Herman Pritchett, who is closely identified with this position, argues that while the language of article III, section 2 may have seemed reasonable in 1787, so, too, did choosing a President by indirect election.[116] Originally, the Supreme Court was just a few words in an unadopted document; today, however, it is the most respected judicial body in the world and has the authority to determine the constitutionality of acts of Congress.[117] Given these changes in conditions, "Congress can no longer claim with good conscience the authority granted by article III, section 2." [118]

The assertion that new conditions can amend the clear language and intent of the exceptions clause is subject to considerable doubt. Changing circumstances [119] and the passage of time may be considered in the interpretation and adaptation of such broadly phrased constitutional provisions as the due process and commerce clauses. These clauses were drafted expansively to allow evolving interpretations as time might require. Neither the language of the exceptions clause nor the debates of the Convention, however, indicate that the framers intended such broad adaptations of article III. Changing circumstances can neither alter nor amend the meaning of clear and unequivocal language in the Constitution.[120] Even Pritchett recognizes this, at least with respect to the other constitutional feature he regards as anachronistic—indirect election of the President. Thus, rather than contending that the Electoral College has been repealed by history, Pritchett served on and supported the policies of an American Bar Association blue ribbon commission that proposed a constitutional amendment formally abolishing the Electoral College and substituting in its place direct election of the President.[121]

Many provisions of the Constitution, of course, are phrased broadly, thus permitting flexible interpretations that adapt the document to changing circumstances. Nonetheless, even when such broad phrasing exists, the goal must be "adaptation within the Constitution rather than adaptation of the Constitution."[122] The terms of article III, however, are not phrased so broadly and no doubt exists as to the framers' intent. Unless the Court is to be permitted to disregard the outer rational limits of constitutional language—all to protect its role as principal interpretor of that language—the "passage of time theory" cannot be legitimately employed to amend the letter of the exceptions clause.

D. The "essential functions" argument

A fourth argument against Congress' power to curtail the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is that Congress cannot constitutionally make any exceptions that will destroy what is variously described as the Court's essential role or function.[123] "[T]he [exceptions] clause means 'With such exceptions and under such regulations as Congress may make, not inconsistent with the essential function of the Supreme Court under this Constitution.'" [124] This argument, however, is also fraught with difficulties. It makes the Court itself the final arbiter of the extent of its powers. The argument contends not only that the essential functions of the Court cannot be limited, but also that the Court exclusively, and not the Congress, is to determine what functions are, in fact, essential. This interpretation of the exceptions clause cannot be sustained:

It is hardly in keeping with the spirit of checks and balances to read such a virtually unlimited power into the Constitution. If the Framers intended so to permit the Supreme Court to define its own jurisdiction even against the will of Congress, it is fair to say that they would have made that intention explicit.[125]

Nothing in the text of the exceptions clause or in any Supreme Court opinion addressing this subject suggests that Congress' power under article III, section 2 is limited to making "'inessential' exceptions." [126] The distinction between the "essential" and "inessential" functions of the Court is, of course, wholly extraconstitutional. Consequently, those who draw this distinction on the Court's behalf are not limited by the letter of the Constitution but, rather, are free to define the Court and its essential role and functions as they see fit. Not surprisingly, given the absence of any constitutional restrictions (or, more precisely, given their refusal to recognize and abide by any constitutional restrictions), proponents of this interpretation advance and defend a wide variety of definitions. Thus, Henry Hart, who first propounded this argument, defines the essential role of the Supreme Court as serving as a check on the coordinate branches of government to keep them from destroying the Constitution.[127] Leonard Ratner offers a slightly different view, stressing the Court's "essential constitutional functions of maintaining the uniformity and supremacy of federal law." [128] In contrast, Archibald Cox asserts that the "chief function of the Supreme Court is to protect human rights." [129] Even more expansively, Paul Brest accords a special role for the Court in promoting "individual rights and decision making through democratic processes." [130]

Although considerable variety exists among these definitions of the Court and its essential role, they share one common element. Central to all formulations of this argument is an activist view of the judiciary. Only through frequent recourse to judicial review will the Court be able to perform the essential functions judicial activists assign to it. Quite naturally, proponents of the essential functions argument see Congress' plenary powers under article III, section 2 as a threat to judicial activism.[131] These proponents, therefore, strive to distort or obscure the letter of the exceptions clause, thereby rendering secure the spirit of judicial review that animates their judicial activism.[132]

The incompatibility that proponents of the essential functions argument perceive between the letter of article III and the spirit of judicial review is almost exclusively attributable to the way in which they have defined the essential role and function of the Supreme Court. Their expansive view of what the Court should do obviously is threatened by language that gives to Congress the power to except from the Court's appellate jurisdiction the cases necessary to sustain the Court's activist role.[133] This perceived incompatability, however, can be avoided entirely if the Court's essential role is defined more modestly:

Federal Courts, including the Supreme Court, do not pass on constitutional questions because there is a special function vested in them to enforce the Constitution or police the other agencies of government. They do so rather for the reason that they must decide a litigated issue that is otherwise within their jurisdiction and in doing so must give effect to the supreme law of the land.[134]

This more limited conception of the role of the Court is consistent not only with the actual provisions of the Constitution, but also with Hamilton's original defense of judicial review in The Federalist, No. 78[135] and Chief Justice Marshall's establishment of judicial review in Marbury v. Madison.[136] Moreover, because this interpretation regards the Court's power of judicial review as extending no further than to cases otherwise within its jurisdiction, which jurisdiction is subject to such exceptions as Congress shall make, this interpretation reflects the compatibility of the letter of article III and the spirit of judicial review.[137]

E. The separation of powers/Federalism argument

A fifth contention closely related to the essential functions argument is that Congress' power under the exceptions clause is limited by the constitutional principles of separation of powers and federalism.[138]

If Congress also has plenary control over the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, then . . . Congress [could] by statute profoundly alter this structure of American government. It [could] all but destroy the coordinate judicial branch and thus upset the delicately poised constitutional system of checks and balances. It [could] distort the nature of the federal union by permitting each state to decide for itself the scope of its authority under the Constitution. It [could] reduce the supreme law of the land as defined in article VI to a hodgepodge of inconsistent decisions by making fifty state courts and eleven federal courts of appeal the final judges of the meaning and application of the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States.[139]

This contention, too, is flawed, because it uests on a superficial understanding of the political principles of the Constitution.

Those who would limit Congress' power under article III, section 2 stress that use of the exceptions clause constitutes an attack on the status and independence of the Court and thereby jeopardizes the principle of separation of powers.[140] These criticisms are groundless. In our constitutional system, the judiciary is not supposed to be entirely independent; neither is the legislative nor executive branch. Separation of powers does not entail complete independence. The framers did not intend the branches of government to be wholly unconnected with each other;[141] rather, the framers sought to create a government in which the branches would be so connected and blended, as to give to each a constitutional control over the others.[142] The framers accomplished this blending "by so contriving the interior structure of the government . . . that its several constituent parts, . . . [are] by their mutual relations, the means of keeping each other in their proper places." [143] The result is a government consisting of three coordinate and equal branches, each performing a blend of functions, thereby balancing, as opposed to merely separating, powers.[144]

The term separation of powers is, in fact, a misnomer. The framers created not so much a government of separated powers as one of "separated institutions sharing powers." [145] This sharing of powers allows the branches to have a "mutual influence and operation on one another. Each part acts and is acted upon, supports and is supported, regulates and is regulated by the rest." [146] Thus, the three branches, including the judiciary, are intended to move "in a line of direction somewhat different from that, which each acting by itself, would have taken; but, at the same time, in a line partaking the natural direction of each, and formed out of the natural direction of the whole—the true line of public liberty and happiness." [147]

The framers recognized that power is, by nature, encroaching, whether it be legislative, executive, or judicial.[148] They solved the problem of "the encroaching spirit of power" [149] by balancing the powers assigned to each of the three branches so that each branch could effectively check, but not control, the other two. Furthermore, the framers did not give any one branch the authority to decide whether its powers encroached on the others: "[N]one of [the three branches], it is evident, can pretend to an exclusive or superior right of settling the boundaries between their respected powers." [150]

The framers did not consider the judiciary exempt from the operation of these principles, although they did consider the judiciary to be the least dangerous of the three branches because they had given the judiciary the least amount of power.

Whoever attentively considers the different departments of power must perceive, that, in a government in which they are separated from each other, the judiciary, from the nature of its functions, will always be the least dangerous to the political rights of the Constitution; because it will be least in its capacity to annoy or injure them. The Executive not only dispenses the honors, but holds the sword of the community. The legislature not only commands the purse, but prescribes the rules by which the duties and rights of every citizen are to be regulated. The judiciary, on the contrary, has no influence over either the sword or the purse; no direction either of the strength or of the wealth of the society; and can take no active resolution whatever. It may truly be said to have neither force nor will but merely judgment; and must ultimately depend upon the aid of the executive arm even for the efficacy of its judgments.[151]

Although the framers regarded the judiciary as having the least capacity, because of the very nature of its functions, to be dangerous, the framers recognized that judicial power could be arbitrary and oppressive. The framers expected that the arbitrary discretion of the courts could be "bound down by strict rules and precedents which serve to define and point out their duty in every particular case that comes before them." [152] Additionally, the framers provided the other branches with powers to check judicial enroachments. Thus, the framers provided for congressional appropriation of money for the judicial branch, presidential appointment and senatorial confirmation of judges, and congressional power to define entirely the jurisdiction of the inferior federal courts. The framers also provided for the impeachment of judges by the House of Representatives and the trial of impeached judges by the Senate—what The Federalist called "a complete security" against "the danger of judiciary encroachments on the legislative authority." [153] Finally, the framers of the Constitution provided the legislative branch with ample authority under article III, section 2, so that if "some partial inconveniences" were to arise as a result of the judicial branch's exercise of its powers, Congress could make such exceptions and prescribe such regulations "as will be calculated to obviate or remove these inconveniences." [154]

Thus, the framers never intended for judicial power to be absolute or for the judiciary to be completely independent. Just as they provided checks upon the legislative and executive branches, so too the framers included mechanisms to restrain the judiciary. The exceptions clause was one such mechanism.

Those who contend that Congress' power under the exceptions clause is limited by the constitutional principle of federalism betray an equally superficial understanding of the political principles of the Constitution. They contend, with Leonard Sager, that Congress cannot restrict Supreme Court supervision of state conduct if such supervision is necessary to insure uniform judicial interpretation and state compliance with federal constitutional norms.[155] If the Supreme Court were restricted by Congress in such a manner, such restriction would, they fear, reduce the supremacy clause to a virtual nullity. Sager goes so far as to argue that if the states were not answerable to the Supreme Court, the Constitution would have "little to recommend it over the Articles of Confederation." [156] This view is deficient in a number of particulars.

This view reflects a common misperception concerning the nature of American federalism. The framers relied on federalism, as they also relied on separation of powers and the multiplicity of interests in an extended republic, to achieve their constitutional objectives—the creation and operation of an efficient and powerful guarantor of rights and liberties organized around the principle of qualitative majority rule.[157] The framers sought a "Republican remedy for the disease most incident to the Republican Government."[158] That disease was the tension between majority tyranny and democratic ineptitude.[159] The framers saw the federalism they were creating as contributing to that Republican remedy. Their federalism, however, was not merely a division of power between the national government and the state governments; it was also a blending of federal elements into the structure and procedures of the central government itself.[160] An obvious example of this blending is the mixture into the Senate of the federal principle of equal representation of all the states.[161] The framers recognized that this principle, when joined with bicameralism and separation of powers, could contribute directly to qualitative majority rule. For a measure to become law, for example a measure controlling the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, it would have to pass the Senate where, because of the federal principle of equal representation, the presence of a nationally distributed majority and the moderating tendencies associated therewith would be guaranteed.

To the framers, federalism also meant that the same relationship that existed between the citizen and the individual state also would exist, at least with regard to those functions specified in article I, section 8, between the citizen and the centralized national government. This is a crucial difference between the Constitution and the Articles of Confederation, and one which Professor Sager apparently overlooks.[162] Under the Constitution, the national government need not gain the cooperation of a state to regulate the behavior of the state's citizens, for they are also citizens of the United States. In fact, even if a state actively attempted to frustrate the wishes of the national government, the national government, through either legislative or judicial action, could reach the citizenry and hold them personally accountable for their actions. This is a significant difference between the Constitution and the Articles of Confederation: the national government can govern the individual directly and need not rely on the good will or cooperation of state intermediaries.

Similarly, if the Congress, moderated in its judgments by the nationally distributed majorities that are assured by the federal principle of equal representation of all states in the Senate, restricts the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in a certain subject matter area because Congress has concluded that the Court's decisions in that area have unduly limited the states, Congress' action can hardly be described as placing the supremacy clause in jeopardy. Rather, Congress is simply exercising its power under the exceptions clause to obviate those inconveniences that have arisen as a result of the judiciary's interventions and, in a manner that is wholly consistent with the constitutional principle of separation of powers, is determining for the national government what the states may or may not do.

The view that the Congress can limit the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court without jeopardizing federalism is compatible not only with the framers' understanding but also with the actions taken by both Congress and the federal judiciary until well into the twentieth century. Thus, in the Judiciary Act of 1789, Congress did not provide for Supreme Court review of cases in which state courts invalidated state conduct on federal grounds, even if those cases invalidated state conduct under an overly broad reading of federal laws that in turn defeated other federal rights.[163] In the same Act, Congress also subjected Supreme Court review of civil cases to a jurisdictional amount,[164] a requirement that was not eliminated for all cases involving constitutional issues until 1891[165] and was not abolished with respect to Supreme Court review of all federal questions until 1925.[166] Congress did not provide for Supreme Court review of federal criminal cases until 1802, and then only for review of decisions in which an inferior federal court had divided on a question of law.[167] Congress did not grant general power to the Court to review major federal criminal cases until 1891.[168] Obviously, the opponents of Congress' exercise of its powers under the exceptions clause have placed a premium on the uniformity of constitutional interpretation and Supreme Court supervision of state conduct that has not been shared by either Congress or the Court.

F. Limits on congressional power: The Bill of Rights and other constitutional provisions

A sixth argument made against Congress' power under the exceptions clause is that this power is limited by the constitutional requirements of article I, section 9 and the Bill of Rights and is fully subject to review under these and any other constitutional provisions uniformly applicable to all acts of Congress.[169] Those who make this argument draw a parallel between Congress' plenary power under the commerce clause and its plenary power under article III, section 2. For example, just as Congress' power to regulate commerce among the several states is subject to the requirements of the first and fifth amendments,[170] so also is Congress' power to make exceptions. The due process clause of the fifth amendment plays an especially prominent role in this argument. Advocates of this argument view the fifth amendment as guaranteeing litigants an independent judicial hearing of all constitutional claims, thereby limiting Congress' power to make exceptions that will deprive litigants of this hearing and, hence, of the opportunity to petition for the remedies they seek.

Like the other arguments against Congress' power to make exceptions, this argument also is deficient. Those who make this argument are correct, of course, in pointing out that the congressional power at issue is subject to the due process clause and all other constitutional provisions uniformly applicable to acts of Congress. What they fail to consider, however, is that the independent judicial hearing they insist upon need not occur at the Supreme Court level. The requirements of the due process clause can be satisfied fully in the state and lower federal courts, even if Congress were to strip the Supreme Court of its entire appellate jurisdiction. Moreover, because the Supreme Court noted in Cary v. Curtis[171] that "the judicial power of the United States . . . is . . . dependent for its distribution . . . entirely upon the action of Congress, who possess the sole power . . . of investing [the inferior courts] with jurisdiction . . . in the exact degree and character which to Congress may seem proper for the public good,"[172] it would be constitutionally permissible under the due process clause for Congress to deny jurisdiction as well to all lower federal courts, provided that state courts retained jurisdiction to hear these matters.[173] State courts, after all, are bound by the Constitution as the supreme law of the land.[174] Moreover, "[i]n the scheme of the Constitution, [state courts] are the primary guarantors of constitutional rights, and in many cases they may be the ultimate ones."[175] Thus, apparently nothing less than the total denial of any state judicial form would be subject to successful challenge as a violation of procedural due process.[176]

G. The prohibition on unconstitutionally motivated withdrawals of jurisdiction

Finally, a seventh argument against Congress' use of the exceptions clause to curtail the Court's appellate jurisdiction is that congressional actions in this regard cannot be unconstitutionally motivated:

When Congress manipulates jurisdiction in an effort to deny recognition and judicial enforcement of constitutional rights, it has deliberately set itself against the Constitution as the Court understands that document. Comparable behavior on the part of a mayor or police chief would constitute "bad faith," and so here. Legislative bad faith is a constitutionally impermissible motive, and it offers an independent ground for doubting the constitutionality of jurisdictional legislation.[177]

The claim that congressional use of the exceptions clause to displace a disfavored judicial precedent is unconstitutional can be sustained only by embracing the view that the Constitution is merely what the Court says it is. Sager embraces this view,[178] and he fears that "[i]f Congress enacts a selective jurisdictional limitation for cases that concern state conduct, it will be issuing an open, unambiguous invitation to state and local officials to engage in conduct that the Supreme Court has explicitly held unconstitutional."[179] Appalled by the prospect of such a strategem, he repeatedly labels it as "tawdry" and "lewd"[180] and as seducing the state judiciary to "malfeasance."[181]

This willingness to treat the Constitution as identical with its judicial gloss, however, is problematic. The mere reference to such notorious cases as Dred Scott v. Sandford,[182] Plessy v. Ferguson,[183] and Lochner v. New York[184] is sufficient to highlight the difficulty. If the Court was correct in its interpretations of the Constitution in these cases, then efforts to overturn these decisions by constitutional amendment, remedial legislation, or subsequent litigation were unconstitutionally motivated. If, however, the Court was mistaken in its interpretations of the Constitution in these cases, then the Constitution is not simply what the Court says it is, and some constitutional means must be available by which to rectify judicial errors.[185] Without such a means, the fate described by Abraham Lincoln in his First Inaugural Address cannot be avoided:

If the policy of the Government upon vital questions affecting the whole people is to be irrevocably fixed by decisions of the Supreme Court, the instant they are made in ordinary litigation between parties in personal actions, the people will have ceased to be their own rulers, having to that extent practically resigned the government into the hands of that eminent tribunal.[186]

Actually, various constitutional means do exist to correct Court misinterpretations; the exceptions clause is but one means of correction.

IV. PRACTICAL LIMITATIONS ON THE WITHDRAWAL OF JURISDICTION

At this junction, it should be apparent that the various arguments advanced against the exceptions clause are inadequate to accomplish the formidable task of displacing the clear and express words of article III, section 2. Although they are ingeniously cast and earnestly argued, these arguments can be rebutted, and Congress' power to make exceptions to the Court's appellate jurisdiction remains plenary. This conclusion, however, is unacceptable to some constitutional scholars. Irving Brant may be more graphic than most, but he is no more alarmed than many when he writes: "The mind is staggered by the thought of what would result if Congress should pass, and the Supreme Court should bow to, a law prohibiting the review of state court decisions, or cases involving the first or fourteenth amendments."[187] For Brant, the exceptions clause has "become a dagger sharpened by social conflict and pointed at the heart of the Bills of Rights. Time and again Congress has raised this dagger. Only once has it descended, but the menace continues to mount."[188] These misgivings, however, are unfounded, both because of the practical difficulties that would attend congressional contraction of federal jurisdiction and because of the moderating tendencies of a Constitution structured so that the popular branches can seldom act "on any other principles than those of justice and the general good."[189]

The practical difficulties that would accompany withdrawal of jurisdiction are considerable. First, federal courts are essential to the administration of federal law and the enforcement of coercive sanctions and private remedies. If Congress were to withdraw all jurisdiction from the federal courts, save only the Supreme Court's original jurisdiction, the final resolution of virtually all questions of federal law, constitutional and otherwise, would rest with the highest courts of the fifty states. The potential for inconsistency in their resolution of federal questions is so great, and the practical costs of such inconsistency are so high, that Congress is not likely to withdraw all federal jurisdiction, even though it is authorized by article III, section 2 to do so. If, in recognition of these constraints, the Congress decided to curtail only the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction, it would find that it had succeeded only in reducing, but by no means elimination, the potential for national inconsistency. The final resolution of all constitutional questions would then be left to the twelve federal courts of appeal and the probability of inconsistency in their decisions would still remain great.[190] Finally, if the Congress were to exercise its exceptions powers even more exactingly and were selectively to deprive the Supreme Court of jurisdiction to review only particular classes of cases such as busing, school prayer, or abortion, the tradition of store decisis could lead the lower federal and state courts to follow the Supreme Court decisions that originally prompted the congressional contraction:

[The courts] would still be faced with the decisions of the Supreme Court as precedents—decisions which that Court would now be quite unable to reverse or modify or even to explain. The jurisdictional withdrawal thus might work to freeze the very doctrines that had prompted its enactment, placing an intolerable moral burden on the lower courts.[191]

All of this is likely to convince Congress that "the federal system needs federal courts and the judicial institution needs an organ of supreme authority."[192]

These practical difficulties, however, are not great enough either to reassure those fearful of Congress' power under the exceptions clause or to discourage those who would have Congress exercise this power. Sager regards contractions of Supreme Court jurisdiction as "lewd winks" cast by the Congress in the state courts' direction, and he worries that state courts will be seduced to "dishonor federal precedent and refuse to recognize disfavored rights."[193] Professor Rice inquires: "What will be the practical effect of withdrawing jurisdiction from the Supreme Court and the lower federal courts?"[194] His answer, which employs the school prayer issue as an example, is hardly comforting to Sager:

Unlike a constitutional amendment, such a withdrawal would not reverse the Supreme Court's rulings on school prayer. Presumably, at least some state courts would strictly follow those decisions as the last authoritative Supreme Court pronouncement on the subject. But a new law would ensure that the Court received no opportunity to further extend its errors.

It may be expected, however, that some state courts would openly disregard the Supreme Court precedents and decide in favor of school prayer once the prospect of reversal by the Supreme Court had been removed. But that result would not be such a terrible thing. . . . [because state courts merely would be reversing] . . . Supreme Court decisions which . . . would appear so erroneous as to be virtually usurpations.

[B]ecause a statute rather than a constitutional amendment is involved, the Court's jurisdiction could readily be restored should the need for it become apparent.[195]

Although the practical difficulties attending jurisdictional contractions may or may not prove reassuring, those fearful of Congress' power to make exceptions should take considerable comfort in the fact that the Constitution is so designed and constructed as to render remote the prospect that Congress will exercise this expressly granted power either frequently or fully. Congress has only once succeeded in passing legislation excising a portion of the Court's appellate jurisdiction,[196] and this occurred in the post-Civil War period against a Court whose last exercise of judicial review was in the notorious Dred Scott v. Sandford[197] decision and whose membership included several justices who were on public record as believing that the Reconstruction program was unconstitutional.[198] Moreover, this excision was carried out neither with a meat-ax nor even with Brant's dagger,"[199] but with a scalpel; Congress eliminated only one procedure for Supreme Court review of the question at issue, but left an alternate review procedure untouched. Congress historically has acted quite responsibly toward the Court. It has abused neither its ability to make exceptions nor its other powers to curb the Court.[200] Such historical respect for the functions of the Court is hardly accidental.

V. CONCLUSION

The framers of the Constitution recognized that a dependence on the people and on their representative institutions were essential in a democratic republic. They nevertheless were aware of the need for precautions to insure that the people not only ruled, but that they ruled well.[201] One of the precautions upon which they relied was an independent judiciary exercising the traditional form of judicial review as articulated in The Federalist, No. 78[202] and as instituted in Marbury v. Madison,[203] thereby keeping the representative branches "within the limits assigned to their authority."[204]

The framers were well aware, however, that this precaution posed a potential threat to the political rights of the Constitution. In this regard, the Court was the least dangerous of the three branches, but it too could annoy and injure the rights and liberties of the people.[205] The Court also had to be restrained, even as it was used to restrain others. One means by which the framers sought to restrain the Court was by granting to Congress the power to make exceptions to the Court's appellate jurisdiction. The framers did not fear that Congress would abuse this power, unrestrained as it was by judicial review, for they had set in place against the tyrannical tendencies of the Congress a variety of auxiliary precautions, including separation of powers, checks and balances, bicameralism, staggered elections, federalism, and the moderating effect of a multiplicity of interests present in an extended republic.

For nearly two centuries, these precautions have worked exceedingly well. The Congress has acted responsibly, and the Court, ever mindful of the consequences that might be visited upon it if it were to attempt to substitute its pleasure for that of the legislative body,[206] generally has resisted the temptation to act as "a bevy of Platonic Guardians."[207] There is every reason to believe that these precautions will continue to work well, provided only that the letter of the Constitution—which is, after all, the very source of these precautions—remains central and governing in the minds of those who study and practice the law, and is not subordinated by them to the activist view which distills the very essence of the judicial role and constitutional legitimacy from the spirit of judicial review.

[3] Proposals to employ art. III, § 2 of the United States Constitution to limit the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court have been debated throughout our constitutional history. See R. BERGER, CONGRESS V. THE SUPREME COURT 285-96 (1969); W. MURPHY, CONGRESS AND THE COURT (1962); Nagel, Court-Curbing Periods in American History, 18 VAND. L. REV. 925 (1965).

A subsidiary question concerns Congress' power to curb the jurisdiction of the lower federal courts, leaving issues to be decided solely in the state courts. It is generally conceded that Congress could substantially reduce the authority of these courts or even abolish them altogether. See Palmore v. United States, 411 U.S. 389, 400-02 (1973); Cary v. Curtis, 44 U.S. (3 How.) 236 (1845); Redish & Woods, Congressional Power to Control the Jurisdiction of Lower Federal Courts: A Critical View and New Synthesis, 124 U. PA. L. (1983); H.R. 525, 98th Cong., 1st Sess. (1983); H.R. 253, 98th Cong., 1st Sess. (1983). [44] But see Brant, supra note 20, at 7. Brant correctly points out that subsequent to Dickinson's motion, an unidentified delegate move to insert the following substitute for the clause on appellate jurisdiction: "In all the other cases before mentioned the Judicial power shall be exercised in such a manner as the Legislative shall direct." 2 M. Farrand, supra note 36, at 431. This motion was defeated, six states to two. Brant argues that this proposed clause "would have given Congress the extensive power it claims it possesses under the authority to make exceptions from the Court's appellate jurisdiction. It is hardly conceivable that such a motion would have been offered if the delegates believed that they had just voted to confer substantially the same power under a different wording." Brant, supra note 20, at 7. See also Merry, supra note 20, at 59; Sager, supra note 20, at 49-50, n.95. Brant argues that Congress is authorized under art. III, § 2 to make exceptions only to the Court's review of matters of fact. See generally infra notes 80-91 and accompanying text. Brant's argument fails, however, because he is mistaken in his assertion that the power to determine how the judicial power shall be exercised is substantially the same as the power to make exceptions to the Court's appellate jurisdiction. The former power, in fact, is much greater, and the delegates understood this. Brant does not appreciate that it is one thing for Congress to have power to determine what cases the Supreme Court shall hear in its appellate jurisdiction, but quite another for Congress to have power to determine what the outcome of those cases shall be.

Comment, Removal of Supreme Court Appellate Jurisdiction: A Weapon Obscenity? 1969 Duke L.J. 291, 297 n.37. In fact, no justice has ever denied Congress' broad powers under art. III. Although Justice Douglas did declare in his dissent in Glidden Co. v. Zdanok, 370 U.S. 530, 605 n.11 (1962), that "[t]here is a serious question whether the McCardle case could command a majority today," and although this passage frequently is cited in writings that suggest that the contemporary Supreme Court would not accept congressional restrictions of its appellate jurisdiction equivalent to those upheld in McCardle, the context of Justice Douglas' dictum suggests something quite different; namely, if Congress were to attempt to deprive the Supreme Court of jurisdiction over a case that is already under judicial consideration, then it is questionable whether McCardle would be followed today. Douglas subsequently expressed his understanding of the broader question of Congress' power over the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in his concurrence in Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83 (1968): "As respects our appellate jurisdiction, Congress may largely fashion it as Congress desires by reason of the express provisions of § 2, art. III. [52] To the extent that differences of opinion arose among them, such differences were only over the question of whether the Court's appellate jurisdiction was originally granted by the Constitution or by the Congress. Three different answers were given. The first maintained that any withdrawal of the Court's appellate jurisdiction requires Congress to make a positive exception. All constitutionally granted jurisdiction not positively except by Congress is retained by the Court. This was the view of Justice James Wilson in his opinion in Wiscart v. Dauchy, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) at 326. The second approach was that the Court possesses no appellate jurisdiction unless positively granted by Congress. The Court's appellate jurisdiction is viewed as congressionally granted rather than as constitutionally authorized. This was the view of Chief Justice Ellsworth in Wiscart, see supra text accompanying note 50, and of Chief Justice Taney in Barry v. Mercein, 46 U.S. (5 How.) 103, 119-20 (1847), see infra text accompanying note 57. The third approach combined features of the first two. Like the first, it based the Court's appellate jurisdiction on the Constitution. However, once Congress had acted to grant the Court appellate jurisdiction, this approach followed the second approach and implicitly denied all jurisdiction not positively granted. This was the view of Chief Justice Marshall in Durousseau v. United States, 10 U.S. (6 Cranch) 307, 313-14 (1810). See infra text accompanying note 56. See also Comment, supra note 47, at 297-300.

The original jurisdiction of this court, and its power to receive appellate jurisdiction, are created and defined by the Constitution; and the legislative department of the government can enlarge neither one nor the other. But it is for Congress to determine how far, within the limits of the capacity of this court to take, appellate jurisdiction shall be given, and when conferred, it can be exercised only to the extent and in the manner prescribed by law. In these respects, it is wholly the creature of legislation. Id. at 254.

[68] Not everyone who would limit Congress' power under art. III, § 2 relies on all seven of these arguments. Some of these arguments contradict each other.

[77] Id. at 170.

[78] Sager agrees with Ratner's interpretation:

An "exception" implies a minor deviation from a surviving norm; it is a nibble, not a bite. And there is reason to think that this sense of the term was, if anything, clearer at the time the Constitution was drafted than now. The language of Article III from which Congress draws its authority to limit the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, thus contains only a bounded power to make exceptions. Sager, supra note 3, at 44.

[79] Hart, supra note 20, at 1364. Ratner recognizes this and concedes ultimately that "general usage . . . cannot provide a definitive interpretation," whereupon he launches into an "essential role of the Court" argument of the kind discussed infra notes 123-32 and accompanying text. Ratner, supra note 20, at 171. Sager likewise acknowledges the difficulty of textual interpretation: "To be sure, there is nothing self-evident about the precise limits of Congress' authority in such an amorphous grant, but this lack of an obvious answer invites an application of the tools of constitutional interpretation." Sager, supra note 3, at 44. If Sager's methodology for constitutional interpretation included some appreciation of the work of the constitutional framers and their understanding of separation of powers and federalism, his invitation to join him in applying this methodology would be more warmly received. See infra notes 138-61 and accompanying text.

[83] As Chief Justice Marshall wrote in Barron v. Baltimore, 32 U.S. (7 Pet.) 243 (1833), "[the framers] would have declared this purpose in plain and intelligible language." Id. at 249. For example, they could have declared: "In all the other Cases before mentioned, the supreme court shall have appellate Jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, but with appellate Jurisdiction as to Fact subject to such Exceptions and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make."

[84] See supra notes 40-43 and accompanying text. Brant likewise fails to appreciate that all the controversy present in the state ratifying conventions concerning whether the Supreme Court ought even to have power to review questions of fact in its appellate jurisdiction, a controversy that Brant cites as evidence supporting his general argument, is simply not germane to the question of whether Congress has power to contract the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court with respect to substantive questions of law. For similar citation of and reliance on wholly irrelevant evidence, see Merry, supra note 20, at 59-62.

[85] 3 J. ELLIOTT supra note 45, at 572. Randolph was echoing John Marshall's comments from the previous day: "What is the meaning of the term exceptions? Does it not mean an alteration and diminution? Congress is empowered to make exceptions to the appellate jurisdiction, as to law and fact, of the Supreme Court." Id. at 560.

[90] THE FEDERALIST, No. 80, at 541 (A. Hamilton) (J. Cooke ed. 1961). Although Brant quotes from THE FEDERALIST No. 80, he engages in a form of academic gerrymandering and conveniently overlooks this passage. See Brant, supra note 20, at 9. Brant focuses his attention instead on a passage from THE FEDERALIST No. 81:

To avoid all inconveniences, it will be safest to declare generally that the Supreme Court shall possess appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact, and that this jurisdiction shall be subject to such exceptions and regulations as the national legislature shall prescribe. This will enable the government to modify it in such a manner as will best answer the ends of public justice and security. Id., No. 81, at 552. See also Merry, supra note 20, at 309 (also ignoring THE FEDERALIST No. 80). This passage, of course, is irrelevant to the issue of whether Congress' power under the exceptions clause is limited simply to curtailing the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in cases raising questions of fact. To prove that Congress' power extends to regulating the treatment of facts does not prove that its power is limited to such regulation. See supra note 84.

Despite all of this evidence, Sager maintains the following position:

[I]f the Framers of Article III had had the bad sense to believe the control of jurisdiction was a workable way to give Congress a substantive check on the federal judiciary, we might well have to live with that fact and with its implications for the constitutional shortcuts that Congress would be entitled to take. But there is no evidence that they held this belief. . . . Sager, supra note 3, at 42.

Congress has already provided that the Supreme Court shall have jurisdiction of the judgments of the Court of Claims on appeal. Can it prescribe a rule in conformity with which the Court must deny to itself the jurisdiction thus conferred, because and only because its decision, in accordance with settled law, must be adverse to the government and favorable to the suitor? This question seems to us to answer itself. Id. at 147.

To the executive alone is entrusted the power of pardon; and it is granted without limit. Pardon includes amnesty. It blots out the offense pardoned and removes all its penal consequences. It may be granted on conditions. In these particular pardons, that no doubt might exist as to their character, restoration of property was expressly pledged, and the pardon was granted on condition that the person who availed himself of it should take and keep a prescribed oath.

Now it is clear that the legislature cannot change the effect of such a pardon any more than the executive can change a law. Yet this is attempted by the provision under consideration. The court is required to receive special pardons as evidence of guilt and to treat them as null and void. It is required to disregard pardons granted by proclamation on condition, though the condition has been fulfilled, and to deny them their legal effect. This certainly impairs the executive authority, and directs the court to be instrumental to that end. Id.

The seventh amendment, for example, provides that in all cases where the "value in controversy" exceeds twenty dollars, the right to a jury trial at common law must be preserved. It might be argued that use of a twenty dollar floor does not today accomplish the framers' goal of precluding a jury trial in minor civil cases, for twenty dollars at the time of the drafting of the seventh amendment meant something quite different from twenty dollars today. But despite such an argument, we could not read an inflationary spiral into the terms of the seventh amendment. The seventh amendment is strict and unbending in its dictates on this matter. If we are to alter it, even in order to accomplish the framers' goal, we must do so through the amendment process. Similarly, the language and history of article III are so clear that any alteration, even to accomplish the framers' purposes, must come by amendment and not by interpretation in light of "changing circumstances." Id. at 74.

Interestingly, those who make this argument point out that none of the cases cited in support of Congress' powers under the exceptions clause, including McCardle, involves what they would consider an "essential function" of the Supreme Court. Id. at 173-81. This fact, however, may attest more to the sense of sound congressional opinion against the wisdom of making such exceptions than to any notion that Congress lacks the power to do so. See Van Alstyne, supra note 31, at 257.

Hart and Brant appear to believe that only the Supreme Court, through its employment of judicial review, is able to provide protection against the Constitution's destruction. This view ignores the operation of such constitutional mechanisms as separation of powers, bicameralism, staggered elections, federalism, and the multiplicity of interests present in an extended republic. See R. Rossum & G. McDowell, The American Founding: Politics, Statesmanship, and the Constitution 6-11 (1981). See also infra notes 140-61 and accompanying test. Moreover, even if these other constitutional features were absent, Hart's and Brant's reliance on the judiciary still would be misplaced. As Learned Hand observed:

[T]his much I think I do know—that a society so riven that the spirit of moderation is gone, no court can save; that a society where that spirit flourishes, no court need save; that in a society which evades its responsibility by thrusting upon the courts the nurture of that spirit, that spirit in the end will perish. It does appear to be more than a passing strange argument to suggest that because the full evolution of substantive constitutional review may itself have been exogenous to the Constitution, the power of Congress to make exceptions of any appellate jurisdiction described in article III therefore does not extend to such review; as though the power to make exceptions applies to any appellate jurisdiction granted by article III, but not to that judicial power which the Supreme Court simply evolved in the fullness of time. Id. at 262-63.

[133] Their expansive view of the Court's essential role also is threatened by, and in turn threatens, other express constitutional provisions, including the prescribed means for amending the Constitution found in art. 1. The authority of the central federal government was restricted to the individual stage governments and did not reach the individual citizens composing the states. Even this authority, however, was limited; the resolutions of the federal authority amounted to little more than mere recommendations, which the states opted to observe or disregard.

2. The central federal government had no authority over the internal problems of the individual states. Its rule was limited primarily to certain external tasks of mutual interest to the member states.

3. Each individual member had an exact quality of suffrage. This equal vote was derived from the equality of sovereignty possessed by each member state.

[173] See Berger, supra note 14, at 804; Wechsler, supra note 13, at 1005. See also Redish & Woods, supra note 3. Redish and Woods argue that Congress' power to deny original jurisdiction to the federal courts and to vest it instead in the state courts is limited by Tarble's Case, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 397 (1871), in which the Supreme Court overturned a habeas corpus order by a Wisconsin state court to a federal official ordering the release of an allegedly under-age soldier from the United States Army. The Court reasoned that a state court had no power to interfere with the operations of federal officials. Redish and Woods infer from Tarble's Case that state courts lack jurisdiction to entertain any case that seeks to direct the conduct of federal officials through the use not only of habeas corpus but also of mandamus and injunctive powers. They later admit, however, that "Congress can probably circumvent the difficulties created by Tarble's Case by explicitly authorizing state court jurisdiction over the acts of federal officials." Redish & Woods, supra note 3, at 106. Thus, if Congress wants to preclude all lower federal court jurisdiction, it can do so without raising questions of due process, provided only it clearly authorizes state court review of those cases. See Sager, supra note 3, at 80-84.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Senator for yielding to me.

Mr. SIMON. I thank the Senator from North Carolina.

I find the prayer referred to is not offensive. I think that 95 percent of our people would not find it offensive. But there are those who do. We are talking religion here. I do not know that much about the various divisions within the Baptist Church. I know there are enough divisions within the Lutheran Church.

One branch believes that any prayer that does not specifically mention Jesus Christ is not considered a valid prayer.

The Senator may say that is right or wrong, but the point is we cannot make that decision in Government. Let us let that branch of the Lutheran Church that believes that go ahead and believe it; let us let Baptists who believe in one thing believe it; let us let Jews who believe in one thing believe it. But let us not have Government sponsoring some things where we get enmeshed in things where I think we should not be.

Again, I have great respect for the Senator from North Carolina, but I think we are getting into quicksand here. I think we better not move in that direction.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Will the Senator withhold?

Mr. SIMON. I withhold.

Mr. GOLDWATER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I would like to discuss this matter very briefly with my good friend from North Carolina.

I first would ask him, did he really write this bill? Is this really his?

Mr. HELMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I am a little surprised that the Senator from North Carolina decided to outlaw the Supreme Court from our life. I think this is unconstitutional, even though I am not a lawyer and do not pretend to be. I have as much interest in prayer as anyone in this place, although probably I do not use it as much as I should.

The Senator is beginning to get into areas now that are frankly none of our business. As the Senator was inferring, in my State, I have 19 Indian tribes. Every one of them practices a different religion. I have Indian tribes that believe in legend. I have Indian tribes that worship gods that live up in the forests. I have Indian tribes that believe in the stars.

I do not think it is right for this Congress to tell anybody how they should pray. I believe they should be allowed to pray in any way they doggone please.

I just wanted to say to my friend from North Carolina, I am really kind of surprised that he would write this bill. If I wrote it, I would have been ashamed of it.

Mr. HELMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I am a little surprised at my friend from Arizona, because he is describing article III of the Constitution.

All this bill does, I say to the Senator, if he reads it—and I am certainly not ashamed of it—all this bill does is to give Congress an opportunity to vote on the question of article III of the Constitution of the United States which bestows upon Congress the right and authority to limit the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in whatever manner the Congress feels the Supreme Court has exceeded its authority.

They call it "court stripping." My friend Sam Ervin did not agree with me on the issue of prayer. In one of the last conversations I had with him, he said, "JESSE, you are doing fine, but get off that prayer business." He agreed with the Senator from Arizona.

But he said, "Your approach is correct—the implementation of article III of the Constitution."

To say that it is unconstitutional to implement the Constitution puzzles me.

Mr. President, just so that it will be clear for the RECORD, I ask unanimous consent that part of article III of the U.S. Constitution be printed in the RECORD, to make certain what it provides.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ARTICLE III

SECTION 1. The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services a Compensation which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

SECTION 2. The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction;—to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States;—between a State and Citizens of another State;—between Citizens of different States;—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

In all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be Party, the supreme Court shall have original Jurisdiction. In all the other Cases before mentioned, the supreme Court shall have appellate Jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, let me say in conclusion that Senator Ervin did extensive research on the question of modifying, adjusting, and limiting Federal court jurisdiction. As I recall, he said the article III powers had been used by Congress on 57 occasions.

Furthermore, the Chief Justice of the United States, according to information available to me, has recommended a number of proposals that would limit the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. I hope the Chief Justice of the United States cannot be accused of "court stripping" or of violating the U.S. Constitution.

I yield the floor and suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BAUCUS. Will the Senate withhold?

Mr. HELMS. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I have listened with great interest to the discussions between the Senator from Arizona, the Senator from Illinois, and the Senator from North Carolina.

It strikes me that the discussion until now concerns the propriety of school prayer. That is a subject we can debate forever. It is a subject on which there will be no universal agreement. It is a subject which ultimately goes to the core of humanity. It is a discussion which is as important as any other we could endeavor to pursue.

Mr. President, that is not the question which is before us. The question which is before us is whether the U.S. Congress should pass legislation precluding the U.S. Supreme Court and lower Federal courts from hearing school prayer cases. We are not deciding under what circumstances school prayer is permissible or not permissible but, rather, when and under what circumstances, if ever, the Supreme Court or other Federal courts should be precluded from exercising their appellate jurisdiction or hearing cases, concerning school prayer.

The bill before us is a court-stripping bill. It strips the Federal judiciary including the Supreme Court, jurisdiction over school prayer cases. It is my firm conviction that if this bill were to become law, it would begin to eliminate the Constitution of the United States.

I listened to the arguments of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. HELMS], suggesting that article III of the Constitution provides that the Congress may limit the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court.

The Senator is correct in that those are the words of article III, but we all know, we all learned in civics class, as we studied the history of our country, that when the Founding Fathers came to this country and wrote the Constitution of the United States, it was based upon the principle of separation of powers, of checks and balances. That is why we have an article I, which is the legislative article; article II, the executive article; and article III, the judicial article—three separate articles providing for the powers and limitations of three equal but separate branches of Government.

The fact is that if the interpretation of article III is as the Senator from North Carolina says—that is, if the U.S. Congress can constitutionally preclude the U.S. Supreme Court jurisdiction over any constitutional issue whatsoever—then in effect Congress is eliminating the Supreme Court.

Our Founding Fathers came to America to escape tyranny, to escape religious persecution, to establish certain freedoms—freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom to exercise religion in any way an individual wished, and the other freedoms in the Bill of Rights and the other provisions of the Constitution.

The fact is, as we well know, our Founding Fathers felt those freedoms were so important that they put them in the Constitution to be changed only by a constitutional amendment requiring two-thirds vote of both Houses of Congress and ratification by three-quarters of the States.

As a matter of fact, after looking at the Constitutional Convention debates, scholars have been unable to find any discussion on the exceptions clause of article III. There is no debate over that clause, and it is obvious why—it makes no sense for the exceptions clause to allow Congress to limit Supreme Court jurisdiction over core constitutional cases. Such a grant of power would have been a radical departure from the spirit and intent of the Constitution and, obviously, there would have been some debate over it.

In my view, the exceptions clause allows the Congress to limit appellate jurisdiction, but not the core Federal constitutional issues. To limit the core Federal constitutional issues—free speech, prayer, et cetera—would make the entire constitutional scheme nonsense.

There are many other points I could make on jurisdiction removal bills, like S. 47, but I will close today by urging my colleagues to oppose this bill and thereby preserve and protect our Constitution and our system of government.

I yield the floor.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, we are once again compelled to rise to defend the most obvious, most fundamental features of our constitutional system of government. The strength of the Constitution arises from the way it disperses power among the branches of Government and the zeal with which it protects individual liberties. Make no mistake about it. This is not a debate over school prayer. That will come later. Today we are debating the temptation of one branch of Government to subdue another branch by relieving it of its authority.

This debate over limiting Federal court jurisdiction to make changes in the nature and quality of rights declared by the Supreme Court under the Constitution is not new. Just 3 years ago, we debated and rejected the bill Senator HELMS presents today.

The arguments haven't changed. The fundamental principle we upheld then and must uphold now is that our courts, the branch of Government devoted to interpreting our Constitution and laws, must remain free of the pressures of the passing majority. A healthy and independent judiciary is never more necessary than at a time when there is impatience and discontent with the way the Supreme Court chooses to interpret the Constitution.

In normal times we all perceive a great personal stake in the independence of the courts. No one can safely predict whose rights will depend on that independence in the future. Therefore, we favor a strong judiciary, under law, rather than a judiciary that bends first in one popular direction, then in another. But to make this system work, no one has the right to look to the courts for a quick fix. No one has a stake in courts that can be easily persuaded to follow the howls rather than the law.

The bill before us would seek to use the exceptions clause in article III, section 2, clause 2 of the Constitution to justify eliminating Supreme Court appellate jurisdiction in cases reviewing State enactments on school prayer. Article III gives the court appellate jurisdiction "with such exception, and under such regulations as the Congress shall make." Cases from the Court itself and nearly two centuries of legal scholarship have not defined the limits of this congressional power. And I doubt that it is within the realm of likelihood that the scope of the power is about to become the subject of complete agreement among the branches of Government or among legal scholars. I believe that every one of us has a duty to read the Constitution as a living document and to pass on matters before us as if the responsibility for perpetuation of its genius fell to each one of us.

But in order to conclude that article III of the Constitution permits the Congress in the guise of carving exception, to carve up the Supreme Court itself, much of the rest of the Constitution has to be ignored. Article V of the Constitution lays down very explicit rules for the amendment process. The process is long and arduous, and the Constitution has been amended very few times as a result. It is difficult to believe that the authors of the Constitution, as politically astute a group of people as one might imagine, would have framed a careful mechanism for amendment and then would have permitted a simple statute to work as an amendment by eliminating review of that statute by the Supreme Court.

I do not accept the proposition that if Congress creates lower Federal courts, it must endow them with unlimited authority to vindicate every federally created right. There have been limitations on Federal court jurisdiction such as increases in the jurisdictional amount, changes in the nature of diversity and removal jurisdiction, and a few—very few—instances where Congress has limited Federal court jurisdiction altogether, such as the Norris LaGuardia Act and the Tax Injunction Act of 1937.

But not even the few instances where Congress limited the jurisdiction of the Federal courts in specific subject areas did Congress ever go so far as to remove from the total protection of the Federal courts rights guaranteed under the Constitution. Through this lengthy and sometimes tumultuous history of Congress, many bills have been introduced to do just that, and none has ever passed.

Perhaps every generation is bound to test the strength and the limits of the principles of an independent judiciary and the separation of powers.

The 75th Congress was faced with a dilemma not unlike our own when it considered and rejected President Roosevelt's court-packing proposal. The Senate Judiciary Committee rose to the occasion, despite the great pressure to speed along legislation that was designed to ease the pains of the Great Depression. The words of that committee could be our own today:

> Let us, of the 75th Congress, in words that will never be disregarded by any succeeding Congress, declare that we would rather have an independent court, a fearless court, a court that will dare to announce its honest opinions in what it believes to be the defense of liberties of the people, than a court that, out of fear or sense of obligation to the appointing power or factional passion, approves any measure we may enact. We are not the judges of the judges. We are not above the Constitution.

I urge my colleagues to reject S. 47. Nothing less than the rule of law is at stake.

WITHDRAWING SUPREME COURT JURISDICTION OVER SCHOOL PRAYER

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina raises several important legal and policy issues in my mind. In the first place, the Senate has a judgment to make concerning the legal sufficiency of the Supreme Court's interpretations of the first amendment relative to prayer in public schools. For reasons I will explore in more detail hereafter, I think it is evident that the Supreme Court has departed from the intent of the authors of the first amendment establishment clause by restricting public school prayer and meditation. Although the Constitution vests in Congress some authority to make exceptions in the appellate jurisdiction of the U.S. Supreme Court, that limited power must be used very judiciously. This leads us to the crucial question presented by S. 47, specifically, whether Congress would be wise to do what it has some authority to do, namely withdraw Supreme Court jurisdiction over the subject matter of "voluntary prayer, Bible reading, or religious meetings in public schools or public buildings?" On this point, for various reasons, I have severe reservations about using in this instance the authority which the Constitution implies should be employed only in exceptional circumstances. In any event, Congress could employ, and has at its immediate disposal, better means to remedy the dislocations caused by several ill-advised Supreme Court opinions. The better means to which I refer is Senate Joint Resolution 2, a constitutional amendment permitting silent prayer or meditation in public schools. Senate Joint Resolution 2 has been approved by the Constitution Subcommittee and is currently on the Judiciary Committee calendar.

SUPREME COURT AND THE FIRST AMENDMENT

As I mentioned earlier, the Supreme Court has sharply altered the traditional understanding of the first amendment with regard to the permissibility of voluntary and appropriate school devotions. In the mid-1960's and again just a few weeks ago, the Court eliminated prayer from the classroom on the basis that it was inconsistent with the Constitution's prohibition against laws respecting an establishment of religion. These cases overturned the laws of at least 41 States. The most recent Jaffree case was particularly objectionable because it outlawed silent prayer and mediation due to the perception of a majority of the Justices that the State of Alabama had evinced an intent to endorse religion. Leaving aside for a moment the question of how a voluntary moment of silence endorses or offends any religious sentiment, a reading of the history of the Constitution clarifies that the framers would not have considered such harmless activities establishments of religion.

The author of the first amendment, himself, on the convention floor stated his intent for the establishment clause. He said:

> The meaning of the words [is] that Congress should not establish a religion and enforce the observation of it by law . . . [Congress might have power] to establish a national religion; to prevent these effects . . . the amendment was intended. Twice in this brief commentary Madison emphasized that the intent of the establishment clause was to prevent Congress from elevating a single denomination to the status of a national church. The colonists had suffered at the hands of a state church in the old country and wanted to preclude religious prosecutions at the hands of an established national church. Justice Story summarized well the meaning given to the establishment clause for nearly one hundred seventy five years: The real object of the First Amendment . . . was to prevent any national ecclesiastical establishment which would give to an hierarchy the exclusive patronage of the national government.

Animated by this policy, our national heritage developed with profound religious overtones. Besides school prayer, our coinage carries the motto: "In God We Trust." Our national anthem speaks of our trust in Diety. Our pledge of allegiance avows that we are a nation "under God." On our monument walls are engraved Abraham Lincoln's Second Inaugural Address of deep theological content. Our military and Congress are served by chaplains. Our most important public meetings, including the sessions of both the House of Representatives and the Senate and, ironically, the Supreme Court, begin with an invocation of the protections of the Almighty. These venerable customs have not become suddenly inconsistent with the first amendment, nor are they harbingers of a single sanctioned national orthodoxy. They are simply the perpetuation of a rich national tradition and heritage which antedates even the Constitution.

In the wake of misguided Supreme Court interpretations, however, this long-standing concept of the establishment clause has been altered. The First Congress's language has been read not only to prohibit the Federal Government from according preferences to religious denominations but further to erect a "wall of separation" between church and State. The original intent of the first amendment that Congress be neutral between competing religious views has been transformed into the notion of neutrality between religion and irreligion.

Given the integral role of compulsory public education in the development of the values of the citizenry, I am convinced—and I believe that the great majority of Americans would share this view—that the Supreme Court's erroneous interpretations have created a regime in which the State has become antagonistic, even hostile, toward religious views. The average child spends 6 or 7 hours every day in the classroom during which his intellectual, physical, emotional, and cultural development are encouraged. Yet even a moment of silent prayerful meditation or reflection is considered unconstitutional. The student is educated in political theory and sex education, music and art, baseball and football, hygiene and home economics; indeed, he is instructed in virtually everything conducive to a constructive character, yet even a moment of silent prayer may not be part of a balanced school day. President George Washington's Farewell Address contained insightful guidance on this point:

> Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensible supports. . . . Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on the minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle.

The current Court's policy nonetheless mocks the intent of the framers of the first amendment. The establishment clause was simply not drafted to bar appropriate accommodations between government and religion in general. In the name of honoring the intent of the authors of the Constitution and preserving the religious prerogatives of school students and all Americans, the Congress should act to correct the Supreme Court's misconceived rulings.

ARTICLE III, SECTION 2

The language of article III itself seems to counsel Congress to use caution with regard to the Supreme Court's jurisdiction. Section 2 of article III lists the Supreme Court's original jurisdiction and then proceeds:

> In all other cases before mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, with such exceptions, and under such regulations as the Congress shall make.

This language already seems to imply some limitations in Congress' authority. Congress could not, for instance, withdraw all appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court because in that instance it would not be making an exception at all. Nor could Congress make a sweeping withdrawal of all jurisdiction to review cases dealing with the Bill of Rights. As the word "exception" implies, Congress' power relative to the entire corpus of the Court's appellate jurisdiction is limited to making rare and narrow diversions from the normal course of permitting the Court to hear appeals.

At this point, it is important as well to understand the distinction between article III, section 1, which gives Congress authority to create "from time to time * * * inferior [Federal] courts" and article III, section 2, which deals with the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. As the Supreme Court has repeatedly reaffirmed, the power to create or dissolve lower Federal courts inlcudes the power to define, limit, or withdraw lower Federal court jurisdiction. For instance, Chief Justice Earl Warren stated:

> Congress might appropriately limit litigation . . . pursuant to its constitutional authority under Article III. South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 331 (1966).

Chief Justice Stone stated the same principle in these words:

> The Congressional power to ordain and establish inferior courts includes the power of investing them with jurisdiction . . . and of withholding jurisdiction. Yakus v. U.S., 321 U.S. 414 (1944).

Finally, the Supreme Court has stated more recently that:

> . . . the Constitution . . . leaves the scope of the jurisdiction of the federal district courts to the wisdom of Congress. Allen v. McCurry, 101 S. Crt. 411, 419 (1980).

Thus, withdrawals of jurisdiction like the Norris-LaGuardia Act governing labor disputes and the Tax Injunction Act governing challenges to taxing authority are enactments under article III, section 1, rather than section 2 which governs the Supreme Court's power to hear appeals.

The realization of the great responsibility placed upon Congress to shape Federal jurisdiction has always inspired careful and considered conduct. For precisely the reasons mentioned by John Rutledge of South Carolina in the 1787 Convention—that the Supreme Court assures the superiority and uniformity of constitutional policy—Congress has been and remains very cautious about using the exceptions power. This remains an uppermost consideration in my mind and in the views of most Senators as far as I can tell. This is entirely appropriate and in complete accord with the narrow applicability of the exceptions power.

Although Congress possesses a power, prudence often counsels against its use. For example, Congress has authority to plunge the Nation into a global war, but prudence counsels against precipitous use of the war declaration power. Similarly Congress has been appropriately reticent to wield its article III, section 2 power. That reticence should only be overridden when the dislocation associated with a focused restructuring of court remedies is far outweighed by the dislocations occasioned by an errant judicial policy. For instance, I might have recommended its use in the wake of the Dred Scott or Plessey versus Ferguson cases of another era. In any event the exceptions power has been and should be reserved for exceptional circumstances. (See 96 F.R.D. 245 (1982)) Alexander Hamilton wrote that the exceptions clause is a salutory means "to obviate and remove" the "inconveniences" arising from injudicious use of judicial power.

PRUDENTIAL RESERVATIONS ABOUT THIS AMENDMENT

As I have mentioned several times, the language of the Constitution suggests that Congress' article III, section 2 power ought to be used sparingly, perhaps only in "exceptional" circumstances. This requires that we make clear delinations between legal issues and policy considerations. As a matter of law, the Constitution grants Congress some authority to regulate Federal court jurisdiction, but as a matter of policy, this public school prayer issue does not, in my view, warrant the exercise of this powerful check on the Court.

I continue to feel that the Court should receive the opportunity to reconsider this error. Withdrawing jurisdiction from the Supreme Court will deny the Court the opportunity to hear other cases and thus reverse its error. Given the narrow margins of decision, the shifting positions of some Justices, and the fine distinctions in some of the recent religion case holdings, the Court should be afforded the opportunity to reconsider its recent opinions. The most efficient and appropriate way to correct a Supreme Court error is, of course, for the Court to return in a later case to a policy based more solidly on the language of the Constitution and the intent of its authors. This would be precluded by S. 47.

Another consideration counselling against withdrawal of jurisdiction is that the Court's most recent misguided pronouncements remain as binding interpretations of the Constitution. State Supreme Courts which would, in the absence of an appeal to the Federal judicial system, serve as courts of final resort would presumably continue to apply erroneous doctrines as the last authoritative expression of the Supreme Court on that subject. Some might argue that State courts could depart from Supreme Court rulings in the absence of an appeal, but there is no guarantee that those departures would return to an apt reading of the Constitution. Some State courts might stray even further from the moorings of the Constitution.

Finally, and perhaps most important, Congress has at its immediate disposal a corrective which does not suffer from the uncertainties of a jurisdiction withdrawal. In 1982, President Reagan recommended the adoption of a constitutional amendment on the school prayer issue. Hearings were held in both the 97th and 98th Congresses on his proposal. Indeed the Senate voted last Congress in favor of the amendment, but not by the two-thirds margin required for approval. The detailed consideration of this proposal led to the development of an alternative constitutional amendment proposal in 1983 concerning silent prayer or meditation. This was more than a year before the Jaffree decision which struck down Alabama's statute permitting a moment of silent prayer or meditation in public schools. This constitutional amendment proposal would have the well-defined effect of reversing the Jaffree ruling and restoring the proper meaning of the first amendment establishment clause.

This proposal, Senate Joint Resolution 2 in the current Congress, has already had the benefit of another hearing which further focuses the intent of its drafters and clarifies our intent to redirect the Court's establishment clause doctrines. Senate Joint Resolution 2 was approved by the Constitution Subcommittee earlier this year by a vote of 4 to 1. It is now on the Senate Judiciary Committee calendar where it should be considered in an orderly fashion within the next few weeks. This means that the Senate, if it so desired, could have Senate Joint Resolution 2 before it in the very near future.

The language and legislative history of Senate Joint Resolution 2 are clear and certain. This is a remedy for the missteps of the Supreme Court which does not depend on what a variety of different State courts might or might not do if presented with a case that allows them the leeway to enunciate a new policy for their State concerning religious liberties.

Given the ready availability of a superior correction and the inherent uncertainties in the withdrawal of Supreme Court jurisdiction, I would urge my colleagues to channel their efforts into that better avenue. The Supreme Court's misinterpretations of the establishment clause must be set straight. The Congress has the authority to restrict the Court's jurisdiction. But restricting the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is not in this case the best way to achieve the Senate's objective. Accordingly, I commend to the Senate Joint Resolution 2 as the better way to achieve the meritorious objectives of this amendment.

CONCLUSION

In light of these considerations, I must reluctantly vote to table S. 47. The means it employs to reach the admirable objective of correcting the Court's school prayer policy could have counterproductive consequences. Congress must exercize its authority more judiciously and not in a manner likely to be rejected by the Supreme Court itself.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I strongly support S. 47, the proposed Voluntary School Prayer Act of 1985. This important legislation would restore to our Nation's children the right to pray voluntarily in the public schools—a right which was freely exercised under our Constitution until the 1960's when the Supreme Court ruled to the contrary.

Mr. President, in the course of its history, our Nation clearly has been guided by a visible faith in God. In the Declaration of Independence our forefathers wrote:

> We hold these Truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty, and the Pursuit of Happiness.

In crafting the Constitution, our Founding Fathers sought, through the free exercise clause of the first amendment, to ensure that all Americans were free to worship God without Government interference or restraint. At the same time, they sought, through the establishment clause, to prevent what had originally caused many colonial Americans to emigrate to this country—an official, state religion. In their wisdom, the Founding Fathers recognized that true religious liberty precludes the Government from both forcing and preventing worship.

Until 1962, the establishment clause of the first amendment was generally understood only to prohibit the Federal Government from officially approving, or holding in special favor, any particular religious faith or denomination. I believe that this was the clear intention of the Founding Fathers.

In 1962, however, the Supreme Court ruled that devotional activities in the public schools is a violation of the first amendment, regardless of whether student participation is compulsory or voluntary.

Mr. President, we, as a nation, continue to recognize the Deity in our Pledge of Allegiance by affirming that we are a nation "under God," The coins in our pockets are inscribed with the motto, "In God We Trust." In this body, we begin our workday with the comfort and stimulus of voluntary group prayer—such a practice has been constitutionally upheld by the Supreme Court. It is absurd that the opportunity for the same beneficial experience is denied to the boys and girls who attend public schools. This situation simply does not comport with the intentions of the framers of the Constitution and is, in fact, antithetical to the rights of our youngest citizens to freely exercise their respective religions. It should be changed, without further delay, by appropriate means.

That is why I support this legislation, which would deny the Supreme Court and the Federal district courts jurisdiction in cases involving voluntary school prayer. I believe that Congress is explicitly given the authority to take this action by article III, section 2 of the Constitution. I am hopeful that this legislation will be enacted and once again our children will have the freedom to exercise in public schools what I believe to be a primary guarantee to all citizens under the Constitution—the right to pray voluntarily.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, S. 47 would prohibit the Federal courts, including the Supreme Court, from jurisdiction over all future cases arising from State laws or practices relating to "voluntary prayer, bible reading, or religious meetings in public schools or public buildings."

I am opposed to this court-stripping proposal.

As you know, in 1984, I opposed the administration's constitutional amendment authorizing audible, vocal prayer in our public schools. However, as an alternative to that proposal, I offered a silent prayer or silent reflection amendment.

The Dixon silent prayer or silent reflection amendment stated the following:

> Nothing in this Constitution shall be construed to prohibit individual or group silent prayer or silent reflection in public schools. No person shall be required by the United States or by any State to participate in such prayer or reflection. Neither the United States nor any State shall compose any prayer or encourage any particular form of prayer or reflection.

In addition, you may remember that the Dixon amendment would have permitted equal access to public schools by student voluntary religious groups. The provision was as follows:

> The authorization by the United States or any State of equal access to the use of public facilities by student voluntary religious groups shall not constitute an establishment of religion.

As you know, the Dixon amendment and the administration's proposal were rejected by the Senate. However, an equal access provision was enacted in the Education for Economic Security Act, Public Law 98-377, which I supported.

I believe that the 1984 Dixon silent prayer or silent reflection proposal was and is the correct approach for this Congress to take. As a lawyer, I hesitate to limit the Federal courts, including the Supreme Court, from reviewing a subject as important to this country as voluntary prayer in and equal access to our public schools.

Senator HATCH has proposed Senate Joint Resolution 2 which is currently pending in the Senate Judiciary Committee. It is very similar to the Dixon silent prayer or silent reflection proposal of 1984. Senate Joint Resolution 2 is a measure that I could support.

Mr. President, I will vote "yes" on a motion to table S. 47.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am strongly opposed to this legislation which would strip the Supreme Court of jurisdiction to review any State action relating to voluntary prayer in public schools.

It is an unconstitutional and unwarranted attack on the Supreme Court of the United States. The fundamental question we are facing in the Senate has nothing to do with the issue of school prayer. The sole question is whether the proper way for Congress to address the issue of school prayer is to enact legislation stripping the Supreme Court of jurisdiction to hear and decide cases on this issue. That is the wrong way to deal with the issue of school prayer, and I hope that the Senate will have the wisdom to reject this extremist attempt to deny the Supreme Court an important part of its constitutional jurisdiction.

This proposal is extraordinarily significant. It strikes at the core of the separation of powers enshrined in our Constitution. It is ironic that as we approach the bicentennial anniversary of the adoption of the U.S. Constitution on September 17, 1787, we are debating legislation that would undermine the carefully crafted checks and balances that are the genius of our Constitution.

This legislation would remove from the Supreme Court its constitutional authority to determine violations of the establishment clause. In place of the determination of fundamental constitutional protections for all U.S. citizens by one judicial body, the Supreme Court, this bill would substitute 50 different judgments by State courts on the subject of religious liberty, the cornerstone of our democracy. This result is anatheme to our constitutional form of Government and directly contrary to the intent of the framers.

Explaining the importance of the Federal judiciary, Alexander Hamilton wrote in the Federalist No. 80:

> . . . there ought always to be a constitutional method of giving efficacy to constitutional provisions. What, for instance, would avail restrictions on the authority of the State legislatures, without some constitutional mode of enforcing the observance of them? The States, by the plan of the convention, are prohibited from doing a variety of things, some of which are incompatible with the interest of the Union and others with the principles of good government. . . . No man of sense will believe that such prohibitions would be scrupulously regarded without some effectual power in the government to restrain or correct the infractions of them. This power must either be a direct negative on the State laws, or an authority in the federal courts to overrule such as might be in manifest contravention of the articles of Union. There is no third course that I can imagine. The latter appears to have been thought by the convention preferable to the former, and I presume will be most agreeable to the States.

. . . If there are such things as political axioms, the propriety of the judicial power of a government being coextensive with its legislative may be ranked among the number. The mere necessity of uniformity in the interpretation of the national laws decides the question. Thirteen independent courts of final jurisdiction over the same causes, arising upon the same laws, is a hydra in government from which nothing but contradition and confusion can proceed.

The judicial review by the Supreme Court of all fundamental constitutional issues envisioned by the framers has been the rule of law for nearly 200 years.

In 1961, in his first formal address as Attorney General of the United States, Robert Kennedy emphasized America's historic debt to law as the source of freedom:

He said:

Law is the link [to] freedom, we know that it is law which creates order out of chaos. And we know that law is the glue which holds civilization together.

The bill now before us is an attempt to break that bond. It is an attack on our basic freedoms. It is an insult to the Supreme Court and an affront to the Constitution. What is at stake is the preservation of the rule of law, the foundation on which all our other liberties rest.

There is no sound precedent for this scheme to abolish Supreme Court review of sensitive contitutional questions.

In the frequently cited case of ex parte McCardle in 1868, the Supreme Court acquiesced in congressional action removing one avenue of review in habeas corpus cases. But this legislation merely repealed a specific 1867 statute authorizing certain habeas corpus claims of unconstitutional imprisonment arising out of the Civil War to be appealed to the Supreme Court. As the Court made clear in its subsequent decision in ex parte Yerger in 1869, Congress had left intact the broad authority of the Supreme Court under the Judiciary Act of 1789 to review lower decisions on habeas corpus.

In a number of other circumstances, Congress has specified the particular methods by which judicial review can be sought. But Congress has never withdrawn the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to decide constitutional issues.

The authority of the Supreme Court to make the final determination of constitutional issues is vital to our constitutional system. The supremacy clause of article VI of the Constitution states:

This Constitution and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the Supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding.

The framers recognized that a single supreme judicial body with authority to review State laws was essential to effectuate the supremacy of the national Constitution.

In the Federalist No. 22, Hamilton writes:

A circumstance which crowns the defects of the Confederation remains yet to be mentioned—the want of a judiciary power. Laws are a dead letter without courts to expound and define their true meaning and operation. . . . To produce uniformity in these determinations, they ought to be submitted, in the last resort, to one SUPREME TRIBUNAL. . . . If there is in each State a court of final jurisdiction, there may be as many different final determinations on the same point as there are courts. There are endless diversities in the opinions of men. We often see not only different courts but the judges of the same court differing from each other. To avoid the confusion which would unavoidably result from the contradictory decisions of a number of independent judicatories, all nations have found it necessary to establish one court paramount to the rest, possessing a general superintendence and authorized to settle and declare in the last resort a uniform rule of civil justice.

This is the more necessary where the frame of the government is so compounded that the laws of the whole are in danger of being contravened by the laws of the parts. In this case, if the particular tribunals are vested with a right of ultimate jurisdiction, besides the contradictions to be expected from difference of opinion there will be much to fear from the bias of local views and prejudices and from the interference of local regulations. As often as such an interference was to happen, there would be reason to apprehend that the provisions of the particular laws might be preferred to those of the general laws; from the deference with which men in office naturally look up to that authority to which they owe their official existence.

As Hamilton observed, a constitutional right without a strong, independent judiciary to safeguard it is meaningless. Our constitutional freedoms have endured for nearly 200 years because the integrity of the checks and balances by the framers enshrined in the Constitution has not been undermined. Past efforts such as this proposal to overturn unpopular decisions of the Supreme Court by removing its jurisdiction in certain types of cases have been rebuffed. These schemes have failed because Congress and the American people saw the true danger in such schemes. If we strike at the Supreme Court, we strike at the heart of the Constitution and the rule of law in America. That is why the HELMS' court-stripping bill must be defeated.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I wll vote to table S. 47, the proposed Voluntary School Prayer Act of 1985. The issue before us is not whether students should be allowed to pray in public schools. The issue before us is whether the Congress should interfere with the balance of power established in the Constitution of the United States. When similar legislation was considered by the Senate in 1982 I voiced my strong opposition to any bill that would strip the Federal courts of jurisdiction to hear cases concerning constitutional issues. I said then that if the Senate approved the pending amendment stripping the Federal courts of jurisdiction over voluntary school prayer we would "* * * undermine the very integrity of the Constitution."

Legal scholars have long debated the question of whether article III of the Constitution grants the Congress authority to determine the jurisdiction of the Federal courts over constitutional issues such as whether prayer in public schools is permissible under the first amendment. Even assuming the Congress does have such constitutional authority, it would establish a dangerous precedent to withdraw jurisdiction from the Federal courts where we disagree wtih the Supreme Court's interpretation of the Consitution. If the Congress strips the Federal courts of jurisdiction over school prayer cases because we disagree with the Court's interpretation of the first amendment, then we open the door to a never-ending congressional attack on the U.S. Constitution.

Additionally, removing the jurisdiction of the Federal courts to review State court decisions interpreting the U.S. Constitution will create disparity between the States and our system of a Federal Government will be placed in jeopardy. Because the lower Federal courts and ultimately the Supreme Court will no longer have authority to review State court decisions interpreting the Constitution, the Constitution will mean something different in each of the 50 States. For example, the first amendment, which has always been considered to provide the most important freedoms and rights to Americans, will no longer provide the same protections to all Americans. Instead, the protections provided under the first amendment will vary depending on where we live. I do not believe this is what the framers of the Constitution had in mind when they provided in article III, section 1 that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time establish," or when they provided in article III, section 2 that the Congress may make exceptions and regulations to the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. Congressional authority to limit the jurisdiction of the Federal courts under article III must be balanced against other provisions in the Constitution such as the supremacy clause. Without the Supreme Court to act as the final arbiter of the meaning of the Constitution, the supremacy clause has no force.

Mr. President, I have supported constitutional and reasonable legislative efforts to address the issue of the rights of public school students to engage in religious activities. I voted for final passage of the Equal Access Act, which requires that whenever a public school permits noncurriculum-related student groups to meet on school premises during noninstructional time, it must provide equal access to school facilities to other groups regardless of the religious, political, philosophical, or other content of the speech at such meetings. However, I cannot support S. 47 because it will undermine the U.S. Constitution which is the foundation of our system of government.

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I rise in strong support of S. 47. As a matter of both principle and law, I believe that the Congress must act under article III of the Constitution to correct the injustice created by the Supreme Court's continuing misinterpretation of the first amendment. The Court's recent Wallace versus Jaffree decision outlawing silent prayer in public schools illustrates the need for action.

Mr. President, I have listened with a great sense of discomfort as several of my colleagues have presented their arguments in opposition to the bill. They have contended that the exceptions clause cannot be used to deprive the Supreme Court of appellate jurisdiction in cases involving fundamental constitutional rights. No such limitation is found, however, in the language of the clause nor in the Supreme Court's interpretations of it.

The specious character of the argument is illustrated best in the matter of school prayer. The establishment clause was intended to reserve to the States the question of the establishment of religion. It is only in this century that the Court has expanded its own power to regulate the conduct of the States with respect to the establishment of religion. In other words, the Court interpreted the 1st and 14th amendments in a manner not envisioned by the framers, and now Congress is asked to accept any Court interpretation, no matter how outlandish, as a fundamental constitutional guarantee.

Mr. President, it also bothers me to hear my colleagues warn that "the Constitution will die" if we limit the jurisdiction of the Federal courts. The use of the article III power to curb a wayward judicial branch would restore vitality to the notion that the elected representatives of the people, not judicial appointees, have the right and responsibility to interpret the Constitution in a reasonable and just manner. Many of my colleagues appear to avoid the underlying issue by hiding behind timid interpretations of congressional and Executive power. Those of us who favor restoration of the right to voluntary prayer in public schools will not fall for that ruse.

I urge all of my colleagues who support voluntary prayer to support S. 47.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, today I rise in strong opposition to S. 47.

As everyone in this body knows, S. 47 is designed to remove Supreme Court and lower Federal court jurisdiction over State cases involving voluntary school prayer.

The sponsors of S. 47 say it is simply a school prayer bill. They say it is only meant to correct incorrect Federal court decisions on the meaning of the Constitution's establishment clause.

But, Mr. President, S. 47 is something far more profound than that. In reality, it is a dangerous and fundamental assault on the independence of of Federal judiciary and the continued validity of the doctrine of separation of powers. It is a legislative attack that threatens to undermine the vital role the courts have traditionally played in the American system of constitutional government.

Mr. President, I began my public service in Congress at a time when another branch of Government—the Presidency—was embroiled in a serious crisis. As a member of the so-called "Watergate class" of 1974, I am proud to have participated in fashioning the sweeping post-Watergate reforms that included the Ethics in Government Act and the campaign finance laws.

But the real legacy of Watergate is that it demonstrated to all of us the wisdom of the framers of the Constitution. We saw the strength of a system of checks and balances that provided for a Presidential impeachment hearing in the House of Representatives. We witnessed the need for the total independence of the Federal judiciary that enabled it to reach its landmark decision in United States versus Nixon.

In sum, we saw that our Government could fully respond to a crisis of major proportions within the framework provided by the Constitution.

Today, people no longer seem as concerned by the threat of an "imperial Presidency." Instead, many Americans are concerned by the threat of an "imperial judiciary." They see the courts as exceeding their constitutional authority in numerous instances:

Courts have imposed mandatory busing orders on school systems.

Courts have stepped in to prevent States from requiring prayer in schools and from prohibiting abortions.

Courts have taken over the administration of State prisons and mental institutions.

I do not wish to argue about whether this picture of the judiciary is an accurate one. I am personally troubled by those judicial decisions that do not carefully and narrowly construe legislative intent. I am equally troubled by those decisions that impose solutions that look more like statutes than case law.

But I am here today because I believe there is a growing movement in this country to address perceived judicial abuses in a manner that is far more damaging than the abuses themselves. Members of the "new right" are proposing solutions, like S. 47, that present a much greater threat to our system of Government than any potential threat we face from our courts.

During the Watergate period, Congress and the courts were very careful to proceed within their constitutionally prescribed roles. Today, those in Congress attacking the "imperial judiciary" are paying little attention to the letter or spirit of the Constitution. They are asking this Nation to embrace solutions that would seriously undermine the essential function of the courts in the American system of Government.

OBJECTIVES OF COURTSTRIPPING PROPOSALS

The framers of the Constitution designed a judicial branch that could protect the integrity of the Constitution. They also designed a judiciary that could assure that individual liberties would not be abridged. Alexander Hamilton stated in Federalist Paper 78 that it is the duty of the courts "To declare all acts contrary to the manifest tenor of the Constitution void. Without this," he observed, "All reservations of particular rights or privileges would amount to nothing."

This concept of the judicial branch was reaffirmed and expanded in Marbury versus Madison. The decision declared the basic principle that the Federal judiciary is supreme in the exposition of the law of the Constitution. One hundred and fifty years later, in Cooper versus Aaron, the court observed that the principle of Marbury:

> Has ever since been respected by this court and the country as a permanent and indispensable feature of our constitutional system.

Until recently, the role of the Supreme Court as the final arbiter of the terms of the Constitution has not been seriously challenged. Throughout our Nation's history it has been recognized that an interpretation of the Constitution by the Supreme Court could only be altered by the Court itself or by a constitutional amendment.

On four different occasions during the past 200 years, our Nation has responded to controversial Supreme Court decisions by using the constitutional amendment process. Even in the wake of the infamous Dred Scott decision, which held that black Americans were not citizens, it was recognized that the proper way to alter the decision was by constitutional amendment. Abraham Lincoln, who profoundly disagreed with the ruling in Dred Scott, nevertheless emphasized the need for a stable constitutional structure. He commented:

> We think (the Supreme Court's) decisions on constitutional questions, when fully settled, should control, not only the particular cases decided, but the general policy of the country, subject to be disturbed only by amendments of the Constitution as provided in that instrument itself. More than this would be revolution.

But today, several single-issue constituencies have failed to mobilize sufficient support to pass constitutional amendments to overturn constitutional decisions with which they disagree. They have responded to this failure by advocating legislative measures, like S. 47, which would effectively "end-run" the requirements of a constitutional amendment.

Their proposals would permit Congress to circumvent Supreme Court decisions by simple statute. They would have Congress respond to a court ruling it disagreed with by stripping the courts of the power to hear that category of cases. And it is this constitutional shortcut that threatens to undermine the constitutional role of the judicial branch.

IMPACT ON THE CONSTITUTION

The proponents of S. 47 and other courtstripping bills argue that the exceptions clause of article III of the Constitution provides Congress with absolute authority to carve out holes in the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction. Perhaps that argument is consistent with the specific letter of the Constitution. But it is clearly inconsistent with a logical constitutional structure and the spirit of that document.

Under the analysis offered by the proponents of S. 47, Congress' power over the Supreme Court is without limit. According to their theory, Congress could dismantle any part of the Constitution it wanted and paralyze the Court from reviewing the conduct.

And that's what's most disturbing about court-stripping proposals. They would allow the Supreme Court to enforce only those constitutional guarantees that a majority in Congress said it could. They would thereby entrust to the most political branch of Government the responsibility for deciding which parts of the Constitution are of fundamental importance to all Americans and which are not.

Senator BARRY GOLDWATER, who is also an active opponent of court-stripping, has commented on this problem:

> What particularly troubles me about trying to override constitutional decisions of the Supreme Court by a simple bill is that I see no limit to the practice. There is no clear and coherent standard to define why we shall control the Court in one area but not another. The only criterion seems to be that whenever a momentary majority can be brought together in disagreement with a judicial action, it is fitting to control the Federal courts . . .

Mr. President, I share Senator GOLDWATER's concerns. I can't believe that this result was intended by the framers when they included the exceptions clause in article III.

We should also consider another consequence of court-stripping proposals. They would not remove constitutional issues from the Supreme Court and give them to Congress for interpretation and enforcement. Instead, they would turn those issues over to the court systems of 50 separate States. They would throw the principle of uniform constitutional interpretation out the window—and with it, the ability of the Constitution to serve as a meaningful national document.

We are one Nation with one Constitution. The first amendment should mean the same thing in Montana as it does in North Carolina. Our constitutional protections help to bind us a people.

Jurisdictional proposals, like S. 47, would allow Congress to undo that common bond by simple statute. Again, I can't believe the framers intended to give Congress that kind of power to undermine the spirit of the Constitution.

IMPACT ON THE COURTS

In the face of these legitimate and seemingly overwhelming constitutional concerns, court-stripping bills like S. 47 are still being actively considered in Congress. This is, in large part, because some Members of Congress believe the courts have blatantly violated their constitutional authority. They see these bills as part of an effort to get the courts back into line and encourage them to engage in more "traditional" and "stable" conduct.

However, it is difficult to imagine any set of proposals more inconsistent with the goals of stability or certainty in our judicial system than the court-stripping bills. No one, not even their proponents, really knows precisely what impact they would have on a specific body of law.

These bills could have precisely the opposite effect from what they are intended to have. For instance, withdrawing Federal court jurisdiction over school prayer would not necessarily return prayer to the public schools. In fact, it would be more likely to elevate the last Supreme Court decisions on the establishment clause to the "permanent" law of the land—to freeze the Court's most recent rulings for all time.

It is true, of course, that the Supreme Court would no longer be able to enforce its previous decisions. And the sponsors of these bills are counting on the State courts to jump headlong into the breach. The jurisdiction proposals are open invitations to State court judges to alter or reverse controlling Supreme Court precedent; otherwise, the bills would have no substantive impact.

The Conference of State Court Chief Justices has commented critically on this aspect of jurisdiction removal. Their 1982 resolution opposing court-stripping observed in part:

> These proposed statutes give the appearance of proceeding from the premise that State court judges will not honor their oath to obey the U.S. Constitution, nor their obligations to give full force to controlling Supreme Court precedents.

The simple fact is that court-stripping proposals like S. 47 would remove Federal court jurisdiction without offering State court judges any real indication of what standard they should follow in the future. Should they continue to feel bound by Supreme Court precedent, or should they accept the finding of the national Congress that the Supreme Court's rulings were incorrect?

I find it ironic that those who have been complaining the most about judicial usurpation of the legislative function are now promoting legislative solutions, devoid of any substantive direction, which would invite increased activism and disparate legal rulings.

IMPACT ON CONGRESS

The impact of jurisdiction bills on the Constitution and the judicial system has been underestimated. The same is true of the impact of these bills on Congress itself. If Congress decides to enter this arena, the pressure to respond to a wider range of constitutional rulings will increase. Every constituency that feels victimized by an adverse constitutional ruling will come running to Congress for a jurisdiction withdrawal bill.

The proponents of S. 47 and other court-stripping bills suggest these fears of congressional abuse are exaggerated. They argue that the jurisdiction bills each represent a narrow "surgical" removal of a limited area of jurisdiction.

But if Congress can remove Supreme Court jurisdiction over school prayer cases, why couldn't it pass stringent gun control legislation and include a provision to prevent Supreme Court review of any case involving the right to bear arms? Why couldn't Congress impose onerous and discriminatory taxes and include a provision to prevent Supreme Court review of the constitutionality of all Federal taxation cases? Why couldn't Congress attempt to totally preempt the States from engaging in conduct traditionally within their power and remove Supreme Court jurisdiction over the 10th amendment?

These hypotheticals are not farfetched. They are the reasonable and logical extension of the strategy put forward in S. 47. And they should be carefully considered before Congress sets the precedent of court-stripping.

The question presented by S. 47 and other court-stripping proposals is simply this: Should we adopt measures that violate the spirit of the Constitution in order to address today's controversial political issues?

That was the same question that faced Congress in 1937 when President Roosevelt proposed to increase the size of the Supreme Court.

President Roosevelt was deeply troubled by a series of Supreme Court decisions that threatened the success of his national recovery program. He hoped to alter the composition of the Court so that the Court would uphold the constitutionality of his economic plan.

The people and Congress rose up and resoundingly defeated that plan. The American public and a majority of its representatives saw the "court-packing" plan for what it was—a significant threat to the independence of the judicial branch.

As we consider the court-stripping bill before us now, we should keep in mind the wise words of those who successfully defended the Supreme Court in 1937. Senator Burton K. Wheeler was one of those defenders, and his words apply with equal force today:

> So I say it is morally wrong to do by indirection what cannot be done by direction. It is morally wrong to change the Constitution by coercive interpretation. . . . Of course, Mr. President, there have been abuses in the Court. I have been one who has disagreed with them, and I expect to disagree with them again, but I am unwilling on the basis of some specious argument or of some subterfuge that defies the spirit of the Constitution to participate in setting one of the most dangerous precedents that has ever been conceived by this Congress or any other. . . .

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I want to thank Senator HELMS for pursuing the issue of voluntary prayer in public schools through statutory modifications. I fully support the right of citizens to pray in the public schools.

I have cosponsored a constitutional amendment to allow this right. However, in the past, both measures have been unsuccessful.

I, generally, oppose court stripping legislation. However, since this may be my only opportunity to vote on the exercise of the rights to pray in school, I must vote against the motion to table S. 47 so that the bill can proceed and be heard on the merits.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, 200 years ago, the Founding Fathers of this Nation set forth principles upon which our democracy is founded. One of the most important and fundamental of those principles, embodied in our Constitution, is the system of checks and balances between the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of Government. It is our system of checks and balances which has made American democracy unique in all the world, and which has provided us with a firm protection against tyranny and the abuse of power. We need only look back as far as the events of Watergate to see how effectively this system has worked to protect American democracy.

Today, Mr. President, our system of checks and balances and the integrity of our courts are under attack. The legislation which is proposed today would strip the U.S. Supreme Court, and the Federal district courts, of any jurisdiction over cases and questions involving so-called voluntary school prayer. Of course, the effects of this legislation would not be limited to cases involving school prayer. This legislation is an assault on the integrity of our court system, and an assault on the fundamental principles of American democracy.

The sponsors of this legislation have labeled their bill the "Voluntary School Prayer Act of 1985." A better, and more accurate, title would be the "Anti-Judiciary Act of 1985." What do the sponsors of this legislation have against our judiciary? The Constitution already provides a mechanism for the changes they seek. That procedure requires a two-thirds vote of approval by the Congress, and ratification by the States. The sponsors of this legislation have not followed that constitutional procedure. Instead, they have tried to sneak around the back way and pass this court-stripping bill under the guise of a so-called school prayer amendment, requiring only a simple majority vote. Their real purpose of this bill is not to permit Americans to pray—they can already do that without the interference of government—but its purpose is to strip the courts jurisdiction over all issues where their social agenda does not coincide with the U.S. Constitution.

Mr. President, if we were to pass this so-called school prayer bill today, tomorrow we would see the far right introducing legislation to strip the courts of jurisdiction over many other issues. This bill is the first step down a road that leads to the erosion and eventual destruction of the democratic values which have made this Nation great.

Mr. President, one other point needs to be mentioned in this discussion. Over 200 years ago, Thomas Jefferson wrote that the American system of democracy is based upon a "wall of separation between church and state." For two centuries that wall has stood firm, upholding the rights of freedom and religious liberty, free from governmental interference, that all Americans enjoy. Today, the far right seeks to tear down the wall of separation and to attack the principles which Thomas Jefferson espoused. They seek to extend governmental intrusion into the most private and sensitive areas of our lives, by forcing so-called voluntary school prayer into the public school classrooms of our children. Mr. President, I support prayer and the constitutional right of every American to private prayer. But support the bill is not the way to address private prayer. Sometimes the proponents of this legislation are carried away with personal belief that America is a Christian nation. They would like to do what is expressly forbidden by the establishment clause of the U.S. Constitution—that is, to establish an official religion in this country. This so-called voluntary school prayer amendment is only a first step in that direction.

Mr. President, I hope the legislation before us today, or measures like it, may never become law. But what concerns me even more is the fact that some are willing to erode our Constitution, our freedoms, and our democratic system. Perhaps at such times we would do well to remember the words of a great American jurist, Judge Learned Hand:

> Liberty lies in the hearts of men and women; when it dies there, no constitution, no law, no court can save it.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, the bill before the Senate today, S. 47, is simply the latest step in a sustained effort during the last several Congresses to restrict the remedial powers or the jurisdiction of Federal courts.

I have opposed such jurisdictional and remedial limitations in the past; I oppose such limitations today, and I will continue to oppose them in the future. They are, in my opinion, contrary to the letter and to the spirit of the Constitution and, beyond that, they are unwise as a matter of public policy.

This is certainly not the first time court curbing has been a hot topic in America. In fact, it goes back to at least 1793, when the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in the case of Chisholm against Georgia. That decision raised a hue and cry of dreadful proportions. One newspaper said it "involved more danger to the liberties of America than the claims of the British Parliament to tax us without our consent." The Georgia House of Representatives reacted even more violently. It passed a bill providing that anyone who executed any process issued in the case would be "guilty of a felony, and shall suffer death, without benefit of clergy, by being hanged." Fortunately for the citizens of Georgia, that bill died in the Georgia Senate.

The Chisholm decision was in fact overturned, in 1798, but it was done according to the procedures specified in article V of the Constitution. It was overturned by the adoption of the 11th amendment to the Constitution. Since then literally hundreds of legislative proposals have been introduced in Congress and in Senate legislatures to counteract controversial court decisions or to preclude unwanted judicial pronouncements. Often such proposals are made through the constitutionally proscribed method under article V. All too frequently however, proponents of a change in constitutional law try to achieve the effect of a constitutional amendment through the back door. S. 47 is such a back door approach.

In hearings before the subcommittees of both House and Senate Judiciary Committees during the 97th Congress, the overwhelming majority of legal scholars urged Congress not to enact any of these court jurisdiction proposals. The same arguments apply to this bill.

S. 47 is objectionable for many reasons, but one of its flaws stands out. It is wholly inconsistent with the clear and unambiguous language of article V of the Constitution which sets forth the constitutionally permissible means of amending our organic law.

To be sure, the Founding Fathers realized that constitutional changes would be needed periodically. They wanted the procedures for amending the Constitution to be more flexible than those in the Articles of Confederation, which required the unanimous agreement of the States. But they did not want to make the process too easy. Only after lengthy debate was a compromise struck that, in the words of James Madison:

> Guards equally against that extreme facility, which would render the Constitution too mutable; and the extreme difficulty, which might perpetuate its discovered faults.

This amendatory procedure set forth in article V of the Constitution was designed specifically to deal with the types of changes in the Constitution—in this case, a change in the establishment clause of the first amendment—sought by the proponents of S. 47. But it would be a mistake to substitute congressional legislation for the carefully crafted procedures set forth in article V.

I oppose the substantive change that would be accomplished by enactment of S. 47. The goal of this legislation is to disrupt the carefully crafted relationship between church and state that has served our Nation well for nearly two centuries. By separating government and religion, we have bolstered the legitimacy of civil authority while we have nurtured an unparalleled diversity of religious expression among our people. When proposals to weaken the establishment clause of the first amendment have been presented in the proper form, as amendments to the Constitution, I have opposed them. In this case, however, the proposal before us is fatally flawed in form as well as in content, because it attempts to alter the commands of the Constitution by simple statute.

With all due respect to my colleagues in the Senate, I side with our Founding Fathers on how to go about altering our organic law. Their approach has stood the test of time and has served us well. It should be conserved.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I am pleased to support S. 47, the school prayer legislation offered by my friend, Senator HELMS. The essence of this bill is to remove the further consideration of religious matters from the purview of Federal bureaucrats and politicians, to return them to the States, and to the people themselves.

Mr. President, this country was founded on prayer, by God-fearing people who knew they must preserve prayer. Many good points have been made regarding the intentions of our Founding Fathers. It is true that the framers of this Nation were unabashedly religious. They saw Divine Providence at the heart of everything they did, and their daily affairs were motivated by and in consonance with their religious convictions. The Founders intentionally omitted references to organized religion in order to keep their new Government from becoming entangled with any one church or denomination. They knew first hand the dangers of religious factionalism, and the injustices of official religious persecution that were suffered even at the hands of colonial authorities.

Nevertheless, the Founding Fathers never intended to remove religion from the hearts of those who govern, and certainly not from the lives of our schoolchildren.

Further, I happen to agree with many that we need to demonstrate to our young that we consider religion sufficiently important to insist upon the right to pray. We want them to act morally, but will not do so ourselves. We will not limit pornography, but we will limit prayer. We cannot see the need to curtail the violence and explicit sexual conduct on television, but we will prohibit prayer in our schools.

I, for one, see a clear conflict of purpose between preventing established religion and the de-facto establishment of functional atheism in the lives of our children.

Recent court actions have more than adequately protected the nonreligious sector of our society, but at the same time have clearly restricted religious activity.

While the lack of religious beliefs by certain groups is their right, I do not believe that their views should set the norm for the rest of this Nation.

Our Nation was formed by moral and religious beliefs. To allow the continued erosion of this important part of our heritage would be to undercut the raising of our children and would jeopardize the strength of our Nation and society.

No one's beliefs—religious or otherwise—are jeopardized by this prayer amendment. One characteristic of American religious freedom is its capacity to allow not only a clear and unhindered choice between a wide variety of religious expressions, but also that it allows for an unfettered and unthreatened choice between religion and no religion. We may believe what we choose.

However, as a result of well-meaning, but wrong decisions by judicial officers, our country is now subjected to an improper policy in the name of religious impartiality. Free exercise of religion has been sacrificed in favor of free exercise for the nonreligious. On this basis, our courts have moved to disallow religious prayer by those who, by virtue of their youth, are in school.

I object to this state of affairs, but it is not simply to reverse this trend that I support S. 47.

This bill is a moderate approach in addressing this problem. Its essence is to allow for freedom of choice and local control.

S. 47 cannot and will not put prayer into—or back into—anything. It will not require prayer, silent or otherwise, in any classroom. It will not require or allow the reading of the Bible or Koran anywhere. It will not establish any form of acceptable theology or spiritual practice for anyone, anywhere.

What this bill will do is remove the further consideration of this issue from the Federal level. The individual States and local school districts will once again be empowered to decide the question of religious conduct in their own schools.

I realize that some discretion may be expected on the part of school officials in the interpretation of any statute. I realize, also, that individual circumstances may present a very fine line between legitimate religious exercise and simple disruption. There are effective means, however, to deal with individual excesses on the local level, without enforcing universal criteria on a national level.

Why not place our trust in the hands of those close enough to the issue to deal responsibly with it? Have we completely lost our respect for—and trust in—the American character and sense of fair play that has made us the great Nation we are today? Must Congress continue to be embroiled in the daily moral affairs of the American people?

I think it is very important to reemphasize that this amendment will not require anyone to participate in any prayer or religious exercise. It will not require school boards or other State and local government agencies to permit students to pray in school. It will simply remove present obstacles which prohibit voluntary prayer nationwide. If States or school boards want to exclude prayer from their schools, they will be as free to do so as they are now. But they will also be free to permit voluntary prayer—a choice they do not have today.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, this act would remove from the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court and the district courts cases involving prayer, Bible reading, and religious meetings in the public schools. Despite the obvious religious and educational ramifications of this bill, the central issue here does not fall in either of these areas. What we are really considering here is a constitutional issue: whether or not Congress should be allowed to upset the delicate balance of power which lies at the heart of our political and legal institutions.

In stripping the Supreme Court and district courts of their jurisdiction over school prayer and religious activities in the schools, the bill attempts to circumvent the first amendment's enjoinder against laws respecting establishment of religion. I believe that the only proper and legal way to protect school prayer is to amend the Constitution, not to build an artificial, extraconstitutional shield, which is what this legislation would do.

As the forum for redress of legal grievances and the ultimate authority on interpretation of the law, the Federal judiciary has served as an independent and equal arm of our democratic system. I am opposed to the kind of court stripping called for by this bill, which is nothing more than an attempt to work around the American legal system's established channels for settlement of disputes. It is a means of protecting certain questions from the purview of the Federal courts, which have always provided a necessary counterbalance to the other two branches of Government.

By denying all Federal courts jurisdiction over certain kinds of cases, this legislation would effectively exempt certain laws from constitutional interpretation. Only by amending the Constitution may Congress grant permanent protection to certain important principles. This act attempts to create a shortcut alternative to the amending process. In so doing, it poses a serious danger to the separation of powers that has given a strong measure of equilibrium and fairness to our legal and political system for almost 200 years.

This is not the first time that court stripping has been the subject of debate here, and many of this country's most respected legal authorities have strongly opposed it as unconstitutional. These include the American Bar Association, the Conference of Chief Justices, the National Bar Association, the Federal Bar Association, the American College of Trial Lawyers, and 55 deans of leading law schools.

This act would set a dangerous precedent of special, congressionally granted exemptions for certain classes of legal actions. As some of our country's most respected legal scholars have argued, there is only one way to achieve the ends sought by this act—through constitutional amendment. Constitutional amendments regarding school prayer have come before this body in the past, and undoubtedly we will consider these kinds of measures again. That will be the appropriate time to deal with the merits of establishing organized school prayer. This legislation addresses the issue in a manner which represents an abuse of the powers of this body. I urge my colleagues to oppose its passage.

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, today we are voting on whether or not children will be granted religious freedom in public schools. Starting in 1962, the Supreme Court has consistently overturned the laws of the majority of States and worked to curtail voluntary religious expression in the classroom. Unfortunately, there are no indications that this trend of hostility toward religious freedom is going to abate. Congress must act to change this tendency of the Court to legislate rather than interpret the Constitution.

In December 1984, the Supreme Court took up another case dealing with school prayer. The case, Wallace versus Jaffree, presented the Justices with the opportunity to return religious freedom to schools. Those in Congress, parents across the country, and others held their breath. Perhaps this would be the long-awaited return of the pendulum back to a historical interpretation of the amendment.

Unfortunately, instead of moving back to the direction established by our Founding Fathers, the Supreme Court restricted our intended religious freedoms even further by ruling in opposition to a moment of silence in the classroom.

The case involved an Alabama law which allowed their public classrooms to start the day with a moment of silence. The authorizing legislation indicated this moment was "for meditation or voluntary prayer." The State law did not require a school system to practice such a moment of silence, nor did it require the moment be used for prayer. It was simply a statute which allowed for freedom of expression, albeit in silence, in the public classroom. Children with a religious orientation could pray. Children who wanted to think about something else could do so.

The Supreme Court held that this law establishes a religion because it mentions prayer as one possible activity during the period of silence. It is inconceivable to me that anyone could believe that mentioning prayer as an option for schoolchildren poses the threat of establishing a State religion. This does not rate as an endorsement of religion any more than mentioning meditation as one possible activity means that Alabama is endorsing meditation as a way of life for their schoolchildren.

Rather than protecting our religious freedom or even maintaining a "neutral stance" as they have asserted, I believe that this Supreme Court ruling and the others on this subject have demonstrated a hostility toward religion. They have moved this country from religious freedom to the prohibition of voluntary vocal prayers, and now to prohibiting silence that might be used for prayer in the classroom.

Given this dismal record on school prayer issues and the outlook for the future, I believe it is time to send a strong signal to the Justices through congressional action. Congress should be a reflection of America's commitment to seeing religious freedom preserved as intended by our forefathers.

When the Supreme Court ruled that vocal voluntary prayer in public schools was prohibited, they reversed the laws of over 40 States which permitted it in their classrooms. Now, in ruling that a moment of silence for prayer or meditation is unconstitutional, they have rolled over the legislative bodies of 24 States which allowed a moment of silence. Public opinion polls show that over three-quarters of the American public support voluntary prayer in public schools. The Senate has voted on this issue before and found that a majority of Senators are in support of voluntary prayer in public schools. How long will it take before the Supreme Court stops making public policy rather than interpreting the Constitution?

I support S. 47 because it would return the option to States to have voluntary prayer in their schools. But, I also cast my vote as a signal of my strong disagreement—and that of my constituents—with the U.S. Supreme Court's rulings which are moving us toward an increasingly secular society. I do not support the Government mandating participation in religious activities. I also do not support the Government prohibiting participation in religious activities. In other words, I support true freedom of religion, and not the current interpretation by the Court. I would hope that the Justices would apply both clauses of the first amendment, which says, "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." Today we can move back to the balance that our forefathers intended.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, the measure before us today does not deserve to be enacted. It embodies a profoundly mistaken approach to its goal. Were it to succeed, it would undermine the independence of our judiciary.

This bill is not, as its sponsors claim, a straightforward effort to modify one aspect of the Supreme Court's jurisdiction. It is an attempt to overturn by legislation the Supreme Court's decisions on matters of constitutional law.

The bill is based on an extremely broad interpretation of article III of the Constitution. Proponents of this bill claim that article III confers upon Congress an ability to define the content and reach of constitutional rights directly.

I do not find this claim persuasive. The congressional power to enforce constitutional protections is not identical to the fundamental power to define them. Yet this bill rests on precisely such a confusion.

Since the earliest days of our Government, the Supreme Court has been the final arbiter of constitutional meaning. To the Court alone is granted the power of defining constitutional rights and guarantees. To the Congress is granted the authority to enforce them.

This bill would move us beyond that authority. It would create a congressional right to choose which constitutional rights shall enjoy the full protections of the courts and which shall not.

The Constitution grants us no authority to make such choices. So I oppose this bill on the most fundamental grounds: it is unconstitutional.

As a practical matter, this bill is nothing more than an effort to alter by legislative majority a constitutional judgment of which the proponents disapprove.

Such efforts by Congress and the Executive to control the judiciary are not new.

In the early 1900's, when the Supreme Court was routinely striking down progressive social legislation, bills were introduced to abolish "the Supreme Court's power to pass upon the constitutionality of statutes."

Later, in the 1930's, when Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal programs met resistance in the Supreme Court, he sought to pack the Court to guarantee a Court majority favoring his policies.

In the 1950's, when the Federal courts attempted to curb the witchhunting activities of Senator McCarthy, a bill was proposed to prohibit the Federal judiciary from ruling on any statutory or agency action aimed at alleged subversives.

All these efforts have one feature in common: They represented a desire to impose a political preference on the judgments of an independent judiciary.

And fortunately for our Nation, these efforts have just one more thing in common: They failed and that is a good thing because they deserved to fail.

Today's effort differs not at all from those which came before in either its inspiration or its effects. And like those earlier attempts, it too deserves to fail.

It deserves to fail on the very practical ground that it would disrupt the uniformity of Federal constitutional interpretation. The first amendment should offer the same protections in one State as in another.

To permit the courts of the 50 States to set different interpretations of constitutional terms—whether of first amendment terms or any other—would permit, if not invite, the destruction of the Constitution as a meaningful national document.

The ultimate safeguard in our system of government is the independence of our judiciary from political control. Although this bill strikes at just one issue on which the Court's rulings are controversial, its effect would be no less than to undermine that independence. In so doing, it would strike at the separation of powers which has safeguarded our people against an overweening government for over 200 years.

It has been my privilege to serve in all three branches of this system—in the executive branch as a U.S. attorney; in the judiciary, as a Federal district court judge; and now in the legislative branch as a Senator representing Maine. I have learned on a firsthand basis that each branch has a different responsibility, and that each is necessary to make our constitutional system work.

It is only the judiciary, however, that is not—and should not be—responsive to an electoral constituency. A significant role of the independent judiciary is to protect the constitutional rights of individuals, of minorities, of our system of democratic procedures itself, even in the face of systematic political attack.

For Congress to limit the breadth of issues with which Federal courts can deal would undermine that independence.

Adoption of this bill would be to adopt the principle that the judiciary's ability to protect constitutional rights can be overruled by a simple majority of the Congress. But if Congress can determine what rights may be reviewed, Congress can effectively decide what rights exist.

This would be a profoundly radical reordering of our system. It would leave the judiciary to operate at the sufferance of the legislative majority, subject to having its powers limited at any time on any issue on which a politically or socially unpopular decision was reached.

Although such a result might make a political majority or a politically influential minority happy at the immediate outcome, it would pose no less a potential threat to its supporters than to its immediate opponents, for it would eliminate the protections that both supporters and opponents of this bill depend upon when other issues arise.

There is a constitutional method available to alter the outcome of a Court ruling when a Court ruling offends sufficiently strongly a substantial majority of our people.

That is the route of the constitutional amendment, not the back-door method of denying to the Supreme Court its fundamental authority to rule on the meaning and application of the Constitution.

The court-stripping bill before us today responds to the desire of some to short-cut that amendment process to rectify one currently-felt shortcoming in our society.

Those people share a common and mistaken perception that the independence of the judiciary is an obstacle to a higher good.

The anchor of our system remains the separate and independent judicial system, acting on statutes devised by an elected, responsive legislature, and carried out by an elected, responsive Executive. Without that anchor, the Constitution would, indeed, be all sail. Our Government—and our liberties—could be blown hither and yon by the partisan, fleeting demands of temporary majorities.

To respond to temporary dissatisfactions by taking apart the careful structure of checks and balances in our Government would be to provoke a constitutional crisis which our dissatisfaction does not warrant and for which the remedy would be more destructive than the problem.

Those who advocate such a change ignore, as they should not, the connection between methods and goals.

Ours is not a society that believes that all means are valid in pursuit of desirable goals. Rather, our society is based on the principle that some means are never acceptable, no matter what the goal.

The issue at stake in this bill is highly controversial. But even if there were broader and more general agreement upon it, the question is not the goal of the bill. It is the means by which that goal is sought.

Can any socially desirable goal—regardless what it is—take precedence over the fundamental law of the land? Can we strengthen our society if we weaken the ability of our institutions to apply the law in practice?

Our Constitution recognizes the fact that government, law and justice will be administered by human beings. It takes account of the fact that human beings are often short-sighted, often mistaken, often profoundly wrong.

The men and women who preside over our courtrooms reflect their society and their century. They are the products of contemporary experience. And it is for that reason that our courts are insulated from popular passions, from electoral returns, from political swings to left or right. Our system seeks to limit the extent to which human prejudice is systematically imposed on society.

Our courts are insulated from popular feelings for reasons which should be all too clear to anyone familiar with the judicial horrors of our century. We need only recall the Soviet courts, which recognize such crimes as "wrecking" the Soviet economy, or "anti-Soviet slander", or "malicious hooliganism". We have only to remember the despicable and infamous Nazi courts of the 1930's which swept away 200 years of German civilization with the implementation of the Nuremberg racial laws.

Those misapplications of law are not ancient history. They did not occur in the dim reaches of time, before human rights and liberties were enunciated, before there was a body of social thought which defined and defended the value of the individual. Those perversions of justice occurred in this enlightened century—they are still occurring. They occur within our lifetimes, and they were and are carried out by individuals who were willing to place an immediate social goal above the integrity of the law itself.

If we permit our temporary passions to override our permanent interest in maintaining the primacy of law, we will have done more than make a minor modification in the application of article III. We will have taken a dangerous step in the direction of undermining the integrity of our courts. We will have created a precedent here, in the United States, whose consequences can be read in the histories of other nations swept by popular passions.

We can never remind ourselves too often that the popular view today may be anathema to the next generation.

Legislatures can be mistaken. Presidents can be mistaken. Individual judges can be mistaken. The permanent bulwark of an independent judiciary is our protection against the institutionalization of such human error. It is our major shield against the legalization of prejudices, of fleeting passions, of irrational hopes and unreasonable fears.

Those who would tamper with that bulwark not only do a disservice to their contemporaries; they undermine the protections their own children will inherit. For the sake of their children and ours, they cannot be permitted to succeed.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, while I support the right of schoolchildren to participate in voluntary prayer in our public schools, I am unable to support the measure currently before the Senate. Although one of the stated goals of the Voluntary School Prayer Act of 1985 is "[t]o restore the right of voluntary prayer in public schools," the bill would achieve its goal by divesting the Federal courts of their power to review State statutes regarding a variety of religious activities in public buildings. The goal is admirable, one I have long supported, yet the methods the bill would employ to achieve those goals could lead to an erosion of the constitutional protection of freedom of religion rather than strengthening it.

The issue here is not school prayer. If that were the issue, I would lend my wholehearted support, as I have in the past. Over the past several decades, the Federal courts have been engaged in a persistent attack on the right of children to pray in school. The rulings of various Federal courts in recent years which have invalidated State laws establishing a moment of silence for prayer or a period of voluntary prayer in public schools are distressing. The actions of various school officials in response to such rulings, such as denying student organizations meeting space in public schools where the purposes of the meetings are religious, show that such rulings do not protect freedom of religion, but rather create a climate of hostility toward religious activity by public officials.

There has been a good deal of debate on whether Congress has the power to enact a law such as the one before us. I believe that it does under article III of the Constitution. I have supported similar measures to address abuses by the courts in the past, primarily in the area of busing. Yet I cannot support this measure because I believe it will lead to an erosion in the constitutional protection of freedom of religion.

It is precisely because I desire to protect the rights of every individual to worship freely that I oppose this bill. The issue is whether we shall protect the right of each individual to worship—or not worship—the God of his or her choice. Under this bill, each State could determine its own policy on religion based on the will of the majority in that State. This bill would deprive the Federal courts of the ability to protect the rights of religious minorities by divesting the Supreme Court and all the lower Federal courts of their jurisdiction to review State statutes regarding a wide range of religious activity. Thus, it would prevent the Federal courts from remedying even the most egregious abuses of the separation of church and state, such as where the majority deprives the minority of the right to practice the religion of its choice. This sweeping away of the protection of our Federal courts will not enhance religious freedom, but rather will greatly endanger it.

In closing, let me reiterate that the issue is not whether children should be allowed to pray in school, but rather whether our judicial system will be available to protect against the establishment of one particular religion in a position of preference as compared to others. Freedom of religion is a Federal right and it should be protected by the Federal courts. I, therefore, oppose this measure.

VOLUNTARY SCHOOL PRAYER ACT OF 1985

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that the Senate turn to the consideration of S. 47, school prayer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 47) to restore the right of voluntary prayer in public schools and to promote the separation of powers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to vote without any intervening action on the motion to table S. 47 on school prayer unamended and that paragraph 4 of rule XII be waived.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. QUAYLE). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SIMPSON. I yield to my fine colleague from Connecticut.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I inquire of the assistant majority leader as to whether or not he and also my good friend from North Carolina are suggesting that we proceed to my motion to table immediately? There are those who desire to speak. I do not intend to try to cut off anybody.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, on behalf of the leadership, it is our intent to do it immediately.

Mr. WEICKER. I feel rather passionately on this subject. Indeed, I might add at least it will give it the dignity it should have as a freestanding issue rather than being tacked on to the Small Business Administration authorization bill.

Mr. President, this is not the first time the U.S. Senate has been asked to put itself on record regarding prayer in the public schools and it surely will not be the last.

But we have reached a new stage in this debate and we should be clear what is being asked by this latest incarnation of school prayer in S. 47.

The stakes have been substantially raised in this debate. I have made no secret of my strongly held belief that instituting group religious practice of any kind in the public schools is a denigration of the Constitution.

Mr. President, this goes beyond denigration. It represents destruction of the separation of powers that makes our system unique in the governments of men. Why should citizens of the United States settle for two rather than three separate but equal branches?

Perhaps because S. 47 refers so directly to an issue considered critical by the framers of the Constitution, it has aroused the opposition of not only the Nation's major religious organizations, but also the president of the American Bar Association and former Attorney General William French Smith, among others.

It's no wonder, Mr. President, that legal scholars, despite their political dispositions and however they differ over personnel on the Federal bench, agree that Congress should never be allowed to prescribe the substance to come before that bench.

That is the essence of this legislation, court stripping, a blatant attempt to usurp the role of the Supreme Court and the Federal courts.

Where do we stop should this become law? Federal laws that protect the handicapped are considered a costly nuisance by some in our society, so are those protecting minorities or the rights of those imprisoned. Do we then consider stripping Federal judicial authority over the equal protection guarantees from Federal statutes and the 14th amendment? Should first amendment protections of the free press be left to the vagaries of State courts every time a powerful judge or politician is embarrassed in the newspaper?

As to the secondary issue at stake in this bill, school prayer, the Senate spoke on this matter during the last Congress. A constitutional amendment on this matter fell short of the required two-thirds majority by 11 votes.

As I said, Mr President, the Senate spoke last year but the Constitution spoke to the matter more than 200 years ago. Anyone has a right to pray at any time anywhere in this Nation. And the right not to pray. These rights should not be diminished by Congress and they will not be if we leave the Constitution alone.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. President, I appreciate the cooperation of my friend from Connecticut and all other Senators in this connection.

We have debated this issue since I came to the Senate, and I appreciate the opportunity for the Senate to have a free-standing vote on this subject. I am prepared to vote.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I do not want to delay a vote. I want to find out from the acting leader what the situation is.

Are we having an extended vote because some people have to leave and some people are arriving? I have a few remarks I would like to make, but I do not know what previous arrangements have been made.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, the leadership is indicating that several Members on both sides of the aisle are pressed for previous commitments; and if the vote can be held as soon as possible, those commitments can be met.

To accommodate the Members on both sides of the aisle, we will extend the vote from 15 minutes to some longer period, until the Members have voted. That is the intent—to get to it immediately, if at all possible.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I move to table S. 47, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to table. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. EAST] is necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK] is necessarily absent.

I also announce that if present and voting the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK] would have voted "yea."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 62, nays 36, as follows:

[Rollcall Vote No. 172 Leg.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRASSLEY). Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE DEATH OF FORMER SENATOR HUEY LONG

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, it was on this day 50 years ago that my father, the late Huey Long, a Senator from Louisiana, died in Baton Rouge. There have been many articles written and much speculation concerning his death.

I concluded, Mr. President, that it is appropriate to place into the RECORD a document which I believe provides the information that most students of this question would like to have. It is a transcript taken before the coroner's inquest held on Dr. Carl Austin Weiss, Jr., and conducted by Dr. Thomas B. Bird, coroner of the parish of East Baton Rouge on September 9 and 16, 1935, in the city of Baton Rouge.

Mr. President, in the course of this transcript, there were five witnesses who said that they personally saw Dr. Weiss shoot Huey Long.

One was John Fournet, who was a Justice on the Supreme Court and who later served with distinction as Chief Justice on the Supreme Court, elected and reelected.

Another was Mr. Lawrence Wimberly, a State representative from north

Louisiana, who served for many years with distinction in the State legislature.

Another was Murphy Roden, who, in my judgment, was one of the best policemen who ever served the State of Louisiana and in later years served in other important positions, such as head of the State police in Louisiana under a subsequent administration, and who also had an important appointment in the armed services in World War II.

Another was Mr. Paul Voitier, who I had the privilege of knowing personally, who had no reason to tell anything other than the truth as he knew it.

All of these persons were willing to accept the responsibility of testifying before the coroner's inquiry.

Another witness was Mr. C.A. Riddle, and we called him Ad Riddle, as I recall it, who was a State representative at the time from Avoyelles Parish.

Mr. President, I knew these people and in my judgment these people told the truth.

There is another witness to this matter who did not see the actual shooting of my father. He saw what happened immediately after. That man was Mr. Frampton, who was a reporter for many years. I believe he was working in the Governor's office at the time this matter happened. His statement corroborates what the other five eye witnesses said.

I know there are some who would say that these witnesses who testified all had one thing in common, that they all were Huey Long supporters, overall friends of Huey Long in one respect or another. One could say they would not believe anybody who was a friend of Huey Long even though they could be a Supreme Court judge. But that, to me, does not make too much sense, Mr. President.

I ask unanimous consent that this transcript of the coroner's inquest discussing this event be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the transcript was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Transcript of Testimony taken before the Coroner's Inquest held over the Body of Dr. Carl Austin Weiss, Jr., and conducted by Dr. Thomas B. Bird, Coroner of the Parish of East Baton Rouge, on September 9 and 16, 1935, in the City of Baton Rouge, LA]

STATE OF LOUISIANA, PARISH OF EAST BATON ROUGE

Before me, the undersigned authority, Lemuel C. Parker, a Notary Public, duly commissioned and qualified in and for the Parish and State aforesaid, personally came and appeared: Glenn S. Darsey, well and personally known to me, who, after being duly sworn, did depose and say:

That his name is Glenn S. Darsey; that he is a duly licensed and practicing attorney of the Bar of Baton Rouge, Louisiana, and a Notary Public in and for the Parish of East Baton Rouge, Louisiana, duly commissioned and qualified; that on the dates of September 9 and 16, 1935, he was the duly appointed and qualified Deputy Clerk of Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District Court of the State of Louisiana, in and for the Parish of East Baton Rouge, and official Court Reporter of said Court; that, on the dates aforesaid, he reported the testimony taken before the Coroner's Inquest held over the body of Dr. Carl Austin Weiss, Jr., and conducted by Dr. Thomas B. Bird, Coroner of the Parish of East Baton Rouge, on September 9 and 16, 1935, in the City of Baton Rouge, Louisiana; and that he does now, hereby and herewith, certify that the foregoing seventy-two (72) pages represent a true and correct transcript of said testimony.

GLENN S. DARSEY.

Sworn to and subscribed before me, aforesaid Notary Public, at Baton Rouge, Louisiana, on this 5th day of May, A.D., 1949.

LEMUEL C. PARKER,
Notary Public.

Dr. BIRD: The body of C.A. Weiss was examined by the Coroner and Jury. We found thirty bullet openings on the front of the body and twenty-nine on the back and two of the head, one penetrating the left eye and making its exit through the left ear; and other going through the tip of the nose and grazing the face. The body wounds, it was impossible to tell which were wounds of entrance and which wounds of exit there were so many in every direction.

Two bullets were recovered, one a .38 caliber and one a .45 caliber; they were just found under the skin.

Mr. E. Prampton called as a witness, being first duly sworn by the Coroner, testified as follows:

By Mr. Odom:

Q. Just narrate exactly what you saw immediately preceding the shooting at the Capitol last night. Describe in detail everything you did see.

A. Just immediately preceding the shooting I talked with Senator Long, first, on the floor of the House. then I went in the Governor's office and called my office in New Orleans; in response to questions that they asked me I telephoned Senator Long in the sergeant-at-arms office in the House. He was called to the telephone and I talked with him again. Within a minute or two he left the House and walked down the corridor to the Governor's office. I started from the Governor's office through the anteroom; just as I reached for the doorknob was when I heard the sound of a shot. As I opened the door I saw Senator Long walking down the hall clasping his side with his hands.

By Dr. Bird:

Q. A good many people said they heard two shots.

A. I heard only one at that time.

Q. I mean that first.

A. Yes. As I opened the door I saw two men struggling. One I recognized as Murphy Roden, as a State Highway policeman, and the other man, who was later identified as Dr. Carl Weiss. Murphy had his back towards the door.

By Mr. Odom:

Q. Towards the Governor's door?

A. Yes, and was in a stooping position as though he had fallen in struggling with the man. He backed away, firing as he backed away. As he backed away half a dozen or more started shooting. He pitched forward with his head in the corner near the marble pillar with his face down. He lay there and nobody touched him until the Coroner ordered the body moved.

Q. The corridor you speak of was the north side of the building on the second floor leading from the House down by the Governor's office?

A. And connected with the Senate along with other offices of State officials including that of the Governor.

Q. As I understand your testimony, you had not come into the hall when the first shot was fired?

A. No, sir.

Q. And didn't see him fire that shot?

A. I did not.

Q. Had you gotten out into the hall before the other shots were fired?

A. I was standing in the doorway. I naturally didn't step out in the hallway.

Q. Have you any way of approximating the lapse of time from the first shot to the firing of the succeeding shots?

A. It required the time for me to turn the doorknob and open the door and look out. I would say three or four seconds.

Q. The man whom you identify as firing the first shots after you looked out in the hallway, what is his name?

A. Roden, Murphy Roden.

Q. Was his fire returned by the the man who was subsequently identified as Dr. Weiss?

A. I didn't see him fire any shots.

Q. Was Dr. Weiss in plain view of you?

A. He was.

Q. As far as you could see, did he make any effort or any overt attack on the man who shot him?

A. When I opened the door he was struggling with Roden. He had a pistol in his hand.

Q. Could you tell from the nature of the struggle if Roden took it away from him?

A. They seemed to be struggling over the pistol or just quitting struggling over the pistol.

Q. When they separated could you tell whether Roden jerked away and backed off or whether the other man jerked away? How did the break take place?

A. Roden evidently jerked away. He was still in a crouching position, firing as he backed away.

Q. When he backed away, what did the other man do, Dr. Weiss?

A. Fell on the floor.

Q. Prior to the time he backed away, did Dr. Weiss make any effort to shoot Roden?

A. I don't think he had time to do it.

Q. Was there any motion of his you could construe as an overt act toward Roden?

A. I would say my first impression was Dr. Weiss with a pistol in his hand trying to either wrest it away or get it away from Roden or get in a position where he might use it. I don't know what his intentions were.

Q. You gained that Roden had the weapon and was wresting it from him?

A. No, the other man had it.

Q. The man had the weapon and Roden was trying to wrest it away from him?

A. Yes.

Q. Could you tell whether he wrested it away or turned loose and backed off?

A. I couldn't say. Murphy showed us his thumb that had evidently caught in the jam of the pistol, it evidently caught in the barrel of the pistol.

Q. Could you approximate how many shots Roden fired into Dr. Weiss?

A. I couldn't say, several times.

Q. What was the posture of Dr. Weiss at the time Roden opened fire, was he standing upright or crouching?

A. Crouching. As Roden backed away he shoved Weiss or the man away from him. He backed up and fired as he backed away.

Q. Dr. Weiss was then in a stooping position?

A. Yes, near the floor; he sank down.

Q. Prior to the shooting?

A. They were both in a stooping position.

Q. Which was nearer the floor, Roden or Weiss?

A. Weiss, I believe.

Q. You heard only one shot up until that time?

A. Yes.

Q. I appreciate it is almost impossible to space time. Have you any way of determining or estimating or approximating the time they were engaged in that struggle, hooked up together, the officer and Dr. Weiss?

A. It would be impossible to approximate or estimate it because I didn't see the beginning of it.

Q. Can you estimate or approximate the time that they were hooked up after you saw them?

A. It was practically a continuous action. The minute I opened the door the men I saw were struggling. Roden shoved the other man away and backed away and fired as he did that. He crouched and backed farther away and fired some more.

Q. As Roden fired the man fell?

A. That's right.

Q. You said some other people opened fire after that?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you know who they were?

A. No. There was a group of them there; six, I would say.

Q. Do you know any of them?

A. I am not positive; I saw so many people I am not positive.

Q. Were they what is commonly known as Senator Long's bodyguards?

A. I recognized half a dozen or more whom I knew and recognized to members of the State police.

Q. Can you say you recognized any other man who shot Dr. Weiss besides Mr. Roden?

A. It would be only a guess. Every one had a gun out. I don't know which ones.

Q. Can you tell who had guns out?

A. Paul Votier and, I believe, was firing; I think Joe Messina was, I am not positive.

Q. He was there?

A. He was there.

Q. Was that all or any one else?

A. I don't recall.

Q. Was Mr. McQuiston there?

A. He was there. I don't know whether he did any firing or not.

Q. Did he have his gun out?

A. I think he did.

Q. Was Louis Heard there?

A. I don't know him.

Q. Was Joe Bates there?

A. I don't recall seeing him.

Q. Did any one put his hands on Dr. Weiss besides Roden?

A. I couldn't say.

Q. Can you state the time between the time that Roden did the shooting and the others joined it?

A. They joined in almost simultaneously. It was almost a miracle that Roden was not hit by some of them.

Q. They were around him?

A. On all sides.

Q. Had Dr. Weiss fallen to the floor before the others opened fire?

A. Yes.

Q. The other people opened fire and shot after he was down?

A. Yes, the pistol was in his hand.

Q. He fell down?

A. Yes.

Q. On the north or the south side of the corridor?

A. At the southeast corner of the corridor, as regards the four pillars outside of the Governor's office.

Q. Was his face down flush with the floor?

A. It was partially on his arm.

Q. Was his face towards the north or south?

A. I don't recall. I couldn't see his face.

Dr. BIRD: His face was down; when I found him he had not been touched.

By Mr. Odom:

Q. Was there much of a crowd there?

A. The customary legislative crowd was there, in and out of the hall.

Q. Did you see Judge Fournet as you came out?

A. No, sir; if I did, I didn't recognize him.

Q. Did you recognize any one other than the bodyguards and Dr. Weiss and Senator Long?

A. I wouldn't remember because my attention was concentrated on the shooting and the victim of the shooting.

Q. Among these people whom you saw shooting—the crowd from whence the shots were being fired—could you see any one of the bodyguards in his entourage?

A. I didn't know the bodyguards. I think they were all officers of the State police force. Some may have been on guard duty.

Q. In other words, you don't recall seeing any one except State police?

A. Yes.

Q. They were not in uniform?

A. They were not.

Q. Were any of them in uniform?

A. No, sir.

Witness excused.

J. E. Dearmond, called as a witness, being first duly sworn by the Coroner, testified as follows:

By Mr. Odom:

Q. What is your occupation?

A. Hotelman.

Q. Were you at the Capitol last night?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was your business there?

A. Just visiting.

Q. Are you located in Baton Rouge or New Orleans?

A. New Orleans.

Q. Did you have any business at the Capitol?

A. No, sir.

Q. How did you happen to be there?

A. Just walking around meeting friends.

Q. Have you held any commission under the State or under the City of New Orleans?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was it?

A. A special commission from the Bureau.

Q. When was that?

A. Before this law was passed when they recalled all of them.

Q. Have you held any since then?

A. No, sir.

Q. Where were you when the shooting took place?

A. In the secretary to the Governor's office.

Q. Who was in there?

A. Mrs. McGuffey and some other gentleman was up there; I don't know who he was.

Q. What was the first thing that attracted your attention?

A. Senator Long walked in the office in a big hurry. He walked in and said, "We have to get all our men here tomorrow."

Q. Who said that?

A. Senator Long.

Q. Who was he addressing?

A. Nobody in particular.

Q. Who could he have been addressing?

A. He walked in and struck his head in—Mrs. McGuffey was there—he said, "We have to get all our men here tomorrow." He turned around and walked in the hall and repeated the same statement as he stepped in the corridor. Just about that time I heard one shot followed by others. I was not going to stick my head out.

Q. The first shot, you just heard one shot?

A. The way it was, one shot was not so loud.

Q. Have you any way of approximating or spacing the time between the first shot and the others?

A. Very rapidly, four or five seconds.

Q. Can you approximate how many shots there were?

A. Estimated twenty-five or thirty; that was my guess.

Q. Where the body lay, how far was that to the Governor's door?

A. From the Governor's or the Secretary's door?

Q. The secretary's door. That's the door Senator Long went out?

A. Yes, sir. I would say twenty-feet.

Q. When Senator Long came in, who accompanied him?

A. He came in and turned around the way he came and I only saw Murphy Roden.

Q.Were there others with him?

A. I imagine so.

Q. You recognized Murphy Roden?

A. Yes, sir, also Paul Voitier.

Q. They followed him out?

A. He turned around and went out the door, they naturally followed.

Q. What did Senator Long say?

A. "We will have to have all our men here tomorrow."

Q. Is that all he said?

A. Every word. He made the same statement twice. Once in the office and then I heard it as he was going out the door.

Q. Did you know Dr. Weiss?

A. No, sir, I never saw him before to know him.

Q. What was your business in the Governor's office, social or otherwise?

A. I just dropped in socially for a few minutes. I saw Mr. A.P. White, the Governor's secretary, and Bertram Barnett, the publisher of the Bienville Democrat in Arcadia.

Q. You are presently employed by the DeSota Hotel?

A. The National Hotel Company.

Q. Are you still there?

A. I was up until three—two days ago.

Q. You don't know who did the shooting?

A. No, sir, the shooting was so close to the door.

Witness excused.

[The following testimony was heard September 16, 1935.]

John B. Fournet, called as a witness, being first duly sworn by Coroner, testified as follows:

By Mr. Odom:

Q. You are Judge John B. Fournet of the Supreme Court of Louisiana?

A. Yes.

Q. You are an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court?

A. Yes.

Q. Were you present at the Capitol on last Sunday night, say, about 20?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you witness the shooting as a result of which Dr. Carl A. Weiss and Senator Huey P. Long lost their lives?

A. I did.

Q. Will you please relate in your own words just exactly what you saw and what you heard immediately preceding the occurrence and what happened immediately afterwards?

A. Well, I was in the House. I knew Huey was in the House and I wanted to see him and talk to him about something I wanted to impart to him before he left Baton Rouge. I had been in the House a good portion of the evening trying to talk to Huey; he had been there. That's the reason I was there. When he left the House I started out behind him to follow him and get any opportunity to have a conversation with him. As usual, he walks very fast; it is almost hopeless to follow him. But I wanted to talk to him especially, there were two or three things I wanted to talk to him about. When I got into the corridor I didn't see him but I asked a couple of people standing there which way the Senator had gone—when I got there, I couldn't see him—I was told that he entered the Governor's office. I walked leisurely in that direction. I met Joe Messina and we walked together. He knew where Huey was. As we approached the Governor's office, the Senator walked out and walked towards our direction. About the time he reached this big circle in the middle of the corridor——

Q. Let me interrupt you a moment. That was going back towards the House?

A. He was facing the House of Representatives, east, I think, if I have my directions correct. About that time he made some statement as to getting everybody on hand early tomorrow morning. I think. Some one answered him, came and said that has been attended to, but I don't know who answered; quite a few people were there. Some of the Bureau men were there and there were several others up there. I didn't pay much attention to those because Huey was the man I wanted to talk to. My plan was to go talk to him in his room. Just about the time he was answered that was over and there was a little pause, not another word was said, when a man of small stature, a man dressed in a white suit—he was a slender man—flashed among us. He moved hurriedly, wedged in with him, flashed a gun and shot almost simultaneously. I was right next to me. I put my hands on the man's arm and tried to deflect the bullet. I had my hat in my left hand, but I dropped it or lost it in all the excitement. As I put my hands on his arm he shot almost simultaneously. Of course, there was quite a bit of confusion. One of the boys grabbed him at the same time almost that I did; others wedged in. I shoved him as hard as I knew how. When I shoved him somebody else grabbed him. Who, I learned afterwards, was Murphy Roden. He went to the floor; I shoved him and they went down in one continuous movement; there was no cessation; they both went down. The doctor, who I learned since was a doctor, did not go all the way to the floor, as I saw it. He jerked the gun loose and the other boy, who I have learned since was Murphy Roden, grabbed it with both hands when he was trying to shoot again; he was trying to keep him from doing this. All about that time there was no cessation. I made no effort to grab the gun. When the shooting started the gun was between me and the boy who was on the floor. The boy was in this position (indicating), he was almost over him. I, naturally, stepped back a few steps, two or three; the shooting kept on without cessation.

I immediately started to look for Senator Long. I ran down the stairs and found him in the arms of Jimmy O'Connor and somebody else—I don't know who it was. He said that he was shot. We asked him where he wanted us to take him and he said to the sanitarium, of course. We walked with him to the car. My hat stayed right there where it all happened, whether I lost it when I shoved him or not, I don't know; I know it stayed right there.

Q. Judge, at the time you saw Mr. Roden grappling with the man whom you subsequently learned to be Dr. Weiss, you say he was attempting to fire his gun again?

A. Yes.

Q. Could you tell who he was trying to shoot?

A. At the time it looked like he was trying to shoot Murphy, the boy on the floor.

Q. They were grappling?

A. No, Murphy was loose at that time.

Q. I understood you to say that simultaneously with the firing of the gun that you struck the man?

A. Yes, I shoved him hard enough that he went down with the boy that was grappling with him on the floor; he was almost under him up to the wall. I shoved him completely away.

Q. Do you remember just what portion of the body the weapon—what portion of the Senator's body the weapon was pressed against?

A. That's very hard to say. It was at his front with an upward trend. The gun came from his right hip. What he drew the gun from, where it came from on him, I did not see. I had not noticed him or seen him before he fired. He drew it from the hip and straight up and straight out; the man made one step and fired.

Q. It was you who shoved him away?

A. Whether the shoving was sufficient to deflect the bullet would be only conjectural or problematical.

Q. I didn't mean that. At the time you shoved him the force of your shoving forced him to the floor?

A. He didn't go to the floor completely.

Q. Did he go to his knees?

A. He stayed in a crouching position. He always stayed that way, attempting to shoot that other way.

Q. He still had the pistol?

A. In his right hand trying to shoot it with both hands.

Q. Did Roden ever grab him?

A. Yes, Roden held on to the gun.

Q. Were you attempting to get your hands on Dr. Weiss?

A. Yes, for the second time; after I shoved him I was making an effort to grab him when they began to shoot pretty lively around there.

Q. Judge, can you tell us who fired the first shot?

A. No sir. The shooting was from my right and left. All the shooting was done almost directly to my right and left a little behind me. None of them were close to me. I did not see Murphy draw his gun from a reclining position as he got up.

Q. How did he get on the floor?

A. That's pretty hard to say; I was not watching Murphy Roden as I was afraid of the other fellow until it started generally.

Q. Can you tell whether or not Mr. Roden fired the first shot at Dr. Weiss?

Q. If it was Roden, you couldn't recognize anybody. In other words if Dr. Weiss had escaped, I could not have identified him.

Q. The man who fired at Dr. Weiss, did he fire first?

A. The man on the floor did not shoot the first shot. I don't think he was because he was shooting before that while Murphy Roden who was on the floor was attempting to get the gun.

Q. When you say the man who shot first, you are not confusing that with the first shot?

A. No, sir, that was after that.

Q. Have you any way of approximating how many shots were fired?

A. I served in the World War and I was a machine gunner. A machine gun would fire 300 to 600 bullets a minute. I would say after the shooting started it was as fast as a machine gun. In other words, there were two or three or four shooting at one time but to say how many shots were fired, would be a pure guess.

Q. Do you know what sort of weapons were used?

A. It sounded like an automatic. There may have been a single action sandwiched in between.

Q. Were any machine guns used?

A. No, sir. If there were I did not see them. They were shooting from my left and right, practically to the rear.

Q. As a matter of fact, I understand it to be your testimony that while Dr. Weiss was on the floor with the gun in his hand and while he was attempting to use it that he was shot by some one to the rear of you—who it was you don't know, but it was not Mr. Roden?

A. No, sir, that's my firm belief. I know he was on his feet. I didn't see the gun drawn from him; I saw him make the move. The other man rolled over. He went around and down. He went down slowly when the first bullet struck him; he just had a quiver of the body. While he was still doing that the shots were pouring into him from both sides.

Q. Can you describe or denote the spacing of the shots? The first shot from the next shot?

A. Yes. Very close, so close that I thought Senator Long was shot with the first two shots, until the Coroner's verdict and other people, I was of the opinion he was shot twice. The Senator was of that opinion because he said, "You kept him from hitting me the second time."

Q. Can you approximate——?

A. In fact, it was so fast, you could just guess for yourself. Any attempt to give any definite time, would have to be an expert on shots and the time of the shots. I can give you what happened and you can figure it for yourself. There was never any cessation of action, it was one continuous action. The man came straight up to Senator Long and fired. I grabbed his hand and my next move was to shove him as hard as I could; my next effort was to grab him. In the meantime, he and Murphy Roden were mixed up; then I stepped back two steps. The firing was ceasing about that time. You can figure for yourself about how fast that was. I figure they shot forty or fifty times. As fast as you could shoot three or four automatics or revolvers one after the other, whichever way you want to put it, that would be the time. In other words, I have heard worlds of people not to express an opinion, say they thought it was a machine gun, those who heard it and didn't see it.

Q. Judge, was he shot after he was down?

A. The shots were continuous; there never was a cessation. Naturally, some of the shots hit him after he hit the floor. I am convinced of that.

Q. After the continuous firing was over were there any other shots?

A. No, sir. The last shooting that was done was done by an automatic also. It was continuous, there never was any cessation at all. There seemed to be more than one shooting at one time, two or three. When it was finished it was an end to everything. There was never a complete cessation of shooting until it actually stopped. There never was such a thing.

By Mr. Porterie:

Q. There was no conversation between Senator Long and Dr. Weiss at all?

A. He never uttered a word, he never gave any warning. He walked right among us. I was close to the Senator. As Dr. Weiss made one step he shot. There was no outcry at all except by Huey, the usual scream of a man injured or shot. He grabbed his side and that was all I saw of him until I saw him downstairs. When I stepped back I started looking for him. I opened the Governor's office and looked in there for him. I thought he might have gone in there. He was not there so I came back in the corridor, and was told that he ran down the corridor and down the stairs. I ran down and caught him as he was going out the east door.

By Mr. Odom:

Q. Do you recall who was there at the time he was shot?

A. It would be hard to say; there were a bunch of us. Strange to say, I know the boys who go out with Senator Long, but I know the names of only a few. I remembered after that I saw three or four; Joe Messina, Murphy Roden, the young fellow, the man they call George, I couldn't give his name, a big man; Mr. Coleman, a bald-headed fellow, I saw him. I saw this man Louis Lesage, a Standard Oil man; he was sitting in the window. I remember seeing Mr. White after it was over; I don't remember seeing him before that. I also remember seeing Dr. Smith before. There were several boys like that, I saw Joe Bates right after. By that time a great crowd was coming in. Men were running in and peeping out from the House and other directions.

Q. You didn't see any others?

A. No, sir; I made no effort to find out, to be frank with you.

Witness excused.

Rev. Gerald L. K. Smith, called as a witness, being first duly sworn, made the following statement:

I want to say I respect your court, but I do not respect this investigation, and I brand the District Attorney of this court as one of

* * * * *

I worshiped my hero. I will say nothing here and I will not harass these boys who are here in any way.

Witness excused.

Mr. ODOM. I might add in view of this charge by this person, that I care nothing of his opinion of me or my actions. When he says I entered into a plot to kill Huey Long, he is a willful, vicious and deliberate liar.

R. William H. Cook, called as a witness, being first duly sworn by the Coroner, testified, as follows:

By Mr. Odom:

Q. Dr. Cook, you are a physician and surgeon practicing your profession in the City of Baton Rouge?

A. Yes.

Q. Were you present at the operation performed on Senator Huey P. Long on last Sunday night a week ago?

A. Yes.

Q. After the operation had been performed did you have occassion to notice his mouth?

A. Yes.

Q. Will you describe to the Coroner and Jury what you found?

A. Dr. Henry McKowen, who was giving the anesthetic, called the attention of all of us, that were present to an abrasion or brushburn on the lower lip of the Senator, and asked that some one put iodine on it which I did.

Q. Was it bleeding?

A. It was not bleeding until Dr. Henry McKowen wiped it off with a moist sponge. Then it did bleed just a little.

Q. It oozed blood?

A. That is correct.

Q. Was it a fresh abrasion?

A. It appeared to be.

Q. Of course, you have no way of telling how that was caused?

A. No, sir.

By Mr. Porterie:

Q. Doctor, an injury of that kind could readily occur to any person after a person was shot who would have to take the steps from the first floor of the Capitol down a step of four flights of stairs to the basement and might strike any sharp angles or the marble in the Capitol after being wounded as he was?

A. Any contusion or trauma could cause that abrasion.

Q. By trauma you mean a lick against a hard surface?

A. Yes.

Witness excused.

Dr. J. Webb McGehee, called as a witness, being first duly sworn by the Coroner, testified as follows:

By Mr. Odom:

Q. Doctor, you are a practicing physician in the City of Baton Rouge?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you have an engagement with Dr. C.A. Weiss for an operation in which you were to administer the anesthetic on last Monday, a week ago today?

A. I did.

Q. When was the last conversation you had with him about that operation?

A. About Friday, when I talked to him personally.

Q. Did you have a telephone message from him?

A. I had a telephone message from him Sunday night about 8:15. My wife talked to him; he wanted to know if I knew that the operation had been changed from our Lady of the Lake Hospital to the Baton Rouge General Hospital.

Q. That was 8:15 Sunday night?

A. Yes, about that.

Witness excused.

C. Sidney Frederick, called as a witness, being first duly sworn by the Coroner, testified as follows:

By Mr. Odom:

Q. Mr. Frederick, you are a practicing attorney, are you not?

A. Yes.

Q. You are the District Attorney of the St. Tammany-Washington District, are you not?

A. Yes.

Q. Were you in the Capitol on Sunday night, a week ago?

A. I was.

Q. Were you there at the time of the shooting?

A. Yes.

Q. Just where were you in the building at that time?

A. I was leaving the Governor's office and had taken perhaps two steps in the reception room when the first shot was fired; that was followed by a second shot and then by a regular fusillade of shots in rapid succession. About that time I had gotten to the small entrance to the secretary's office. The shots had not ceased at that time. I looked out of the door for just a moment because I withdrew myself from exposure at the door immediately. I saw a number of men down the corridor in some confusion. As I say, I withdrew; I waited until the shots had subsided.

Q. Did you see any of the shooting?

A. I couldn't say that I saw any particular person fire any particular shot.

Q. Did you see any person fire any shot?

A. Yes.

Q. Who did you see?

A. I am not in a position to say who fired the shot.

Q. You mean you don't know the person?

A. No, I don't mean that. I mean that I didn't look long enough to determine who fired the shot. In other words, the shooting was going on while I looked down the corridor momentarily.

Q. Did you see more than one person shooting?

A. I saw revolvers in the hands of more than one person.

Q. Did you recognize any of them?

A. No.

Q. Did you know any of them?

A. I can only answer that question by hearsay. I learned the names of two gentleman afterwards.

Q. In otherwords, you learned the names of two men you saw firing?

A. I won't say that. I learned the names of two persons I recognized in the hallway.

Q. Were they contiguous to where the shooting took place?

A. Yes.

Q. How long after the shooting was it before you saw them?

A. Momentarily.

Q. Do you mind telling us the names of these two persons?

A. Murphy Roden and Elliot Coleman.

Q. Did you see revolvers in the hands of those men?

A. I would not swear I saw a revolver in the hands of Mr. Coleman. Mr. Roden, I did.

Q. Did you see the revolver in the hands of Mr. Roden firing?

A. I couldn't answer that truthfully.

Q. Can you approximate—did you see the body of Dr. Weiss at the time of the firing?

A. I was one of the first persons to get it.

Q. Did you see the body before the firing ceased?

A. Yes.

Q. What was—just describe where the body was.

A. The body was lying in a position just across the narrow corridor that leads to the Governor's office just a few feet to the west of the double doors that entered in the Governor's office by the large marble pillar.

Q. Did you see the body when it crumpled to the floor?

A. No.

Q. When you first saw the body it was down, is that correct?

A. I would say that is approximately correct. You must understand this happened so quickly. I didn't keep my head out in that corridor any great length of time.

Q. After you saw the body on the floor did you see who was shooting?

A. I will answer that question this way: There were shots fired after the body was on the floor.

Q. Did you say the only men you identified fired after the body was on the floor to your knowledge?

A. I couldn't say.

Q. I don't remember whether you stated you saw the body when it fell to the floor?

A. No, I would say the body was on the floor.

Q. Could you approximate how many shots were fired after you saw the body on the floor?

A. Perhaps five.

Q. Could you space the shots for us, the time elapsing?

A. Very little time had elapsed between shots.

Q. Would you say more time elapsed between the second and the subsequent shots?

A. I would say that more time elapsed between the firing of the first two shots and then the firing of the shots that followed after they started to fire.

Q. After the second shot was there a continuation of the shooting?

A. It sounded very much to me like a machine gun in action.

Q. Have you heard a machine gun in action or seen one?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you see a machine gun there, Mr. Frederick?

A. No.

Q. Of course, I know it is almost impossible for one to tell under the circumstances such as that the lapse of time between shots, but could you give us any approximate idea of the time between the first and second shots?

A. I would say it was a very short space of time, almost instantly.

Q. Was there a longer space of time between the first and second shots than the second shot and the subsequent shots?

A. I think there was a longer space of time between the second and third shots than between the first two.

Witness excused.

J. T. Cockerham, called as a witness, being first duly sworn, by the Coroner, testified as follows:

By Mr. Odom:

Q. You live at Denham Springs, do you not?

A. Yes.

Q. Were you in the State Capitol last night a week ago?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you witness the shooting there as a result of which Dr. C. A. Weiss and Senator Long lost their lives?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you hear the shooting, Mr. Cockerham?

A. Yes, I heard it.

Q. Where were you ?

A. Right close to the doors at the front entrance.

Q. You mean out in Memorial Hall?

A. Yes sir.

Q. Did you see anything at all?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you see any of the participants?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you see anybody going to or coming from the scene of the shooting?

A. No, sir, just the crowd rushing.

Q. You heard the shooting?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Describe what you heard.

A. I couldn't describe just what I heard. There were several shots, I don't know how many. Of course, a fellow didn't have time to count them.

Q. Was there any space of time between the first and second shots?

A. Yes.

Q. Between the second and third shots?

A. As well as I remember, there was very little space between the second and third, I don't think much. I remember when the first shot was fired there was a little space and then another.

Q. After the firing of those shots was there continuous shooting then from that time until it was over with?

A. Yes, sir, several shots fired along behind the other.

Q. Have you any way of approximating how many shots were fired?

A. No, sir, a good many. I have no idea how many. There was so much excitement and the firing was so fast I had no way of tellng how many.

Witness excused.

Cooper Jean, called as a witness, being duly sworn by the Coroner, testified as follows:

By Mr. Odom:

Q. Mr. Jean, you live in this parish, do you not?

A. Yes.

Q. Were you present in the Capitol last Sunday night a week ago?

A. Yes.

Q. Were you there at the time of the shooting we are investigating now?

A. I was.

Q. Were you a witness to the shooting?

A. No, sir, I was not.

Q. Where were you at the time of the shooting? At the main entrance as you go up into the Capitol? Out in Memorial Hall?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you see anybody going to or coming from the shooting?

A. I saw people, some were trying to go in and some coming out.

Q. Did you recognize any of them?

A. No, I did not.

Q. Have you any way of approximating how many shots were fired?

A. No, sir, I couldn't answer that.

Q. Was there any space of time between the first shot that was fired and the second shot?

A. Very little if any, very little.

Q. Was there any space of time between the second shot and the third shot?

A. I couldn't say anything about the third shot.

Q. When did the beginning of the continuous fusillade of shots take place?

A. As well as I remember, after the second shot.

Q. You didn't see it and didn't see any of the participants?

A. No, sir.

Witness excused.

Ed Sharp, called as a witness, being first duly sworn by the Coroner, testified as follows:

By Mr. Odom:

Q. Mr. Sharp, were you present in the Capitol last night a week ago?

A. Yes.

Q. Last Sunday night?

A. Yes.

Q. Were you present at the time of the shooting which is the subject of this inquiry?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you see the shooting?

A. No.

Q. Where were you?

A. In the lobby, just coming down from the balcony.

Q. The lobby of the House of Representatives?

A. Right in front.

Q. Out in Memorial Hall?

A. Yes, I guess so.

Q. Did you see any of the participants in the shooting?

A. No, sir, not that I know of.

Q. Did you see any one going to or coming from the shooting?

A. People were trying to go in and some were coming back. Most of them were coming out.

Q. You didn't see any of the shooting yourself?

A. No, sir.

Q. Was there any appreciable space of time between the firing of the first and second shots?

A. Half a minute or something like that. Two shots came ahead of the others.

Q. Between the first and second shots?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And between the second and third shots?

A. About the same time, then a volley of shots.

Q. After the third shot? After the second shot? Your didn't do in there?

A. No, sir. My daughter was with me, and when it commenced she jerked me away and soon as we got away, and I got her quiet, I walked back to see what happened. Somebody said it was firecrackers; I went to find out.

Q. That's all you know about it?

A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. Porterie:

Indicate by the snap of your fingers the cracking of the guns.

(Snap-Snap)

Q. That's the time you call half a minute a little while ago? Is that what you mean?

A. That's as near as I could get at it.

Q. That's all I wanted to know. I have no reflection on you.

A. That's all.

Witness excused.

Earl Straughan, called as a witness, being first duly sworn by the Coroner, testified as follows:

By Mr. Odom:

Q. Were you in the State Capitol last Sunday night a week ago?

A. Yes.

Q. Were you there at the time of the shooting?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you see the shooting?

A. No.

Q. Where were you?

A. About five steps before you go in the hall where the shooting had taken place.

Q. In which direction?

A. Down the hall in front of the House of Representatives.

Q. You mean in what is called the House lobby?

A. I guess that's it.

Q. Did you go out in the hallway when you heard the shooting?

A. No, sir. I was headed that way. When it started I stopped.

Q. You didn't see the shooting?

A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you see any of the participants?

A. I went in there after it was over.

Q. Describe what you saw when you went in.

A. When the shooting was over I walked down there and got almost to where the shooting occurred to see what happened. One fellow was laying on the floor in a white suit. About that time they run us all out. I didn't get up but about fifteen feet to the fellow on the floor.

Q. What did you say?

A. I say I got within about fifteen feet of the fellow laying on the floor and then they made us go out.

Q. Did you see any one there at that time?

A. Yes, several of them.

Q. Do you know who some of them were?

A. I didn't look at the faces; I probably would have but I was looking at the guns.

Q. Were they strangers to you?

A. I know some of them when I see them.

Q. Do you know any of them?

A. Not personally.

Q. Do you know who any of them are?

A. Not that I seen in there; I didn't recognize them.

Q. Have you had any of them pointed out since?

A. From what the papers say, I know several of them by their names.

Q. Who was it you saw there with guns in their hands that you knew?

A. I didn't see them, I couldn't tell.

Q. What sort of guns were they?

A. Not automatics, six-shooters, like the City Police carry here.

Q. About how many men would you say you saw with guns in their hands?

A. Four or five.

Q. You cannot identify any of them for us?

A. No, sir.

Q. Who was with you?

A. Nobody was with me. There was a crowd of people but nobody with me.

Q. Was Lloyd Straughan there?

A. Yes, sir, he is my brother.

Q. Was he there?

A. When the shooting occurred, he ran back in the balcony.

Q. Were you together when it started?

A. We were when it started.

Q. When it started he went the other way?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Can you give us any idea how many shots were fired?

A. A couple of shots were fired and then a couple of seconds and then twenty-five or thirty; that's my version of it.

Q. Have you any way of approximating how many shots were fired?

A. No way, only guessing.

Witness excused.

C. A. Riddle, called as a witness, being first duly sworn, by the Coroner, testified as follows:

By Mr. Odom:

Q. You are a member of the House of Representatives from the Parish of Avoyelles?

A. Yes.

Q. Were you in the Capitol on the night of the shooting?

A. I was.

Q. Did you witness the shooting?

A. I think I did.

Q. Relate just what you saw, what you heard, and what you observed of the proceedings.

A. When the House adjourned, I came out the right door and turned into the first door to the right into the corridor, which is the east end. I proceeded down the corridor and noticed Senator Long come out of what I thought was the secretary's door.

Q. The secretary to the Governor?

A. Yes. He was coming up the corridor towards the east end facing me. He stopped about six feet from the set-off or setback from the column in the corridor, about the center of the square or circle in the floor of the corridor. I thought that was a good time to approach him and ask him to speak at a barbecue we were going to have in Marksville. When I reached within five or six feet of the Senator, a gun fired—it all happened about the same time. There was a young fellow holding a pistol in his hand pointed directly at Senator Long. I saw four or five inches—three or six inches—I would say, of the barrell which was very bright. Then somebody grabbed him, I think. Then it was just like touching off a bunch of firecrackers. My mind was first centered on Senator Long to invite him to speak. Then when the shot fired and I saw the gun pointed right at Senator Long's abdomen, then my mind was centered on him. Then I centered on myself.

Q. Were you looking at Senator Long at the time the shot was fired?

A. Right at him.

Q. Were you looking at the man who fired it?

A. I was looking directly at Senator Long. When the shot was fired I saw the man.

Q. Prior to that time you had not observed the man who fired the shot?

A. There were five or six men around Senator Long, none of whom I recognized because I was thinking of the Senator and inviting him to speak to us. About that time the gun fired and a body seemed to move from the right in the direction of Senator Long.

Q. Was the man who fired the shot between you and Senator Long?

A. No, he came more from a diagonal direction.

Q. You were facing Senator Long?

A. Yes.

Q. You were meeting him?

A. Yes.

Q. Some one came from the side and shot Senator Long?

A. Yes, somewhat in this direction (indicating). A body moved forward about the time the gun was pointed right at him with both hands, if I remember correctly.

Q. Did you hear any conversation or remark between Senator Long and this man?

A. None whatever. Of course, there were five or six people there. I heard nothing whatsoever. As the gun fired, Senator Long did this (indicating) and turned immediately. After he turned and marched down the corridor, then it was just like firecrackers. I couldn't describe it better than that.

Q. Did you see who did that firing?

A. You mean this fusillade?

Q. Yes.

A. No, sir, I didn't recognize any man, my attention was not on them. I thought it was a bunch of bandits or racketeers in there.

Q. When you last saw the man who shot Senator Long, was he standing up?

A. Yes, bent forward a little.

Q. Did any one put their hands on him at that time?

A. No.

Q. Did you see Judge Fournet there?

A. No, sir, I really didn't. I heard him testify and he must have been there, but I didn't see him if he was there.

Q. Did you recognize anyone who was there?

A. None whatever. My mind was centered on Senator Long. He was in a very good humor that night. I was looking at him. I loved him very much. I was thinking it would be a good time to invite him to speak at Avoyelles.

Q. Did you see this man put his hands on Senator Long, the man who did the shooting?

A. No, sir, I just saw him go forward with the gun.

Q. Did you see Senator Long put his hands on the man?

A. No, sir, I don't think they got that close. I would say they were about five or six feet away.

Witness excused.

Mrs. O.P. Kennedy, called as a witness, being first duly sworn by the Coroner, testified as follows:

By Mr. Odom:

Q. Mrs. Kennedy, you were subpoenaed as a witness and I have understood since that you said you didn't see the shooting and didn't know anything about it.

A. No, sir.

Q. Did your husband see the shooting?

A. No, sir.

Q. You don't know anything about it?

A. We were in the Capitol and did hear the shots.

Q. You were subpoenaed by mistake. I am sorry.

Witness excused.

Gordon Latham, called as a witness, being duly sworn by the Coroner, testified as follows:

By Mr. Odom:

Q. Mr. Latham, you live in Baton Rouge, do you not?

A. Yes sir.

Q. Where are you employed?

A. The Louisiana Creamery.

Q. Were you in the Capitol last Sunday night a week ago?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you witness the shooting?

A. No, sir.

Q. Where were you at the time of the shooting?

A. In Memorial Hall in front of the elevators.

Q. Describe the shooting as you heard it.

A. There were two shots right close together, a little lull and then the whole volley.

Q. Did you observe anybody going to or from where the shooting was?

A. I saw Joe Messina go around the side and get in the elevator running.

Q. Was he walking or running?

A. Running.

Q. Do you know whether he went up or down?

A. No, sir, I don't.

Q. Did you go around where the shooting had taken place?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you see Mr. Messina subsequent to that?

A. No, sir.

Witness excused.

Dr. C.A. Weiss, called as a witness, being duly sworn by the Coroner, testified as follows:

By Mr. Odom:

Q. Doctor, you are the father of the late Carl A. Weiss?

A. Yes.

Q. Were you with him on Sunday, the day he was killed, the day of that night?

A. Practically the entire day until 7:30 that night.

Q. Will you describe to the Coroner and Jury just what your son did during that day and night up until he * * * sat on * * *. A. He and his wife and baby came to the house * * * there left the baby with my wife and I so they could go to church. They went to mass at St. Joseph's Catholic Church. After mass his wife returned to our home, he stopped in Scheinuk's florial establishment to see about * * * had treated the day before. In a little while he came in with a bouquet of flowers sent to his wife in honor of the child's birth. He came in very proud, and handed the flowers to his wife saying, "Look what Mr. Scheinuk sent to the baby" Mr. Scheinuk had told him that he had not sent the baby anything when it was born, and had done it at this time. Then they went to their own home, and took the child with them. He was to take dinner with us that day. Between the time they left and returned my wife had occasion to telephone his house twice; one time his wife answered, and the next time he answered. About one o'clock, they came in the house for dinner. We had a very enjoyable meal; he ate heartily and joked and laughed during the meal. After the meal, he asked me if we cared to go to my camp on the Amite River. I told him that I had expected to go, and had already requested my younger son to go ahead and prepare the camp and open it up. So he and his wife and baby and my wife and I took the car and went out to the camp. When we arrived there my wife and I took care of the baby while he and his wife went in swimming. They were in the water about an hour and when they came out we closed up the camp and came home. We sat on the front seat and he and his wife and baby sat on the back seat; we arrived home about 7:30. Then he left there he and his wife and the baby went to their home.

Q. That was about 7:30?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you communicate with him or his wife subsequently?

A. His wife phoned me about ten o'clock—about ten minutes to ten—and asked me if Carl was there. I told her no and she said that he had gone out to make a call.

Q. The last time you saw him was about 7:30?

A. Yes.

Q. Dr. Weiss, can you tell us whether or not your son carried a pistol when he went out at night?

A. Occasionally, he did.

Q. Did he have any reason for it?

A. Recently, we have had at least three intruders in our garage; one he had to run out and I had to run one out; one my younger son called to one night.

Q. How old a man was your son?

A. Twenty-nine.

Q. Was he of robust or slight stature?

A. Very slight. I remarked to my wife that afternoon at the camp while they were in swimming that the boy was just skin and bones. She said, "Yes, he had been working so hard. We will have to get him to take a rest." He weighed about 132 pounds; he was quite a small man.

Q. Your son was a doctor, was he not?

A. Yes.

Q. Twenty-nine years of age?

A. Yes.

Q. Would you care to sketch for the jury a history of his education?

A. He graduated from the Catholic High School when he was fifteen. He then started in the premedical school at L.S.U., and then went to Tulane. In between every year's regular session, he attended summer school. At the age of twenty-one, he graduated with his degree.

Q. He was a doctor of medicine?

A. Yes. He had already taken his Bachelor of Science degree after his second year as a medical student. After he graduated he served an internship at the Touro for two years. He then secured an appointment to the American Hosptial in Paris. In between times he spent a year in Vienna studying under the Masters. Then he completed his internship in Paris. After that he obtained a two-year internship at Bellevue Hospital in New York; the last six months at Bellevue, he was the chief interne at the clinic for ear, nose and throat.

Q. Subsequently, he came to Baton Rouge?

A. And went in private practice with me.

Q. He was a specialist?

A. Ear, Nose, and throat specialist.

Witness excuse.

Murphy Roden, called as a witness, being first duly sworn by the Coroner, testified as follows:

By Mr. Odom:

Q. There has been some suggestion in the testimony here that you were one of the participants in the shooting that took place at the Capitol. If you were and for that reason or for any other reason, it is your desire not to talk, not to testify, you have that right. You have the right to refuse to testify and the right to stand on your constitutional grounds that your testimony might incriminate yourself. If you care to testify, we will be glad to hear you.

A. I have no objection to testifying.

Q. Mr. Roden, where are you from?

A. Arcadia, Louisiana.

Q. Are you a native of Arcadia?

A. I am a native of Bienville Parish.

Q. Arcadia is in Bienville Parish?

A. Yes, that is the Parish seat.

Q. Were you present or, rather, were you employed last Sunday night a week ago by the Bureau of Criminal Identification?

A. Yes.

Q. Were you discharging your duties as such?

Q. Yes, sir.

Q. Who had assigned you your duties?

A. General Guerre, Superintendent of the Bureau.

Q. Tell us what your duties were?

A. For some time my assignment was to stay with Senator Long and see that no one harmed him.

Q. When did that begin?

A. I have been with him constantly since the 15th of January.

Q. Were you with him in Washington too?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were you employed by the State Bureau of Criminal Identification?

A. Yes, sir, by the State.

Q. And paid by them?

A. Yes.

Q. You were assigned by General Guerre to accompany Senator Long, and see that no one did any harm to him?

A. Yes, I also held a commission through the Metropolitan Police Force in Washington for that purpose.

Q. You were acting for what is commonly known as a bodyguard for Senator Long?

A. I suppose so.

Q. How long have you been employed by the Bureau?

A. Since the second day of January, 1928, when I was a member of the Highway Patrol under Governor Simpson. I was transferred to the Bureau on the first day of November of last year.

Q. 1934?

A. Yes.

Q. You have been continuously in the employ of the State since that time?

A. With the exception of three months in 1930 when I resigned to accept an appointment to the air corps technical school in Illinois.

Q. Tell us everything you know about the shooting of Dr. Weiss.

A. We were in the House of Representatives just as it adjourned and Senator Long was talking to Representative Mason Spencer, and then he walked out of the House and down the corridor to the Governor's office. I was walking right behind him. He walked in and I stopped at the door; I was standing right in the door. He was in there for a second or two and turned around and walked out facing me. I backed right out. He walked out to about the left side of the circle on the floor in front of the main door. At that instant he had called to some one to have everybody there in the morning at 9:30; some one told him that had been attended to. At that minute some one brushed through; at that time I was standing directly in front of Senator Long—he brushed right through; at that moment, he pulled a gun and fired at Senator Long. When he went to thrust it into Senator Long, I grabbed him with my left hand over the gun; then there was a struggle and he fell to the floor and was trying to get up again. Guns were shooting around me and my eyes were full of smoke. I received powder burns on my hands and face. I thought at that time that it was a free-for-all; I knew I had the man that shot Senator Long; I was concerned over that. Finally, I fell to the floor with him. Then I jerked loose, got up, pulled my gun and commenced firing.

Q. Had he been fired at at that time?

A. Guns were shooting; I couldn't say whether he had been hit. Evidently, they were shooting at him. I couldn't see at the time they were shooting. My eyes were full of powder and smoke.

Q. You testified you were both down on the floor?

A. Yes, sir, I stumbled; that floor is very slippery and hard to stand up on.

Q. You mean you were off balance?

A. Yes, sir, in the struggle.

Q. Did either one of you fall to your knees that you recall?

A. Probable one knee.

Q. Did you ever get the gun?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did he say anything?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did he say anything at the time he shot Senator Long?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did Senator Long say anything?

A. No, sir.

Q. Except immediately preceding the shooting?

A. He kind of let out a yell of some kind.

Q. That was after the shooting?

A. Yes, sir, the minute the bullet hit him.

Q. Did the man act as if he had been shot before you broke away from him?

A. No, sir, if he had I couldn't tell it. You understand my position. Guns were shooting and I had smoke and powder burns in my eyes and couldn't see to tell just what was going on.

Q. Could you see well enough to see if he still had the gun in his hand?

A. Yes, I knew he had because I couldn't get it away from him and he kept trying to shoot it.

Q. Who was he trying to shoot?

A. Me. He was trying to work it around to me so it would be pointed at me.

Q. How far away from him were you when you opened fire?

A. I didn't get the question?

Q. I understand that you broke away and opened fire?

A. Yes.

Q. How far away did you get before you opened fire?

A. I was right on him; as far from here to the center of the table (indicating).

Q. How many times did you shoot?
A. Ten times.
Q. What kind of gun did you have?
A. A .38 Colt Super-automatic.
Q. As close as you were to him at that time you could not have missed him?
A. I don't know if my shots were effective or not.
Q. Just why did you shoot him?
A. Just why?
Q. Yes.
A. I shot him to keep from being shot.
Q. When you were trying to wrest the gun away from him what was your purpose?
A. To stop the fire. I have been a member of the National Guard for a good many years and that's the first thing they teach you, to put the enemy's gun out of commission.
Q. You didn't succeed?
A. No, sir.
Q. Why didn't you continue to try to get his gun?
A. I gave it up; I knew I couldn't do it.
Q. How old are you?
A. Thirty.
Q. What is your weight?
A. One hundred and fifty, a little less or a little more.
Q. What is your height?
A. Five feet seven and a half inches.
Q. Do you know whether or not you hit Dr. Weiss at all?
A. I wouldn't swear any one of my bullets hit him.
Q. How close were you to him when you opened fire?
A. Right close for the first shots and I continued to back away.
Q. Did you see him when his body crumpled?
A. After my gun went empty,
Q. Were any shots fired after you ceased firing?
A. I don't know; I can't answer that question. It all stopped about the same time. The whole thing was not over six seconds.
Q. Can you identify anybody who was doing any shooting?
A. I never saw a soul shooting a gun.
Q. Were the others in front of you or behind you?
A. Behind us but I was tussling with this fellow that I was trying to get the gun from.
Q. I don't suppose you have any way of estimating how many shots were fired.
A. No, sir; it would just be a guess.
Q. Were any machine guns used?
A. No, sir; there were not any machine guns there.
Q. How many shots did Dr. Weiss fire?
A. I couldn't exactly answer that. I am of the opinion that only one shot was fired.
Q. Mr. Roden, do you mind telling us what other employees of the Criminal Bureau were present?
A. George McQuiston and Joe Messina; that's all I could absolutely testify were there.
Q. At the time he was in the House were any others of the bodyguards there besides those you mentioned?
A. I couldn't say; we were hanging around the door; I had just walked in and saw he was fixing to come out. They were going to adjourn. As I walked in the door he was standing with his arm around Mason Spencer. As he came past I walked behind him..
Q. Did you see Mr. Riddle?
A. No, sir, I don't recall seeing him.
Q. Did you see Judge Fournet?
A. Yes.
Q. Was he walking with Senator Long?
A. Yes, walking down the hall with him.
Q. Did you see what he did?
A. At the time he shoved us? I would say he shoved us at the same time I grabbed the gun, or about that time.
Q. Mr. Roden, you mentioned Joe Messina and who else?
A. George McQuiston was there.
Witness excused.
Joe Messina, called as a witness, being first duly sworn by the Coroner, testified as follows:
By Mr. Odom:
Q. Mr. Messina, do you understand your constitutional rights?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Were you present at the shooting of Senator Long in the Capitol last Sunday night a week ago?
A. I would like to make a little statement, please, before, I answer any questions.
Q. Yes, you can make a statement.
A. In the first place, Senator Long is a very close friend of mine, and, in the next place, with a plot that conspired before my friend Sidney Songy came to me and begged me to take him to Senator Long's room, that he wanted to confess a crime they wanted him to pull off. He said he couldn't do it. We got him up to Senator Long's room and he told about it. A lot of stuff was captured in that plot, bullets, guns and hand grenades. In a cowardly way Senator Long was shot. I am ready to answer any questions you want to ask.
Q. Tell what you know about the shooting.
A. It is nothing I know much until the time the shots were fired. When Dr. Weiss fired the shot I saw the Senator jump back and I knew he was killed. I immediately run up, pulled my gun out and unloaded it in Dr. Weiss.
Q. At the time you did that was he being held by Mr. Roden?
A. Two men were scuffling and I looked up to see who they were. I shot the man that shot Senator Long. I saw the pistol in his hand.
Q. Did you recognize the other man scuffling with him as Mr. Murphy Roden?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Were they grappling at the time you fired?
A. Yes.
Q. Did you see Mr. Roden have hold of the pistol at that time?
A. No, sir, this man was free with it at that time; he jerked loose.
Q. What did he do?
A. I immediately fired?
Q. Why did you shoot him?
A. To keep him from shooting Roden or myself or any one else that might be there.
Q. Did he make any effort to shoot you?
A. That, I don't know. He had a pistol and would have shot any one there.
Q. Was the pistol pointed towards you?
A. I don't know; I don't remember much about that.
Q. Was it pointed towards Roden?
A. I don't know.
Q. Did you shoot him to keep him from shooting you or did you shoot him because he shot Senator Long?
A. One reason was he shot Senator Long; the next reason was to keep him from killing me or any one else.
Q. Which one of those reasons did you shoot him for? Because he shot Senator Long or to keep him from shooting you?
A. I thought he would kill any one in there.
Q. What was the primary reasons?
A. He had shot Senator Long and would shoot me and Roden and any one else in there.
Q. How close were you to him?
A. About the distance to this gentleman sitting right there (indicating).
Q. What did you do when you had emptied your gun?
A. I went downstairs to look for Senator Long.
Q. One witness has testified that you went in the elevator.
A. No, sir.
Q. Did you get in the elevator?
A. No, sir, I went downstairs.
Q. Do you know any one else that was shooting?
A. I was too busy watching my gun to look.
Q. Who else was in the party?
A. In what way do you mean?
Q. What bodyguards?
A. George McQuiston, Murphy Roden and myself.
Q. Did you see the man at the time he fired on Senator Long?
A. I saw him a moment after the shot was fired.
Q. Did you see him before the shot was fired?
A. I didn't notice him at that time.
Q. You didn't see him approach Senator Long?
A. I didn't see him until he fired.
Q. How far were you from Senator Long at that time?
A. Not more than eight feet, probably a little closed in the back.
Q. You were behind Senator Long?
A. I run up to see who it was. I saw them in a scuffle and recognized Murphy and began to fire on Dr. Weiss.
Q. You recognized Dr. Weiss at that time?
A. I never did know the Doctor.
Q. How close were you to him when you began to fire?
A. I must have been six or eight feet.
Q. What position was he in, standing up or down on the floor?
A. Standing up, yes, sir.
Q. Straight?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What was he doing with his gun? In which hand was it?
A. I don't remember.
Q. Mr. Roden testified that several shots were fired before he broke loose from Dr. Weiss?
A. That's Murphy's statement.
Q. Did you fire any shots before he broke loose?
A. I didn't fire until he broke loose. When I saw who it was then I went to firing when he broke loose from Murphy with the pistol in his hand.
Q. You are employed by the State Bureau of Criminal Identification?
A. Yes.
Q. How long have you been so employed?
A. In my present position?
Q. Yes.
A. I have been with the Criminal Bureau since February.
Q. Were you detailed to go with Senator Long?
A. In Louisiana, yes.
Q. You didn't go to Washington?
A. I never did.
Q. Were you under the orders of General Guerre?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What were your orders?
A. To stop any violence that might occur or anything.

Q. To Senator Long or any one else,
A. To Senator Long or any one else.
Witness excused.
George McQuiston, called as a witness, being first duly sworn by the Coroner, made the following statement:
I don't care to make any statements whatsoever.
Witness excused.
Louis C. Lesage, called as a witness, being first duly sworn by the coroner, testified as follows:
By Mr. Odom:
Q. Mr. Lesage, were you present in the Capitol last Sunday night a week ago?
A. Yes.
Q. Were you present at the time of the shooting?
A. Yes.
Q. Where were you?
A. In the east end window of the corridor leading up to the Governor's office.
Q. In the alleyway between the House and the Senate?
A. I was sitting in the east end corridor window.
Q. You were sitting there?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you see the shooting?
A. No, sir, I did not.
Q. Describe to the gentlemen what you saw.
A. I was talking to Roy Heidelberg at the time Senator Long passed by going down the corridor. I didn't pay any further attention until the first shot was fired. I just had a second to realize or come to the conclusion that probably it was a firecracker. This shooting started almost instantly; it was not over two seconds from the time I heard the first shot. I jumped out of the window and ran into the restroom of the House.
Q. Going away or towards the shooting?
A. I had to take two or three steps towards it to get in there.
Q. When did you go in the restroom?
A. When the riot of shooting started after the first shot.
Q. Were you looking in that direction?
A. Yes.
Q. Could you see what happened?
A. No, sir, I couldn't. My eyesight is not so very good. I could see a crowd of people congregated down there; I judged it to be about opposite the Governor's office.
Q. How far would you say that was from where you were sitting?
A. Probably sixty or sixty-five feet.
Q. Can you approximate about how many shots were fired?
A. No, sir, I have no idea.
Q. Can you space the time between the first and second shots?
A. Not over two seconds.
Q. Between the second and third?
A. I didn't hear the second shot; the only one I heard was the first shot and then a riot of shooting started after that.
Q. Did you recognize any of the participants?
A. No, sir, not a soul. I didn't see a shot fired.
Q. As Senator Long passed you did you recognize anybody with him?
A. The only person I remember seeing was Joe Bates. He was a considerable little distance back of the Senator. Whether he was accompanying Senator Long or not, I don't know.
Witness excused.
Elliott D. Coleman, called as a witness, being first duly sworn by the Coroner, testified as follows:
By Mr. Odom:
Q. Where do you reside?
A. Tensas Parish near Waterproof.
Q. What is your occupation?
A. I am connected with the Bureau.
Q. How long have you been so connected?
A. Since November 15, 1934.
Q. What duties were assigned to you?
A. General criminal work. Most of my work had been in the illicit whiskey traffic and other work.
Q. Were you present in the Capitol the night of the shooting?
A. Yes.
Q. Your name has been mentioned as having been present. Were you present?
A. Yes.
Q. In what capacity?
A. I was ordered to the Capitol by General Guerre to keep down any disturbance or lawlessness that might take place.
Q. Were you attached to the personnel of the man accompanying Senator Long?
A. No, sir, no such instructions were given.
Q. Did you go down the corridor with him?
A. When he came out of the House of Representatives he appeared to be alone. I turned and walked down the corridor with him to the Secretary's office. A couple of other men came on behind a little bit; maybe one was along with me or maybe a little bit behind. Senator Long went in the Governor's office and stayed a few seconds and came out and walked towards the House. When he got nearly opposite the private entrance to the Governor's office he met a bunch coming from the other direction and stopped there. He stopped there and said something about everybody being there the next morning. About that time a party off to the side stepped right up to Senator Long, pulled a gun and fired directly at Senator Long. I ran up and struck at the man that had the pistol but in the confusion my blow landed on some one else. I struck at him again and the blow carried him back because of the impact of the blow and the man who was grappling with him. Murphy Roden had grabbed him and they fell towards the marble wall and the pillar there. The man still had the gun at that time. I jerked out my gun and fired three shots. I thought probably it was a mass attack and I wheeled around and began looking things over holding my gun like this (indicating). Senator Long grabbed his stomach and said, "I am shot."
Q. Was anything said by the man who approached Senator Long that you heard?
A. Not a word, he never said anything.
Q. Was Judge Fournet with Senator Long?
A. If he was he had just walked up; I couldn't say about that.
Q. Did any one attempt to disarm this man besides you?
A. I couldn't say positively about that. I don't think any one would have had time to do it. When the second shot was fired, I thought his gun had fired.
Q. Did you grapple with him?
A. No, sir, I had hit him a blow on the jaw and followed it up to hit him again.
Q. Do you know Murphy Roden?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Was he grappling with the man who shot Senator Long?
A. Just after I hit him and he was down; Roden was there. I think he was the man; I am satisfied he was.
Q. You said you fired three shots. Was that before or after they broke loose?
A. Just as they broke loose. As far as doing it while he was on the floor, I know he was shot while he was up because he fell up against the marble post there and there was blood on that post high up.
Q. Was that at the time?
A. Roden was just out of line.
Q. Had they been grappling with the gun?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. He shot after they broke loose or before?
A. Afterwards.
Q. Did you see Mr. Roden shoot at all?
A. No, sir, because after I shot three shots I turned around and stood looking in the other direction. Shots passed me to my right at that time.
Q. When you turned around who did you recognize if any one, Mr. Coleman?
A. You mean when I looked back?
Q. Yes.
A. I don't think I could say I recognized anybody. I think Mr. Heard was there and Mr. George McQuiston.
Q. Did you see either one of those men firing?
A. No, sir.
Q. Did you see any one with a gun in his hand?
A. I saw Mr. Heard with a gun in his hand after the shooting was over.
Q. You say you thought it was a mass attack?
A. Yes, sir. I noticed some of our men.
Q. Did any have guns?
A. As I say, two of them. The others were off to my right.
Q. Mr. Coleman, could you say who fired the second shot?
A. No, sir, I thought his gun did.
Q. They were in rapid succession, were they?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Was there any appreciable delay between any of the shots?
A. No, sir, they were all together right good and then it was all over.
Witness excused.
Joe Bates, called as a witness, being first duly sworn by the coroner, testified as follows:
By Mr. Odom:
Q. Mr. Bates, did you view the shooting we are investigating?
A. Yes, sir, I did.
Q. Will you kindly tell us what you saw?
A. From the time the House adjourned?
Q. Yes.
A. Just before the House adjourned Senator Long told me to be sure and have everyone of our friends notified to be at a caucus the next morning at 9:30. That's one of my duties, to always notify our men when there is to be a caucus. I notified them. Senator Long had gone on out. The House adjourned and I left the House and came in the hall; I remember seeing Mr. Lesage there in the hall; I think Mr. Lesage was talking to some man whom I thought was Mr. Heidleberg. I might be mistaken about that. I walked on down the hall and as I got by Mr. Ellender's office I heard Senator Long say something about the meeting tomorrow morning. I answered and told him they had all been notified. He came moving fastly on up.
Q. Going on towards the Governor's office?
A. Yes, sir, he was talking to Mr. Fournet.
Q. He was going towards the Governor's office?
A. No, sir, he was out in the middle of the hall. Just about then a young man whom I did not know—dressed in white—I thought he was going to shake hands with Senator Long. He was moving out and as he did he pulled a gun, went in and shot the Senator. The Senator screamed and hollered, "He shot me" and turned and moved fastly away in a crouching position holding his stomach. I knew there were enough men there to take care of everything for what might come up. My only thought was to see where the Senator was. I thought the senator might have opened the door and gone in the Governor's office because I did not see where he went. I ran in there and hollored, "Senator Long has been shot. Tell the Governor." He was not there and I came out. All that time shooting was going on. I then thought that Senator Long might have gone farther down the hall and stumbled in the Senate lounge room; I went down there but he was not there and as I came back the shooting was over and I found out that Senator Long had gone downstairs. I came back with the idea of trying to find out who shot the Senator. He was lying there with his face down and I never did see him. I went on in the Governor's office; he wanted to go to the Senator. I came on out and went downstairs and went over to the sanitarium. I got upstairs and hung around a few minutes in the hall near the Senator's room. Joe Messina came out and said that the Senator wanted to know who shot him. I said, "I don't know." And Joe said, "He wants to know." I ran down the stairs and got in my car but I had a terrible time with the traffic.

Q. Did you see who shot Dr. Weiss?

A. No, I did not.

Q. Did you participate in the shooting?

A. No, sir, my gun was never pulled from my pocket.

Q. Who was present with Senator Long at the time of the shooting?

A. Mr. Fournet. I know who was assigned there.

Q. Who was that?

A. From our department, Mr. Roden, Mr. Messina and Paul Voitier; that's all I can tell you.

Q. Were you assigned there?

A. No, sir, I was in charge of the men. In other words, the Cossacks, as they are called, usually come to me for orders when they were on duty.

Q. Had you given them orders that night?

A. They had standing orders.

Q. Those orders were to accompany Senator Long and see that nothing happened to him?

A. They were assigned; I had nothing to do with them.

Q. You had nothing to do with giving them orders?

A. No, sir.

Q. Can you tell us how many shots Dr. Weiss fired?

A. I thought it was a low caliber weapon; I think it was only one shot.

Q. You testified that you don't know who shot Dr. Weiss?

A. No, sir.

Witness excused.

Louis Heard, called as a witness, being first duly sworn by the Coronor, testified as follows:

By Mr. Odom:

Q. Mr. Heard, you are connected with the Bureau of Criminal Identification?

A. Yes.

Q. Were you in the Capitol the night of the shooting?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you see the shooting?

A. No, sir, I was twenty-five or thirty feet from him.

Q. Tell us what you saw?

A. I saw the Senator when he left the House; I was across on the other side. When he walked out I walked out. When I got out he was in the Governor's office.

Q. How far were you away?

A. Almost at the end of the corridor. In a couple of seconds he came back out to the Governor's office like he was coming back towards the house. I turned and walked ahead of him; then I heard a shot and wheeled around and pulled my pistol out. I saw the commotion up there near the Governor's office. I turned around to see if any one else was coming up the corridor. At that time there was a whole lot of shooting.

Q. Did you see who did the shooting?

A. No, sir, there were too many people between me and where the commotion was.

Q. You testified that you yourself did not do any shooting?

A. No, sir, I did have my pistol out in my hand.

Q. Do you know who was with Senator Long when he went down to the Governors' office?

A. When he walked out of the House coming out of the door, I saw Mr. Roden, and I think, Joe Messina. Those were the only two I saw. When I got in the hall I didn't walk any farther; people were beginning to get out in the hall and the lobby.

Q. Were you assigned to go with Senator Long's party?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were you of the party?

A. Yes.

Q. You didn't keep up with them?

A. No, sir.

Q. From whom did you get your orders?

A. General Guerre.

Q. What were your orders?

A. To keep disorders down and not let the Senator get hurt.

Q. You were just assigned to Senator Long when he was here?

A. Yes.

Q. You didn't go to Washington?

A. No, sir.

Witness excused.

Paul Voitier, called as a witness, being first duly sworn by the Coronor, testified as follows:

By Mr. Odom:

Q. Were you present at the Capitol at the time of the shooting?

A. I was.

Q. What was your business there?

A. My business was to stay with the Senator.

Q. Were you connected with the Bureau of Criminal Identification?

A. I am.

Q. Just what were your orders?

A. To see that nothing happened to Senator Long.

Q. How long had you been assigned to him?

A. The present job I have now, I think, last October, but I am in close contact with Senator Long now for four years, probably going on five years.

Q. Since October you were assigned to stay with him continuously?

A. No, sir, four years, nearly five years. When Allen ran for Governor I met Senator Long.

Q. Did you go to Washington with him?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where were you when the shooting took place?

A. Three or four feet from Senator Long.

Q. Did you see the shooting?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you see the man who shot him?

A. Yes.

Q. Were you facing Senator Long or the man who shot him?

A. All together I was about two feet in the rear of Senator Long and about one foot from Weiss, the man who done the shooting.

Q. Just describe what you saw.

A. Senator Long walked out of the secretary's office, the Governor's secretary's office; he said that he would like to have all of his men appear tomorrow early, talking to Mr. Bates, I think. I was in about two feet of him all the time. The Senator walked towards Mr. Bates. He stopped right in front of the main door to the Governor's office, in the circle like right there. He was about there one or two seconds when this man—I learned later he was Dr. Weiss—passed on the side of Senator Long, not saying a word. He had a gun in his right hand, if I am not mistaken, with his left hand covering it. He made two steps towards Senator Long and fired his gun. The gun must have been one or two inches from Senator Long's side when he fired the gun.

Q. What happened then?

A. Senator Long, I think, said, "I am shot." It was Judge Fournet that knocked his hand down; in the meantime, Mr. Coleman, he rushed in and punched at Weiss after Weiss fired the shot, Mr. Coleman walked in and punched at Weiss, and, I think, struck Weiss and punched again and missed Weiss. I think he hit Senator Long in the mouth right where that bruise was.

Q. Who did that?

A. Coleman, he punched Weiss, and punched——.

Q. What happened after that?

A. I backed away one or two steps and kept shooting.

Q. What was Dr. Weiss doing at the time you began shooting?

A. Struggling with Murphy Roden and Judge Fournet; Dr. Weiss was in a position like this (indicating) with his two hands on the gun trying to pull it clear. He was finding it mighty hard to pull the gun away.

Q. How far were you from him?

A. About five feet.

Q. When you opened fire, did you shoot him in the rear or in the front?

A. In front.

Q. How could you do that?

A. I shot between Judge Fournet and Murphy Roden.

Q. How many times did you shoot?

A. Four times; then I backed away and made one more shot. All the time he was on his feet.

Q. Why did you shoot Dr. Weiss?

A. It looked like he wanted to shoot everybody around there.

Q. Mostly because he shot Senator Long?

A. Yes, and to protect myself and the others there.

Q. What do you mean when you say "mostly?"

A. My answer is this: I shot him because he shot Senator Long and tried to shoot me and anybody else around.

Q. Did you see anybody else firing?

A. No, sir.

Q. What sort of pistol did you have?

A. 38.

Witness excused.

L. M. Wimberly, called as a witness, being first duly sworn by the Coronor, testified as follows:

By Mr. Odom:

Q. You are a member of the House of Representatives, Mr. Wimberly?

A. Yes, from Bienville Parish.

Q. Were you present in the Capitol the night of the shooting?

A. Yes, part of the time.

Q. Kindly relate just what part you witnessed, what you saw and what you heard.

A. Immediately after the House adjourned, I walked out of the House chamber and proceeded up the corridor towards the Governor's office. As I got part the way up there I noticed Murphy Roden back back from the door. He attracted my attention as if he were clowning, so to speak, kind of like a goose-step, marching backwards that way. Senator Long came out the door; about the time he came out and turned around he made a remark to somebody: "We have got to have all our men present in the morning." He was answered by some one who said that had been attended to. Judge Fournet had about reached Senator Long. He was proceeding in the same direction I was, from the House chamber towards the Governor's office. At that time a man approached Senator Long, passed Murphy Roden and was between Judge Fournet and Senator Long when the shot was fired. Senator Long screamed out in pain and bent over and grabbed himself in the stomach. He said, "You have shot me," and his knees sagged and he struggled out.

Q. Long's knees?

A. Yes. At that time another shot was fired and seemed to me that somebody either pushed or shoved Murphy Roden, and I since learned Dr. Weiss, backward. At that time innumerable shots were fired, more on the order of a machine gun firing. They were firing so rapidly and bullets were ricocheting down that corridor so that I turned and sought cover.

Q. How close were you to Senator Long when he was shot?

A. About the third window there (indicating).

Q. Did you hear any remarks or any conversation passed between Senator Long and the man whom you subsequently learned was Dr. Weiss?

A. I did not.

Q. Were you close enough to have heard it?

A. I did not hear any but I heard other conversation and Senator Long speaks exceptionally loud.

Q. Who did you say you saw shooting?

A. At the time several people around there; this happened very quickly, much quicker than it takes me to tell it. When the shots were fired I naturally realized I had to get out of the way; they were firing towards me.

Q. Did you identify any one who was firing?

A. No, sir, I couldn't say.

Q. What position was Dr. Weiss in when fire was open on him?

A. I would say during the time he and Mr. Roden were struggling and it appeared that there was somebody else in the scuffle when the firing took place.

Q. Was there any scuffling when the second shot was fired?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you see them when they broke away?

A. No, sir, I went out the same door I came in.

Q. More quickly?

A. More quickly but not as fast as the man behind me, and I moved rather quickly myself.

THE CAREER OF HUEY P. LONG, JR.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President—

And it is here under this oak where Evangeline waited for her lover, Gabriel, who never came. This oak is an immortal spot, made so by Longfellow's poem, but Evangeline is not the only one who has waited here in disappointment.

Where are the schools that you have waited for your children to have, that have never come? Where are the roads and the highways that you send your money to build, that are no nearer now than ever before, Where are the institutions to care for the sick and disabled? Evangeline wept bitter tears in her disappointment, but it lasted only through one lifetime. Your tears in this country, around this oak, have lasted for generations. Give me the chance to dry the eyes of those who still weep here.—HUEY P. LONG

It has been 58 years since my father stood in the shade of that beautiful oak in St. Martin Parish and asked the people of Louisiana to trust him with their hopes and aspirations. His words were not the empty, demagogic promises so often made by politicians of that day. They were the sincere words of a man who was on the verge of taking Louisiana by storm and would soon assure himself a place as the most outstanding and successful Governor in our Nation's history.

Huey Long was nothing like those Governors who had preceded him. He was a brash young man who scoffed at the status quo, which for too long had kept most of the State's population chained in poverty, disenfranchised from the elective process. To be sure, he made many bitter enemies and was almost impeached by his opponents whose excessive advantage was threatened by his successes. It cannot, however, be disputed that Huey Long was a man of his word. He kept the promises that had been so casually abandoned by others. At a time when the common man had lost much of his faith in government's ability to work for the people's good, Huey Long appeared and restored that faith.

He promised the people roads where there was mostly dirt and mud. He kept that promise, building thousands of miles of concrete, asphalt, and gravel roads in just a few short years. He promised better schools and educational opportunities for a population that was largely illiterate. He kept that promise and built an educational system which for the first time gave opportunities for learning to all children, not just the privileged few. He told the people that government would provide them health care, when they could not afford it. That promise, like the others, was fulfilled. He ensured that a newborn child in the State's charity hospital had the proper care and within a few years the mortality rate dropped by more than one-fourth.

In matters of my father's life, I am a prejudiced man. He is my hero, the one person in this world who has inspired me above all others. But prejudice does not necessarily mean that your view of the matter is distorted or without basis in fact. It simply means that you have an opinion about a matter. In that regard, my view is indeed a prejudiced one. But this view is one that also sees Huey Long as a mortal man, not perfect by any means, with weaknesses like everyone. However, I strongly believe that what motivated my father was his love for mankind and his belief that every man and woman deserved the opportunity to enjoy a good life.

It has been 50 years since my father was struck down by an assassin's bullet in the marble halls of the State capitol in Baton Rouge. Although I was only 16 years old at the time, I was old enough to understand what was happening around me and to appreciate the wisdom and good sense of my father's philosophy. His idealism and love of the common man moved me to enter politics and run for the U.S. Senate 13 years after his death. I hope that he would be proud of me today, for I have tried to champion the causes of those who need a friend in government and to work to build a system which encourages everyone to enjoy a meaningful place in our economic system.

I do not believe in those ideals mainly because they were espoused by my father. I believe in them because they are right and motivated by a deep regard for the good of this country, with compassion for those less fortunate.

As a member of the railroad commission—now known as the public service commission—as Governor of Louisiana and then as a U.S. Senator my father preached fervently of the path this Nation needed to take if our form of Government was to survive.

Huey Long believed that the Government must provide better opportunity for the rank and file Americans. Simply put, he maintained the Government should assure all citizens' potential for leading the good life. It had to stand for the proposition that those who made an effort and worked diligently would have an opportunity to make something of themselves, to have a decent income and enjoy some of the good things. To my father's way of thinking, this was not too much to ask of a government that was founded on the principle that every man has a right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

There is no doubt that Huey Long was ahead of his time in this regard. Just examine his Share the Wealth Program. Long before this country had unemployment insurance, he was advocating a program by which the Government would help those who, by no fault of their own, lost their jobs and simply could not afford to support their families. Eventually, the leaders of this country saw the wisdom in this and enacted the proper legislation, legislation that Huey Long had been advocating for years.

He was calling for a Social Welfare Program long before President Roosevelt proposed one. In fact, when Roosevelt presented his Social Security Program, he showed he was concerned about what Huey Long was proposing. Roosevelt administered it as insurance, requiring people to contribute for a certain period of time before becoming eligible for benefits.

Remember, this was in the midst of a cruel depression. Under Roosevelt's plan, the elderly got very little immediate help. They needed assistance, but had to wait for years before the help did them much good. Huey's idea was to launch right into a major program that would immediately begin lifting people out of poverty. The fact that it could be done the way he had in mind was demonstrated in my Uncle Earl Long's time as Governor. He promised there would be an old-age pension and we did it immediately and with a substantial portion of it paid with State funds.

I believe my father was correct in maintaining that the Government did not need to take the time it did in building up reserves before helping those in need. The fact is that Social Security today is more an intergenerational transfer payment with little in the way of reserves, somewhat as Huey would have had it. He respected the insurance principle, but I know he would not have wanted millions of aged persons living for years in poverty and wretchedness.

President Johnson, who as a young Congressman was close to President Roosevelt, once acknowledged my father's contribution to Social Security.

He thought that the old folks ought to have Social Security and old age pensions and I remember when he just scared the dickens out of Mr. Roosevelt and went on a nationwide radio hookup talking for old folks' pensions.

President Johnson said in a speech in New Orleans in 1964:

And out of this probably came our Social Security system.

Huey Long was looking down the road, with great vision, toward where I still think we should be headed in this country. The whole basis of his philosophy for the Nation was that none should be too rich and none too poor.

His contribution was extraordinary on the Federal scene. He forced the Roosevelt administration to alter the course it had chosen and forced it down a path that would turn out to be the way of the future. It was a course based on the belief that our Government should provide more security and better opportunity for everyone.

Because of Huey's prodding, the Federal Government did a lot more for the average man and for the less fortunate. But there is no doubt that if Huey had had his way, the Great Depression would not have been as severe. With Huey Long leading the way, I doubt it would have taken World War II to end the needless pain and suffering that afflicted this land for 12 years.

One of the earliest stories I heard about my father happened before I was born, but is very characteristic of the kind of man he was. Before he ever sought public office, he and my mother were living in Shreveport, LA. Every morning my father would ride the street car, which ran right in front of the house, to work and back at night. But one day the company raised its fare from 5 cents to 7 cents. You might not think 7 cents is much, but at that time a nickel was like a dollar today, considering how hard it was to earn money and how little people made when they did work.

Huey was outraged and he announced that he would file suit to restore the 5 cent fare. Meanwhile, he would refuse to ride the street car, even though it rolled right in front of his house.

So every morning he would walk down the tracks about 2 miles to his little office in the First National Bank Building. At night, he would walk back home. The men working on the railroad tracks thought he must be crazy. They would call out to him and he would wave back. I am sure they must have said to themselves, "There's that crazy kid Huey Long. He thinks he's going to make them put that street car fare back to 5 cents."

Well, he won the law suit, the fare was lowered back to 5 cents and he started riding the street car again. He made no money from that case, but that is not what he wanted. He told my mother at the time:

You know, if you want to be in public office and serve the people, you need to prove to them that you can do something for them.

Getting that 7-cent fare down to 5 cents proved a point: He was a man of action. It was not too long before he was elected to the public service commission. As public service commissioner he went to work even harder to establish himself as a person who could help the rank and file of citizens.

Huey was elected to the Louisiana Public Service Commission, then called the railroad commission, about the time of my birth. The campaign for public office kept him away from home much of the time and for that reason he was not in Shreveport when I was born. When the doctor asked my mother what she wanted to name me, she told him she had decided upon Huey P. Long III, after my father who was Huey Junior. My father, however, had other ideas. When he arrived back in town, he demanded that my name be changed.

He told my mother:

I was Huey Long Jr. and I hated being little Huey all my life. I'm not going to wish that off on a son. Furthermore, when a man is in politics he almost always winds up being repudiated. It's better for the boy to have his own name so if things go badly for me, he can have his own name to make it on.

So, he insisted I be named something else. It so happened that my parents had a respected banker friend, a relative of my mother's, Russell Billiu. They gave me his name and from then on I was known as Russell.

About 20 years later, when I joined the Navy, I needed a copy of my birth certificate. It was then that I discovered my name was still officially Huey P. Long III. Nothing hurt me more than to change my name to what it had been all my life. But if I had not, people would have assumed I was trying to capitalize on my father's name. I thought since I had always been known as Russell, I ought to honor his wish and have my own name and not his.

Huey knew early in his career that he would be controversial and make quite a few enemies, but it never stopped him from doing what he thought was right. Once, he was convinced that the electric company was charging too much. So he filed a law suit and made them refund checks all over the State to people who had been overcharged. Wherever prople wanted service, he took a great interest in it and was very aggressive at making the utilities give their customers a better deal.

Huey was never one to shy away from a fight and to try to change the system when he thought it was treating people unfairly. It was not too long before he started focusing his attention on those old families who owned most of the wealth in our State who had a way of claiming too much advantage and too much privilege for themselves. The rank and file, from his point of view, were not being treated fairly. The people who had the best of it just kept on getting the best of it and those who never had much chance continued to have very little chance. He wanted to do something to change all of that and went to work campaigning for Governor on the promise that the average man was going to get a better deal.

The first time he ran for Governor he lost. I have always maintained he lost, not because he lacked the support of the people, but because it rained all day long on election day. At that time, it was impossible to find more than a few miles of good roads anywhere in the entire State.

In fact, there were hardly any gravel roads worthy of the name, much less hard surface roads. The farmers and people in the rural areas where his supporters were the most numerous were essentially immobilized by the rain, especially in north Louisiana where he was most popular.

He tells a story in his autobiography. He said a friend asked him, "Have you heard about the first box out of Red River Parish?

"No, tell me about it," he said.

"That box is for you 50 to 1."

"Then that means I'm beat," he said. "That box should have been 100 to 2."

The story was different in New Orleans. There the people could get to the polls with relative ease, without having to trudge through miles and miles of mud. In New Orleans, he lost badly, but the weather was not the only reason.

In those days, the Old Regulars' organization had New Orleans so organized that they could deliver to their candidate, even though you may be a very popular candidate running against him. In years to come, he found he would have to build himself an organization able to contend with the Old Regulars in New Orleans and eventually he did to where, shortly before his death, he was successful in defeating the Old Regulars even in the city of New Orleans, but that took years to do.

Back at that time New Orleans had the ultimate in terms of home rule and nobody, not even the Governor, dared to interfere with the city's affairs, especially its elections. So on election day, when Huey's people would cry foul or try to defend their rights, the police would come and arrest all the Long poll commissioners and haul them off to jail, leaving the Old Regulars' commissioners to do their mischief. At that point, you would be finished. They did not have to be in complete control to those polls very long to make sure that the outcome was to their ultimate satisfaction.

In addition, the Old Regulars had thousands of people on the voting rolls who did not belong there. Some were dead and some were sailors coming through town who had registered to vote. Election day would come and the the sailors would be long gone, but curiously they still voted.

Huey soon learned that if he were going to be successful and do some good for Louisiana, he must learn to beat those people at their own game. So many people talk about how ruthless Huey was and the lengths he would go to win an election. Huey Long was simply fighting fire with fire.

Four years later, in 1928, Huey ran again and this time, of course, he won. I can still recall that election day vividly. I was a young fellow, just turning 10 years of age. My sister, my brother, and I were in tears because those early returns coming in out of New Orleans were overwhelmingly against our father. He called and told my mother that he was going to win that race. He had checked all over the State and the early returns for the precincts he counted on carrying were going just the way he thought they should. That was hard to believe when you have been seeing those early returns that looked so bleak.

The following day was a very bad one for us children at school. All the kids in school were just delighted to see that our father was trailing badly and probably was going to lose the election. But to their surprise, it had all turned around the following day and Huey was ahead. My mother went out and got three newspapers and pinned the headlines—"Long Leading" and "Long Takes Lead"—on each one of us children to let our classmates know that Huey was now leading and that he had been elected.

Once elected, he went to work to fulfill his campaign promises. And he did. Among them was his commitment to provide schoolbooks for little children.

He had told the people that there would be free schoolbooks for children and he kept that promise. I can recall that when I was a youngster the schools were all segregated. But even at schools for the white children I can recall that after the young people had been there for a few days, if their parents had not been able to buy them textbooks, the teacher would ask those poor little children to leave and not come back.

Mr. President, when free schoolbooks went in, enrollment of public schools increased by 20 percent. Think of all the little children who had been losing their chance in life because their parents could not afford those books.

It is very tragic to think of all the little children who lost their chance in life because their parents could not afford to buy them school books. Huey changed that and made sure that every child in Louisiana would have text books. He made himself quite a few enemies by doing that because he forced the oil companies to pay for it by drastically increasing the severance tax. One already existed, but he contended it should be much higher. Needless to say, that caused an uproar among the opposition. A friend of mine once said that those people who were against my father were not against children having schoolbooks. They were not against good roads and they were not against good hospitals. They were not really against any of that. They hated Huey because he made them pay for all that.

Possibly more than anyone else in his time, he fully recognized that you really cannot make an omelet without breaking some eggs. He knew that you will make some enemies if you plan to make some changes in the way government operates.

For example, after he had levied the tax and had put free textbooks in the schools, the Caddo Parish School Board was still refusing to accept them, saying they did not need a handout from the State. About that time, however, the people in Caddo Parish learned that the government was planning to establish an airbase in Bossier Parish, right across the Red River. But when the parish leaders came to Huey and asked him to routinely sign over some State property for the base, he refused to sign it.

Those Caddo Parish people were just outraged because they might lose this base and the hundreds of jobs that went with it. But Huey told them, "You people are so rich up there that you say the children don't need free schoolbooks. What do you need with an Air Force base if you're that rich?"

They had to swallow their pride and permit the children to have the free books if they wanted to have Barksdale Field. I'm not sure if he would have been willing to lose the base just to get free books in the school. I suspect he was playing a bluffer's hand. But to hear the other side talk, you would have thought he had committed an impeachable offense. In fact, when an effort was made to impeach him, speakers from Shreveport were heard orating about his tyrannical methods of forcing government-owned books into the hands of proud families who wanted none of it.

But that was the way it was when it came to my father. People either loved him or despised him. There never was, or has been, much in between.

THE OLD REGULARS AND THE STATUS QUO

Those Louisianians who never had to drive a car across the State in the 1920's cannot fully appreciate what Huey did for our State. When he became Governor in 1928, there was less than 100 miles of hard-surface roads in the entire State. Today, there are more than that in every individual parish. But then, if you were to add all the concrete and all the asphalt roads together, there would be less than a hundred miles, with a few other miles under construction.

During the 4-year period he was Governor, in spite of more opposition than any Governor has ever had before or since, he still managed to build a total of 2,300 miles of hard-surface roads. Two-thirds of that was modern, concrete highway, some of the best concrete roads in the United States at that point. That is enough road to build a highway from Baton Rouge to New York, and then build another from Baton Rouge to Chicago. All of this was in one relatively small State in a period of about 3 years, because it took about a year to obtain the authorizations, money, and rights-of-way to get started.

Under his administration, the effort to build roads in Louisiana exceeded that of New York, which was a very progressive State. New York, after all, had six times our population. Louisiana, which was 2 percent of the Nation's population, was employing 10 percent of all those people in the country who were working on road projects, which was five times the national average. Most of that was during a time of depression when a large percentage of workers in country was unemployed.

Not only did he build roads, but he built 111 bridges. Did he receive a lot of acclaim from others who were in power? Not at all. Instead, they tried to impeach him.

Today, when you hear about Huey Long, you are likely to hear that he was almost impeached as Governor. To the unknowing, it would seem that the legislature of a great State would only seek to remove a Governor from office if he had done some dastardly deed. In my father's case, however, nothing could be further from the truth. Those people were angry at him because he was out to make the rich pay more taxes so the average family could live a better life.

There were a few outlandish charges against him, but the only one that passed was one alleging he had threatened to reveal certain information that might embarrass a prominent Louisiana opposition family. His defense was that it could hardly be an impeachable offense to reveal something that is a matter of public record. If it were a public record, then anyone had access to it.

Huey's people got busy and they found 15 senators willing to sign a statement declaring that they would not vote to impeach him no matter what the evidence. Those 15 votes meant that his opponents were beaten because they would not be able to get the majority they needed to convict him.

The position of those senators was that the session had been called for a certain number of days and the time for the session had expired, so the legislature had no right to extend it, without the Governor's consent. Although they could have proceeded with impeachment as a farce and a rump trial if they wished, Huey's opponents knew that would be useless. So they gave up, reluctantly and voted to adjourn.

TO WASHINGTON

Today most Governors who are regarded as great Governors are remembered because they did something significant for roads or for education. Taking those criteria alone, Huey was more outstanding in both respects than any Governor in this country's history, to my knowledge.

He arranged it so that a young person whose family had no means whatsoever to attend Louisiana State University could get a good education by means of a large number of work scholarships. For example, students produced and prepared the food that was served on campus.

I remember so many young people, my classmates, who went to school with no more than the shirt on their back. But Huey provided opportunities for young people to work and pay for their education. And a lot of those young people have been some of the outstanding leaders in our State and Nation since that time. Today, in large measure because of Huey's leadership and example, our Government's policy is to help those young people who cannot otherwise afford a college education.

In doing what he did, he took taxes off those who were least able to pay. When Huey became Governor, there were taxes on a man's cow, his hog, just about anything the Government could find to tax. Huey eliminated those taxes on a farmer's livestock and eventually was able to enact the homestead exemption so that the first $2,000 of assessed valuation, equal to about $30,000 today, would be untaxed. That meant that most people no longer paid a tax on their homes or small farms.

Another example of Huey's compassion: During the Depression, when the little people had no income and could not find the money to pay their bills, the banks would simply foreclose on them and take what little they did have for payment. Huey provided the leadership for a debt moratorium commission, a body set up so that a man could go before it and explain that he was doing his best but that he was on hard times. The commission would usually arrange to give him more time. It would say that a person could not be foreclosed on, allow the debtor more time and would find ways to have the State use its credit to assure the bank would eventually be paid.

He went to Washington in 1932, elected by the people as U.S. Senator and began to spell out his views about his Share the Wealth Program. Incidentally, he later changed their name to "Share Our Wealth Program," feeling that all the people of the country had a claim on the wealth of this great Nation. His theory was that most of our trouble comes from greed. His view was that we have enough of everything in this great country so that most people can live a comfortable life. He believed that the country permits a few people to hog up so much of the wealth that there is just not enough left for the remainder to have a fair share.

His argument was that if you tax away some of the money that those very wealthy people have and then spread it among those who were poor by providing them a home, some furniture, and an auto and paid a pension to the aged and put the unemployed to work on some desirable public works then the rest of the people could live a decent life. Basically, he wanted to assure that every family would have a home, an automobile, a reasonable amount of furniture—enough so they could live decently. Moreover, he wanted to assure that everyone would have a job and a chance to have an education. He wanted all the elderly to have a pension when they reached their declining years.

From the day he made his maiden speech, entitled "The Doom of America's Dream," he was branded by the special interests as a dangerous populist.

He kept speaking out for that until President Roosevelt found that he was going to have to change his way of doing business to keep Huey from stealing all his thunder. When Roosevelt was first elected President, he ran on the platform that could please anybody. Liberals and the conservatives both found things they liked. But in due course, the liberals, Huey in particular, found reason to be dissatisfied, and Huey would make his speeches to the effect that Roosevelt had claimed conditions would be better although they were getting worse and continued to get worse. So much so that Roosevelt decided he was going to have to change his approach. And he decided he would support a Social Security Program which, of course, Huey was glad to vote for, although it did not do near as much for the aged as Huey would like to have done. It required building up larger reserves before they could receive the benefits they would have otherwise.

I suppose Roosevelt had promised all sorts of things when he was running for president as most candidates tend to do. But he had campaigned in such a way that many rich and conservative people thought he was their man. The working folks, too, thought that he was on their side. But in the last analysis, the people from New York, where he was from, did not expect him to do many of the things that Huey Long was talking about.

So Roosevelt got off to a very conservative start, until he and his people started looking at polls that indicated that if Huey Long kept touting his program and ran as a third party candidate, Mr. Roosevelt was not going to be reelected. Huey probably would not have won the election either, but he would have gathered enough votes so that Roosevelt would have run behind the Republican candidate. That had Roosevelt worried. I have talked to people since that day who were with Mr. Roosevelt at the time who tell me just how scared he was of the impact of my father's proposals among the people generally.

One of those people told me that he was in the White House during the days they were talking about how they would deal with Social Security and that Roosevelt had just a great deal more to say about Huey Long than he did about Social Security. Lyndon Johnson was a good friend of President Roosevelt and he said that because of what Huey Long was saying and the way it was catching on in the country, Roosevelt felt that he had to endorse some kind of Social Security Program. It is very clear to me that my father played a major role in the birth of a system by which our Government became more humane and set out to actively pursue a policy of creating jobs, rather than to leave people idle, homeless, and hopeless.

Of course, Roosevelt did not give Huey Long credit for what was being accomplished at that time. Since then, however, I have heard from many people, even those who were once enemies of my father, who tell me there was not any doubt why Roosevelt was moving in a more liberal direction. He was doing it because he was seeing the rising star of Huey Long moving on him and if he did not do something, he might not be reelected.

There was one thing, however, that President Roosevelt did credit to Huey Long a year or so after his death. It was the National Youth Administration, the program that gave young people all across the Nation a chance to work their way through school. And since that time, we have gone beyond that to make it a great deal easier for young people to attend college.

Mr. President, I have already addressed myself to the assassination. I would like to add one aspect to that matter. I doubt that my father would have been assassinated had he not succeeded in repealing the poll tax. Prior to the time he repealed the poll tax, he was winning the elections by somewhere between 50 and 60 percent of the vote. But you could see great numbers of people who were unable to vote because they could not afford to pay the poll tax, who would vote even if they could. It stands to reason that about 75 percent or more of the whites who could not vote would have voted for him if they had been free to do so.

This repeal of the poll tax did little to help the blacks. They were barred from voting by a so-called white Democratic primary, and he did not attempt to change that at that time because he felt to do so would cause him to be crucified on a cross as it so often happened to liberal Southern politicians. But he did feel that at least he should provide the leadership to start moving in expanding the electorate, and to fix it so that the poor whites could vote. What he did almost doubled the electorate. He never lived to see the results of that. If he had, he would have been winning the electorate by more than 70 percent.

Mr. President, if he had lived in a day such as we have today of the Federal voting rights laws, the blacks who constitute about 30 percent of the population of the State would have also been privileged to vote. How would they have voted? I know how they voted when I was a condidate on the ballot. About 95 percent or more voted for me. When Earl Long was a candidate for Governor, on more occasions than one, about 95 percent of the blacks voted for him. It is fair to assume that Huey would have had about the same thing.

When the opposition saw that they were not going to be able to defeat him at the polls, that caused many of them to feel that they should consider killing the man to have their way. Mr. President, I doubt that the man who appears to have assassinated my father would have wanted to make that move had he known or at least believed what Huey really had in mind. Huey Long had thought that it was too much to keep going back and forth from Washington to Louisiana to try to help a Governor and his friends do business in the State legislature and maintain control of the State every time the opposition sought to overthrow them.

He concluded that he should help to reelect his friends, run for reelection himself at the same election, then, to use his term, "to push the boat way from the shore"—leave it with a Governor who was competent, honest, and who would not tolerate dishonesty in others and to manage the affairs in his own way. He picked out the man he thought was qualified to do that.

That man is known to us who served here for more than 30 years as a great U.S. Senator. Allen Ellender was one of the most straightlaced men I have ever known in politics in my life. If Allen Ellender had been the Governor of the State, we would not have had the scandal that occurred years after Huey Long's death. It seems very unfair to me that many in the media sought to blame him for the scandals that occurred later on, years after his death when he was not the one who was responsibile for it.

None of the corruption in the years after his death could be traced to him for the simple reason that while he was calling the signals when he was Governor and Senator he did not tolerate corruption.

The scandal would not have occurred had his so-called political heirs listened to my mother, who pleaded to them to support Allen Ellender because he was the man she knew Huey Long wanted to succeed him as Governor. Had his opposition known that he was planning to support an independent type man who was as honest as the day is long and intolerant of corruption in others, I think many of them would have looked differently upon their thoughts about him. I think that even the person who shot him would have thought differently about his desire to kill Huey Long because he did not like the way Huey Long was doing business. I think he would have been willing to tolerate Huey making speeches here in Washington and advocating his share of the wealth program had he thought he was not the dominant force in local Louisiana politics.

It may make a point to suggest that we will never achieve perfection on this side of heaven, probably because we do not deserve it. Perhaps this world was intended to be a testing place rather than the ideal. Why else do we endlessly fail to appreciate good people until they are gone, and fail to trust those who are worthy of it until it is too late? In my own case, I have been elected to the U.S. Senate on 7 consecutive times over a period of 38 years. My first election at age 30 was by a close vote, but since that time I have achieved some very large majorities. The closest of the races found me ahead of my nearest opponent by 20 percentage points and I have had majorities of as much as 87 percent, 75 percent, 66 percent, and 70 percent, some of them against opposition that may have deserved more votes than they achieved. In some cases, I have been elected without any opposition whatsoever.

Mr. President, I have won not just some, but almost all of my victories, by larger margins than my father ever achieved. That was in spite of a statewide media which was thoroughly unfair and constantly critical of Huey Long for the last 50 years when he was not alive to defend himself.

Yet, I am convinced that much of my success, even in recent years, was because of my father. How could that be? It was because those who had heard him speak more than 50 years ago, by word of mouth, had a way of expressing their favorable opinions of him in spite of uniformly adverse comment both in print and over the electronic media for 50 years.

With those who had known and supported the man, he was the greatest Governor, not just in Louisiana, but in any State, ever. Those who shared that opinion represented about 60 percent of those who were privileged to vote when Huey Long was on the scene. They represented more than 75 percent of those who were white and could not vote and about 95 percent of those who were black and also could not vote. In other words, had Huey enjoyed the benefit of the Federal voting rights laws, he would have been achieving more than 75 percent of the vote in honest elections.

Among those who were old enough to know Huey Long and recall his speeches, he still rates in the polls more popular than any other Governor. Why? I will always maintain it is because those who knew Huey Long will always remember what he did for them. Neither they, nor I, will ever forget the price he paid for trying to make this world a better place.

He stated his dream for American eloquently in the concluding lines of his autobiography when he said:

> Then no tear dimmed eyes of a small child will be lifted into the saddened face of a father or mother unable to give it the necessities required by its soul and body for life; then the powerful will be rebuked in the sight of man for holding that which they cannot consume, but which is craved to sustain humanity; the food of the land will feed, the raiment clothe and the houses shelter all the people; the powerful will be elated by the well being of all, rather than through greed.

THE 50TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE DEATH OF SENATOR HUEY PIERCE LONG

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, 50 years ago today, September 10, 1935, Senator Huey Pierce Long of Louisiana died from an assassin's bullet. The distinguished Senator RUSSELL LONG has made some brief remarks in this regard earlier. I feel it is appropriate that this Chamber take the time today to reflect upon the memory of this great American, a distinguished Senator, the father of our own beloved colleague, Senator RUSSELL LONG.

Senator Huey Long was one of the most colorful persons ever to sit in this body. His flamboyant style and controversial methods have been portrayed in a plethora of books, movies, and songs. But the emphasis on his style and methods often distracts from the meaning of his life and political career, both of which were, tragically, far too short.

Born August 30, 1893, in Winnfield, LA. Huey Long seemed destined for a life of public service, and of helping the weak, the underprivileged, and the dispossessed. Regarding his career as a lawyer, Huey Long recalled: "Always my cases were on the side of the small man—the underdog, I have never taken a case against a poor person," he proudly proclaimed.

In 1918, at the age of 25, he was elected State railroad commissioner. In this position, he secured a reduction in telephone rates for the people of his State, prevented rate increases on street-railways, and attacked corporate abuses.

In 1928, Huey Long was elected Governor of Louisiana. His administration resulted in badly needed reforms for his State, free textbooks for the State's schoolchildren, and new bridges, paved roads, and other improvements. New hospitals were built; old ones were modernized; and his beloved Louisiana State University was vastly expanded and improved.

Taxes on the State's oil and gas industries were increased to pay for the programs of Governor Long, while the State's poll tax was abolished to increase the participation of the State's "poor whites" in the democratic process.

In 1930, Huey Long was elected to the U.S. Senate. In his maiden speech to this body, "The Doom of America's Dream," which he delivered amidst the worst days of the Great Depression, Senator Long remarked:

> This great and grand dream of America that all men are created equal * * * this great dream of America, this great light, and this great hope, have almost gone out of sight in this day and time * * * there is a mere candle flicker here and yonder to take the place of what the great dream of America was supposed to be.

Senator Long planned to resurrect the fading American dream with his "share the wealth" program which proposed a homestead allowance and a minimum annual income for every American family. He further proposed to redistribute wealth through limitation of inheritances, heavier taxes on the higher brackets, old-age assistance to the elderly poor, public works, and balancing farm production with farm consumption.

Although the feasibility of some of his plans and ideas has been questioned or challenged, it is certain that he was trying to ensure that every American could and would have a life of economic security and social dignity.

If some of his proposals were infeasible, his heart and mind were in the right place. If some of his plans were in error, at least he erred in trying to make life more comfortable and better for all the people, the poor as well as the rich, the weak as well as the powerful.

As a result, Senator Huey Long developed a tremendous following, not only in Louisiana but also throughout the country. Historian David Potter writes that Senator Long "was second only to the President (Roosevelt) in political importance when he went to Louisiana * * * for a special session of the (State's) legislature." While there, on September 8, 1935, Senator Long was shot by an assassin; he died 2 days latter—50 years ago today.

Upon the death of Senator Long, Senate Majority Leader Alben Barkley said,

> Life is not measured in years. Many men have lived to be 80, 90, or even 100 years old without accomplishing as much in the causes in which they believed and for which they fought as Huey Long accomplished in 40-odd years.

Then, too, there were the words of another U.S. Senator who also fell to an assassin's bullet. In his book, "Profiles in Courage," John F. Kennedy said:

> Must men conscientiously risk their careers only for principles which hindsight declares to be correct, in order for posterity to honor them for their valor? I think not . . . Surely in the United States of America, where brother once fought brother, we did not judge a man's bravery under fire by examining the banner under which he fought.

Senator Huey Long, however, never considered his actions and policies to require defense or explanation. He knew what he sought, and he never asked for quarter.

I think it is appropriate, as we acknowledge the memory of this larger-than-life American, to recall some lines from his favorite poem, "Invictus"—lines which themselves adequately summarize the life and political career of Senator Long:

> In the fell clutch of circumstance
> I have not winced nor cried aloud.
> Under the bludgeonings of chance
> My head is bloody but unbowed. * * *
> It matters not how strait the gate,
> How charged with punishment the scroll,
> I am the master of my fate;
> I am the captain of my soul.

Mr. President, the Scriptures teach us to "Honor thy father and thy mother." Senator RUSSELL LONG has honored his father and his mother—by words and by deeds. In so doing, he has brought honor upon himself. All Members of this body revere Senator RUSSELL LONG. Every Member counts him as a friend. He is a great Senator, a great Louisianian, a great American. History will long honor the memory of Senator Huey Long, and we will long honor the memory of the name of Senator RUSSELL LONG after he departs from membership in this body—which he has announced he will do voluntarily at the close of the 99th Congress.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

ANTI-APARTHEID ACTION ACT OF 1985

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to proceed to consider the conference report on H.R. 1460 and offer a cloture motion on the motion to proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. HECHT]. The clerk will report the cloture motion.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

CLOTURE MOTION

We, the undersigned Senators, in accordance with the provisions of Rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, hereby move to bring to a close debate on the motion to proceed to the consideration of the Conference Report on H.R. 1460, The Anti-Apartheid Action Act of 1985.

Edward M. Kennedy, Paul Simon, John D. Rockefeller IV, Bill Proxmire, John F. Kerry, Spark M. Matsunaga, Max Baucus, George J. Mitchell, David Pryor, John Melcher, Gary Hart, Howard M. Metzenbaum, Lawton Chiles, Dale Bumpers, Don W. Riegle, Jr., Alan J. Dixon, J. James Exon, Patrick J. Leahy, Claiborne Pell, and Alan Cranston.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I withdraw the motion to proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is withdrawn.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. As I understand it then, the impact of this would be another cloture vote, not on the conference report but on a motion to proceed to the conference report, and this vote would occur on Thursday?

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. GRAMM]. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DOLE. One hour after convening?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. After a quorum is established.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, it would be my hope that before we recess this evening we can lay down S. 1200, the immigration bill. As I understand it, the distinguished Senator from Michigan, who has a question with reference to S. 1200, is on his way to the floor.

DISCRIMINATION BASED ON ALIENAGE

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I understand from our good friend Senator SIMPSON that there is going to be a hearing in the next week or 2 weeks with the House of Representatives, a joint hearing, on the question of discrimination based on alienage, which is an issue which was debated at the time this bill came up in the last Congress. As a matter of fact, we had a vote at that time on a Hart-Levin amendment relative to nondiscrimination based on alienage.

Logically, some of us have felt that that hearing should take place prior to this bill coming up, because it would provide a record upon which we could debate the issue. It is a complicated issue, by the way. It is extremely complicated. We thought it would be useful to have that hearing record prior to the debate on that amendment.

The leader wishes very much to proceed, and I surely do not want to be an impediment to that. So I talked to Senator SIMPSON about the possibility that we have some assurance that at some point prior to any conference with the House—and our friend is here right now—on this immigration bill, assuming that it gets to that point, those of us who are interested in this subject would have an opportunity, a window, on the floor of the Senate to have a vote either on a bill, or on a resolution, or on a sense of the Senate, on some matter relating to the issue of nondiscrimination based on alienage.

If the majority leader is willing to say yes, that at some point prior to conference there would be that opportunity—it could be limited to a few hours—I think it would satisfy a lot of us on both sides of the aisle who have written our good friend ALAN SIMPSON urging that there be a hearing on this subject and who are interested in this possible amendment at some point.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let me indicate that the distinguished Senator from Wyoming is an expert in this area, but I would say that the leadership certainly understands the problem.

I would be willing to make the pledge to the distinguished Senator from Michigan. I hope that would permit us to lay down the bill this evening.

As the Senator indicated earlier, this might be 1 month from now; it might be 6 months from now. If the House does not pass the bill, it might not happen at all. So I am willing to agree to the request of the distinguished Senator from Michigan.

Mr. LEVIN. I think that would be helpful. That was my only problem in proceeding, because I think logic dictates that the hearing come prior to the debate. In this case, that is not possible because of the needs of the leader to proceed, and we can understand that and appreciate it. Those of us interested in this subject would like to be assured of that window prior to the conference, when we would have an opportunity—if we chose, I emphasize—to proceed to a decision by the Senate on some resolution, bill, sense of the Senate, or whatever the form would be.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I appreciate the majority leader giving that concurrence, because I certainly will do so. I assure the Senator from Michigan that we will do that.

I think the critical point we have to remember is that when we speak of this vexing, puzzling issue of discrimination based on alienage, we are not talking about color of skin or ethnicity. That is what makes it difficult. It is a new thing which has arisen, which has not even been addressed by civil libertarians or in either body of Congress. It is a very puzzling thing. But I emphasize that it has nothing to do with color of skin or ethnicity. It is a wholly new thing based upon permanent residency or citizenship, and discrimination based on that degree of alienage.

I assure the Senator—and the majority leader has done so—that if we are allowed to go forward, we will accommodate the Members on both sides of the aisle and deal separately with that issue at a separate time, either through hearing or a sense of the Senate resolution, or perhaps even if the House passes it, then when the Senate appoints conferees, a motion to appoint conferees would be in order.

I assure the Senator that we will work toward that, so the window is there for an independent vote on a rather puzzling, extraneous, and yet important part of the issue of immigration reform.

Mr. LEVIN. It is complex. The reason we are in this puzzle is that for the first time we are prohibiting employment of someone instead of prohibiting discrimination against someone in this bill.

I do not have a perfect answer to the puzzle. My good friend puts it very well: it is a very difficult issue.

The fact that there will be that window at some point prior to conference, where we could get an expression from the Senate, if we decided to seek it, is adequate. As always, the majority leader and Senator SIMPSON are cooperative, and we are delighted to cooperate with them.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I understand that the distinguished minority leader is visiting with Senator CRANSTON to see if we can lay down S. 1200. As soon as we do that, we intend to recess until noon tomorrow.

Mr. President, while we are waiting, I advise my colleagues again that the cloture vote on the conference report tomorrow will occur at 2:30 p.m., and it would be my hope that cloture will not be invoked. There are sanctions in place by virtue of the Executive order of the President signed by the President yesterday, Monday, September 9.

I again indicate to my colleagues, and I will again tomorrow, that it seems to me that we should move on to other business, set aside the conference report on the antiapartheid bill and reach some agreement when we may return to the conference report in the event that the Executive order is not complied with or in the event that some of the provisions in the Executive order dealing with Krugerrands or gold coins, or any other areas that may not be as specific as some Senators would like. In the event they are not addressed, then we would have the opportunity to call up the conference report at some specified time in the future.

I happen to believe that would be very good strategy for the Senate to adopt unanimously or at least those who support the antiapartheid legislation.

I have indicated to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts today that I know there are a lot of politics in the air right now. Many Democrats seize upon this as a hot issue, the way to bash the President, and maybe after a few days of President bashing we can get back to the real world of how do we send a signal to the apartheid Government of South Africa.

I happen to believe that the President's initiatives are just as strong as the original Senate bill and nearly as strong as those matters contained in the conference report, and it seems to me that it is much more important that the President be on record as he is now than having us fussing in the Senate about who will have the pride of authorship, whether it is the President of the United States or some Senator from some State. I happen to believe the President speaks for most of the people, which is more than probably many of us can say in this body.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE

At 2:08 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Ms. Goetz, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House has passed the following bill, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

H.R. 3113. An act providing for the coordinated operation of the Central Valley project and the State water project in California.

MEASURES REFERRED

The following bill was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred as indicated:

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. THURMOND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, with amendments:

S. 40. A bill to provide procedures for calling Federal constitutional conventions under article V for the purpose of proposing amendments to the United States Constitution (with additional views) (Rept. No. 99-135).

By Mr. THURMOND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, without amendment:

S. Res. 218. An original resolution waiving section 303(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 with respect to S. 1200 as reported by the Senate Committee on the Judiciary; referred to the Committee on the Budget.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

The following bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first and second time by unanimous consent, and referred as indicated:

By Mr. CRANSTON (for himself, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. ROCKEFELLER, and Mr. INOUYE):

S. 1616. A bill to require the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to provide for the conduct of an epidemiological study of the gender-specific effect of exposure to the herbicide known as agent orange on women veterans of service in the Republic of Vietnam; to the Committee on Veterans Affairs.

By Mr. WALLOP (for himself, Mr. ANDREWS, Mr. ABDNOR, Mr. SIMPSON, Mr. LAXALT, Mr. BURDICK, and Mr. MELCHER):

S. 1617. A bill to provide for more effective management of lands of the United States which are subject to conflicting claims or disputes, and to require the Secretary of the Interior to report annually thereon; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

By Mr. GORE (for himself and Mr. COCHRAN):

S. 1618. A bill to amend the Communications Act of 1934 to clarify policies regarding the right to view satellite transmitted television programming, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

By Mr. WILSON (for himself, Mr. DOLE, Mr. PACKWOOD, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. ZORINSKY, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. COHEN, Mr. D'AMATO, Mrs. HAWKINS, Mr. HECHT, and Mr. BOSCHWITZ):

S. 1619. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide that section 7872 (relating to imputed interest on below-market loans) shall not apply to loans made to the State of Israel; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. DURENBERGER (for himself and Mr. SIMON):

S. 1620. A bill to amend title XVIII of the Social Security Act to establish the National Council on Access to Health Care, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

By Mr. SYMMS:

S.J. Res. 193. A joint resolution to authorize the President to issue a proclamation designating the week beginning October 20, 1985, as "The Lessons of Grenada Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SUBMISSION OF CONCURRENT AND SENATE RESOLUTIONS

The following concurring resolutions and Senate resolutions were read, and referred (or acted upon), as indicated:

By Mr. THURMOND, from the Committee on the Judiciary:

S. Res. 218. An original resolution waiving section 303(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 with the respect to S. 1200 as reported to the Senate Committee on the Judiciary; to the Committee on the Budget.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. CRANSTON (for himself, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. ROCKEFELLER, and Mr. INOUYE):

S. 1616. A bill to require the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to provide for the conduct of an epidemiological study of the gender-specific effect of exposure to the herbicide known as agent orange on women veterans of service in the Republic of Vietnam; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

STUDY OF HEALTH EFFECTS OF AGENT ORANGE EXPOSURE ON WOMEN VIETNAM VETERANS

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I am today introducing, for appropriate referral, legislation that would require the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to provide for an epidemiological study of the gender-specific health effects on women veterans of their exposure to dioxin in Vietnam. I am joined in introducing this legislation by my good friends, the Senators from Arizona [Mr. DECONCINI] and West Virginia [Mr. ROCKEFELLER], both of whom are on the Veterans' Affairs Committee and the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. INOUYE]. This study—which would complement the major epidemiological study mandated by Public Law 96-151 of the effects that exposure in Vietnam to dioxin as found in agent orange has had on veterans' health—would have to be carried out by an entity outside of the VA. I am pleased to note that an identical measure will soon be introduced in the House of Representatives by my friend from Ohio, Ms. KAPTUR, along with my colleague from California, Mr. EDWARDS, and Representatives EDGAR, DASCHLE, and PENNY, all members of the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs, where Mr. EDGAR serves as chairman of the Subcommittee on Hospitals and Health Care.

Mr. President, I have a longstanding commitment to resolving the many difficult issues relating to the exposure of our troops in Vietnam to agent orange and other toxic substances. As the chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee until 1981 and since that time as the ranking Democrat on the committee, I have been very active in a wide variety of legislative and oversight activities on this issue. My goal in this area has been to provide timely relief to those who are suffering health problems which may be related to their exposure while, at the same time, laying the groundwork for getting the answers to the questions that the veterans, their families, and others have about the health consequences of exposure to agent orange and other toxic substances in Vietnam. In the latter regard, I believe that the study mandated by Public Law 96-151, as modified by Public Law 97-72—both of which I authored in the Senate—should provide some very important information and I am gratified that, although there were some very regrettable delays in getting that study underway, it is now progressing reasonably well.

It has been clear for some time, however, that although that study would yield important information regarding general health issues for all veterans—male and female alike—it would not provide any information about the unique, gender-specific concerns of women Vietnam veterans about the possible impact of their exposure to agent orange. Thus, since early 1984, I have been urging various executive branch entities to utilize existing authorities to design and undertake an appropriate study of women Vietnam veterans. Unfortunately, my efforts and those of others in the Congress have been unavailing to date. This is why we are now proposing legislation that would mandate such a study.

Mr. President, so that my colleagues and others with an interest in this issue may have a better appreciation of the background leading up to this legislation, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD at the end of my statement the following letters: a May 2, 1984, letter to me from Dr. James Mason, director, Centers for Disease Control, responding to an inquiry made at my request; my September 18, 1984, letter to Dr. Mason; Dr. Mason's October 16, 1984, response; my January 23, 1985, letter to Charles Baker, Chair, Cabinet Council Agent Orange Working Group; Mr. Baker's March 6, 1985, response; my July 22, 1985, followup letter to Mr. Baker; an August 26, 1985, response from Dixon Arnett, acting Chair of the Working Group; and my September 9, 1985, followup letter to Mr. Arnett.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I am deeply disappointed that the executive branch has not taken appropriate steps to begin a study of the effects of agent orange on women Vietnam veterans. There is no excuse for further executive branch foot dragging. It is long since past time that the very legitimate concerns of women Vietnam veterans were addressed, and I look forward to quick action in the Congress on this legislation so that those concerns will be addressed.

Mr. President, such a study, in addition to yielding important information about the health status of those women who served in the Armed Forces in Vietnam, would also shed important new light on the questions that women who were in Vietman with voluntary organizations—such as the USO and the Red Cross—have about their health as a result of their work there. For a number of years, I have been concerned that the employees of, or voluntary workers with, certain of these organizations have not received appropriate attention from the Federal Government in response to their concerns about their health as a result of having been in Vietnam. While I am continuing with my efforts to address that issue through separate legislation—including in section 503 of S. 876 as reported by the Veterans' Affairs Committee in June of this year and passed by the Senate on July 30—I believe that the study that would be mandated by the legislation we are introducing today would be of particular relevance to these individuals and that is a further reason for my action in introducing this measure.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the legislation I am introducing be printed in the RECORD following the correspondence I mentioned earlier.

There being no objection, the bill and letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1616

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That

(a)(1) the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, through contracts or agreements with private or public agencies or persons, shall provide for the conduct of an epidemiological study of any long-term adverse gender-specific health effects in women of service in the Armed Forces of the United States in the Republic of Vietnam during the period of the Vietnam conflict as such health effects may result from exposure to—

(A) phenoxy herbicides (including the herbicide known as Agent Orange); and

(B) the class of chemicals known as the dioxins produced during the manufacture of such herbicides.

(2) In providing for the conduct of such study, the Administrator may expand the scope of the study to include an evaluation of any long-term adverse gender-specific health effects in women of such service as such health effects may result from other factors involved in such service (including exposure to other herbicides, chemicals, medications, or environmental hazards or conditions).

(3) The Administrator may also include in the study an evaluation of the means of detecting and treating adverse gender-specific health effects found through the study.

(b)(1) The study required by subsection (a) shall be conducted in accordance with a protocol approved by the Director of the Office of Technology Assessment.

(2) The Director shall monitor the conduct of such study in order to ensure compliance with such protocol.

(3)(A) Concurrent with the approval or disapproval or any protocol under paragraph (1), the Director shall submit to the appropriate committees of the Congress a report—

(i) explaining the basis for the Director's action in approving or disapproving the protocol; and

(ii) providing the Director's conclusions regarding the scientific validity and objectivity of the protocol.

(B) If the Director has not approved such a such a protocol during the 180 days following the date of the enactment of this Act, the Director—

(i) shall submit to the appropriate committees of the Congress a report describing the reasons why the Director has not given such approval; and

(ii) shall submit to such committees an update report on such initial report each 60 days thereafter until such a protocol is approved.

(4) The Director shall submit to the appropriate committees of the Congress, at each of the times specified in the second sentence of this paragraph, a report on the Director's monitoring of the conduct of such study pursuant to paragraph (2). A report under the preceding sentence shall be submitted—

(A) before the end of the six-month period beginning on the date of the approval of the protocol by the Director;

(B) before the end of the 12-month period beginning on such date; and

(C) annually thereafter until the study is completed or terminated.

(c) The study conducted pursuant to subsection (a) shall be continued for as long after the submission of the first report under subsection (d)(1) as the Administrator may determine reasonable in light of the possibility of developing through such study significant new information on the long-term gender-specific adverse health effects in women of exposure to dioxins.

(d)(1) Not later than 24 months after the date of the approval of the protocol pursuant to subsection (b)(1) and annually thereafter, the Administrator shall submit to the appropriate committees of the Congress a report containing—

(A) a description of the results thus far obtained under the study conducted pursuant to such subsection; and

(B) such comments and recommendations for administrative or legislative action, or both, as the Administrator considers appropriate in light of such results.

(2) Not later than 90 days after the submission of each report under paragraph (1), the Administrator shall publish in the Federal Register, for public review and comment, a description of any action that the Administrator proposes to take with respect to programs administered by the Veterans' Administration. Each such description shall include a justification or rationale for any such action the Administrator proposes to take. Any such proposal shall be based on the results described in the report under paragraph (1) and the comments and recommendations on that report and any other available pertinent information.

(e) For the purposes of this section, the term "gender-specific health effects in women" includes (1) effects on female reproductive capacity and reproductive organs, (2) reproductive outcomes, (3) effects on female-specific organs and tissues, and (4) other effects unique to the physiology of females.

U. S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS,
Washington, DC, September 9, 1985.

Mr. DIXON ARNETT,
Deputy Under Secretary for Intergovernmental Affairs,
Department of Health and Human Services, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. ARNETT: I am writing in response to your August 26, 1985, letter to me regarding the status of research efforts on possible health effects in women veterans who were possibly exposed to Agent Orange during their service in Vietnam. I have the following follow-up questions to which I would appreciate your responses:

1.A. What specifically are the "Federally sponsored studies which involve female Vietnam veterans" that you referred to in your letter?

B. What is the timeable for each of these studies?

C. What is the projected relevance of each of these studies to the questions of women Vietnam veterans' health status?

D. What is the statistical power of each of these studies?

2. Is it not correct that "any findings from the ongoing male studies" will shed no light on the issue of significant, unique concern to women Vietnam veterans—namely, the possibility that their exposure to Agent Orange, or other toxic substances in Vietnam, may have affected their reproductive ability?

3. Enclosed is a copy of an August 23, 1985, letter from Dr. Donald Hopkins, Acting Director of the Centers for Disease Control, to Representative Don Edwards, in which Dr. Hopkins notes that CDC "has determined that a study focusing on the health of female [Vietnam] veterans is feasible and has prepared two draft research protocol outlines for epidemiologic studies of female veterans." Please comment on Dr. Hopkins' statement and, in doing so, please reconcile his statement with the one in your letter that "[w]hat is unclear at this time is whether there were enough women veterans exposed to Agent Orange in Vietnam to conduct a scientifically valid Agent Orange Study".

4. In view of the strong interest, which has existed for a number of years now, in attempting to come to terms with the question of the health status of women Vietnam veterans, I firmly believe that something more is called for beyond non-specific statements that the Working Group is continuing to study the issue. I therefore ask that you, in your capacity as the Acting Chairman of the Agent Orange Working Group, give me your best estimate of when there will be a difinitive decision by the Working Group on this issue.

Finally, I think it only fair to advise you that I believe that the Executive Branch has not given appropriate attention to moving forward on this issue and that I and others are preparing legislation to direct that such a study be conducted.

I look forward to your reply at your earliest convenience.

With best wishes,

Sincerely,

ALAN CRANSTON,
Ranking Minority Member.

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH AND HUMAN SERVICES,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, DC, August 26, 1985.

Hon. Alan Cranston,
U.S. Senate, Committee on Veterans' Affairs, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR CRANSTON: I am writing in response to your inquiry addressed to Charles D. Baker, Chairman, Cabinet Council Agent Orange Working Group (AOWG), regarding research efforts on possible health effects in female Vietnam veterans following their exposure to Agent Orange. Mr. Baker resigned from Federal Government service effective August 17, 1985, and I have been appointed as the Acting Chairman of the Agent Orange Working Group.

An appropriate research design on the issue of the health effects of Agent Orange exposure on female Vietnam veterans has been extensively discussed within the Agent

Orange Working Group and its Science Panel for more than a year.

What is unclear at this time is whether there were enough women veterans exposed to Agent Orange in Vietnam to conduct a scientifically valid Agent Orange Study and whether the military records which do exist are adequate to make this determination. However, the Agent Orange Working Group is in the process of assembling various alternatives for additional research among women Vietnam veterans.

I am sure that you are aware that there are, at present, several Federally sponsored studies which involve female Vietnam veterans. Although these studies are not primarily focused on Agent Orange, they will cover some important physical and psychological health problems unique to women. In addition, any findings from the ongoing male studies will be extrapolated to women where appropriate.

I assure you that we are very concerned that female veterans receive appropriate medical care and other compensation comparable to that of male veterans for any adverse health consequences of their having served in Vietnam.

Thank you for your continued interest in this issue. I will inform you when the Agent Orange Working Group is able to make a more definitive statement regarding the feasibility of a female Agent Orange study.

With best wishes,

Sincerely,

DIXON ARNETT,
Deputy Under Secretary for Intergovernmental Affairs.

COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS,
Washington, DC, July 22, 1985.

Hon. CHARLES D. BAKER,
Chair, Cabinet Council Agent Orange Working Group, Department of Health and Human Services, Hubert Humphrey Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. BAKER: I am writing in followup to your March 6, 1985, response to my inquiry as to how the Federal Government might conduct research to investigate the possible health effects in female Vietnam veterans of their exposure to Agent Orange.

In your letter, you noted that the Science Panel of the Cabinet Council Agent Orange Working Group was then examining Vietnam veterans health issues for which female-veteran studies may be appropriate and feasible. Please advise me of the status of the Science Panel's review regarding issues specific to female Vietnam veterans who may have been exposed to Agent Orange, its findings to date, and the timetable for making any further decisions which must be made before a study on female Vietnam veterans can begin and for the commencement of such a study.

As you know, I believe very strongly that a study of female Vietnam veterans is extremely urgent in order to more fully understand the possible adverse health effects unique to women who served in Vietnam. In addition, I am very concerned about the delay in starting such an important study and would urge that the Science Panel move forward as quickly as possible in its review and recommendations.

I appreciate your attention to this matter and look forward to your response.

With best wishes,

Sincerely,

ALAN CRANSTON,
Ranking Minority Member.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF HEALTH AND HUMAN SERVICES,
Washington, DC, March 6, 1985.

Hon. ALAN CRANSTON,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR CRANSTON: Thank you for your recent letter concerning possible adverse health effects of exposure to Agent Orange on women veterans who served in Vietnam and the need to include them in the epidemiological studies.

The Science Panel of the Cabinet Council Agent Orange Working Group recently examined the proposal for a study of female veterans prepared by the Centers for Disease Control (CDC). The Science Panel feels that the health needs of female Vietnam veterans should receive high priority and are concerned that this should be done in the most expeditious way. Most of the health problems encountered by men as a result of their exposure to various substances, including Herbicide Orange, while in Vietnam can be expected to affect women also. Programs adopted to cope with these problems can be and should be applied to women veterans as well.

There may be some health problems, however, that could accrue differently to female veterans exposed to the Vietnam Experience. The Science Panel feels that studies of female Vietnam veterans should focus on issues which cannot be determined from the ongoing studies of male veterans. The Science Panel also feels that specific research proposals utilizing female veteran subjects should be evaluated after hypotheses concerning health problems unique to female Vietnam veterans have been developed. The Science Panel is currently examining Vietnam health issues for which female veteran studies may be appropriate and feasible.

As I receive the results of the Panel's findings I would be happy to share the reports with you.

With best wishes.

Sincerely,

CHARLES D. BAKER.

COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS,
Washington, DC, January 23, 1985.

Hon. CHARLES BAKER,
Chair, Cabinet Council Agent Orange Working Group, Department of Health and Human Services, Humbert Humphrey Building, Washington, DC. 20201

DEAR MR. BAKER: I have long had a strong interest in the issue of how the Federal Government might conduct research to investigate the possible health effects in female Vietnam veterans of their exposure to Agent Orange. Enclosed is a copy of an October 16, 1984, letter to me on this subject from Dr. James O. Mason, the Director of the Centers for Disease Control.

It is my understanding that the draft protocol outline mentioned in Dr. Mason's letter is pending in the Agent Orange Working Group and may be considered during the Group's next meeting, which is scheduled to take place in early February. I believe that it is extremely important that research be undertaken on this issue, and I strongly urge that the Working Group undertake its review of the protocol outline as expeditiously as possible. It is my strong hope that the members of the Working Group will be able to report favorably on the possibility of a study of female Vietnam veterans, either by endorsing the protocol outline as developed by CDC or by suggesting whatever changes to the outline the members believe are needed in order for a study to go forward.

Thank you for your attention to my views on this issue. I would appreciate hearing from you on this matter as soon as possible after the Working Group's February meeting.

With best wishes,

Sincerely

ALAN CRANSTON,
Ranking Minority Member.

PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE,
CENTERS FOR DISEASE CONTROL,
Atlanta, GA, October 16, 1984.

Hon. ALAN CRANSTON,
Ranking Minority Member, Committee on Veterans' Affairs, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR CRANSTON: This is in response to your letter of September 18 urging that research be undertaken soon to investigate the possible health effects of Agent Orange on female Vietnam veterans and asking about the status of such a study at the Centers for Disease Control (CDC). We appreciate your expression of satisfaction with CDC's efforts with respect to male Vietnam veterans.

As reported to you in my letter of May 2, CDC was then assessing the feasibility of conducting a study of female veterans. Based on that assessment, completed in June, a draft protocol outline for an epidemiologic study of female veterans was prepared. The Department's Agent Orange Science Panel is currently reviewing this outline. Further action will certainly be influenced by the result of that review.

Thank you for your continued interest.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES O. MASON, M.D., DR. P.H.,
Assistant Surgeon General, Director.

COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS,
Washington, DC, September 18, 1984.

Dr. JAMES O. MASON,
Director, Centers for Disease Control, Atlanta, GA.

DEAR DR. MASON: As you know, I have had a longstanding interest and concern regarding the unresolved questions surrounding the health effects of Vietnam veteran exposure to Agent Orange. I am satisfied that CDC's involvement in this troubling area, particularly through the birth defects study and the major epidemiological study of Vietnam veterans, has provided and will continue to provide needed information with respect to male Vietnam veterans. However, I believe that similar efforts must be made to investigate the possible effects of this substance on the health of female Vietnam veterans and regret that such efforts have yet to be undertaken.

It is my understanding that it may be possible now to move ahead in this regard. Specifically, Dr. Peter M. Layde, Director of Agent Orange Projects at CDC, informed staff of the Senate and House Veterans' Affairs Committees on July 18 that CDC now has an accurate figure regarding the number of female Vietnam veterans as well as a means of contacting these women for purposes of determining the possible health effects of exposure to Agent Orange. Hence, I urge that the vital need for research in this area be addresed as soon as possible and would very much appreciate knowing the status of CDC's plans to undertake a female Vietnam Veteran health study.

I appreciate your consideration of this matter and look forward to a response at your earliest convenience.

With warm regards,
Cordially,

ALAN CRANSTON,
Ranking Minority Member.

PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE,
CENTERS FOR DISEASE CONTROL,
Atlanta, GA, May 2, 1984.

Hon. ALAN CRANSTON,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR CRANSTON: This is in response to the telephone conversation between Ms. Katy Burdick of your staff and Ms. Francie de Peyster of our Washington office regarding the inclusion of female Vietnam veterans in the current epidemiologic studies of the health of Vietnam veterans being conducted by the Centers for Disease Control (CDC).

We are interested in any health problems which may occur in women as well as in men. CDC is now assessing the feasibility of conducting a study of female Vietnam veterans. Very early we considered, but decided against, inclusion of women veterans in the specific study mandated by Public Laws 96-151 and 97-72. Comparatively few women served in Vietnam in circumstances where their experiences closely paralleled those of male veterans. To include these few women in the presently designed study would be unfair to the women who agreed to participate since their participation would result in no reasonable conclusions about their health. We concluded that if a study of women were to be done, that study should be designed so that it would include enough women to allow meaningful conclusions to be drawn about them.

A scientifically valid study of women veterans would require that a comprehensive listing of those veterans be compiled, from which a sample of women would then be chosen, located, and invited to participate. We have found that compiling a list of all women who served in Vietnam is more difficult than might be expected, partly because military records of the time did not include "male/female" identification. However, we are working with the Department of Defense and other agencies to identify a large enough group of women Vietnam veterans to comprise a valid study population.

As an initial step in developing plans for a study of female Vietnam veterans, CDC has submitted a small sample of names and social security numbers of women veterans to the Internal Revenue Service (IRS), requesting IRS to provide current mailing addresses for these veterans. At one time we were concerned that we would not be able to locate a significant number of women veterans because a large percentage of women could be expected to have changed their names through marriage in the intervening years. However, the results of IRS test were quite encouraging. IRS regulations now make it possible to identify "secondary" as well as "primary" tax filers. We now believe that a sufficient percentage of women veterans, chosen from a master listing of all veterans, could be located to allow conduct of a meaningful study.

Although the success of this "locatability" test has removed one important concern about our ability to conduct a valid study of women veterans' health, another persists: identification of a suitable comparison or "control" group of women. The demographic characteristics of a control group, whose health status can be compared with those of a group of women who were exposed to the Vietnam experience, should ideally be identical with characteristics of the Vietnam-exposed group except for that exposure. But, because of the relatively small number of women who served in Vietnam, and special characteristics which we think may be associated with those who did serve there (e.g., training, "volunteer" attitude, state of physical fitness, etc.), our epidemiologists are having difficulty identifying sources of names for enough suitably qualified women, both exposed and unexposed, to comprise groups large enough to study with a hope for conclusive findings.

For example, a study of Army nurses who did serve in Vietnam should include a control group of demographically similar Army nurses who did not serve there. However discussions with the Army Nurse Corps indicate that since many nurses in the Army during the years of the Vietnam war spent at least one tour of duty there during their Army service, it may be impossible to locate a suitably large control group from the available pool of Army nurse veterans. Before including other sources in that pool (e.g., Navy, Air Force), we must carefully weigh whether there is sufficient similarity in characteristics of veterans of the other services to make their inclusion of scientifically acceptable.

The legislation which mandates CDC's investigation specifies the participation of only veterans of the Armed Services, thus precluding study of Red Cross, USO, and other nonmilitary female personnel who may have served in Vietnam as potential participants.

As a test to determine what percentage of women in the services during the Vietnam era served in that country, CDC is currently undertaking a feasibility assessment using a group of roughly 1,000 women who were on active duty at that time. This assessment, which is just beginning, will involve reviewing each individual's military service record (located at the National Personnel Records Center in St. Louis) to confirm whether or not that individual had served in Vietnam.

CDC takes very seriously its responsibility to investigate any health problems which may occur in Vietnam veterans. However, in our judgment it would have been inappropriate to attempt to study men and women in a single study. To have done so—in the knowledge that participation of women could yield no reasonable conclusions about their health—would be a disservice to the women asked to participate. We are dedicating considerable professional effort toward assessing the feasibility of a study of female veterans. If determination is made that a study can be conducted in such a way as to assess accurately and honestly the health status of women who served in Vietnam, we will promptly advise Dr. Brandt, Assistant Secretary for Health, and Secretary Heckler.

We appreciate your interest in this issue.
Sincerely yours,

JAMES O. MASON, M.D., DR.P.H.,
Assistant Surgeon General, Director.

By Mr. WALLOP (for himself, Mr. ANDREWS, Mr. ABDNOR, Mr. SIMPSON, Mr. LAXALT, Mr. BURDICK, and Mr. MELCHER):

S. 1617. A bill to provide for more effective management of lands of the United States which are subject to conflicting claims or disputes, and to require the Secretary of the Interior to report annually thereon; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

MANAGEMENT OF U.S. LANDS IN DISPUTE

● Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation that will clarify the status of lands which are either in the public domain or in State ownership, and that will require the Secretary of the Interior to report on negotiations for settlement of disputes concerning lands claimed by the States and administered by the Department of the Interior.

This legislation will pave the way toward resolving the long-standing cloud over federally claimed lands that lie primarily within the western public land States by permitting judicial resolution of their status without respect to the time the States filed claims.

Upon admission to the Union, all Western States were granted substantial amounts of land to be held in trust and administered for the benefit of the common schools and other public institutions. Each grant of lands made to the Western States by the U.S. Government expressly required that the States were to serve as trustees of the lands so granted for the exclusive benefit of those beneficiary institutions. Many State supreme courts and the U.S Supreme Court, in reviewing the various act of admission, have consistently held that States have a sacred duty to properly manage and protect the lands granted to them by the U.S. Government.

While Congress and the courts have placed this obligation on individual States, a current provision of the Federal Quiet Title Act eliminates, in certain limited situations, the ability of the States to fulfill their trust obligations.

In effect, the current Federal Quiet Title Act of 1972, as a result of the recent ruling by the U.S. Supreme Court in Block versus North Dakota, requires States, as well as private parties, to file lawsuits within 12 years limitation of the time they knew or should have known there was a Federal claim to the land in question. In some cases this time has been interpreted to be the date of a State's admission to the Union. While it may be reasonable to apply this restriction to private parties to prevent a flood of litigation on old claims, it results in barring the States from fulfilling their stringent obligations which Congress itself imposed upon them when they were admitted to the Union. Certainly, it is anomalous for Congress to require States to serve as trustees of State land and at the same time establish a quiet title barrier which prevents the States from fulfilling their congressionally mandated trust responsibilities.

For example, as the trustee of over 4 million acres of State-owned lands, Wyoming is convinced that it is impossible adequately to administer and protect its vital interests and obligations under the current language of the Federal Quiet Title Act. Under existing court interpretations Wyoming would have to review over 3 million diverse Federal actions in order to insure that State trust lands were not being claimed by the Federal Government.

In addition, Wyoming would have to continually monitor all ongoing Federal actions including all surface and mineral leasing, grants of rights-of-way, patent applications, land exchanges, withdrawals, special use permits, timber sales, and governmental resurveys, to name a few. Given Wyoming's checkerboard pattern of State land ownership, this is a particularly difficult task. Public lands and the public's interest therein deserve better management than that, both in the interest of efficiency and equity.

Mr. President, this legislation would end this conflict by amending the Quiet Title Act of 1972 to exempt sovereign States from the 12-year statute of limitations for filing suit against the Federal Government over disputed land claims. It would also require the direct involvement of the Department of the Interior in the settlement of State-Federal public land title disputes, which might not be concluded without the option of being able to rely on ultimate judicial resolution. Clear title to real property is essential to any State effort to properly manage and protect State-owned trust lands. Likewise, the resolution of these title disputes would also be necessary for management and protection of Federal lands since State claims remain alive even if there is no consent to sue. The inability to judicially resolve State-Federal title disputes simply makes effective land and resource management even more complex and difficult than it already is.

As a final note, I would like to add that a large and geographically diverse group of States filed amicus curiae briefs in the relevant Block versus North Dakota case: Alabama, Alaska, Arizona, Arkansas, California, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Hawaii, Idaho, Illinois, Iowa, Louisiana, Michigan, Minnesota, Montana, Nevada, New Jersey, New York, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, South Dakota, Vermont, Washington, and Wyoming.

The widespread support for this legislation is indicated by the resolutions of the following organizations: National Governors Association, National Association of Attorneys General, Western Attorneys General, National Conference of State Legislatures, Western States Land Commissioners Association, and Eastern Land and Resources Council.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that resolutions of each of these groups be presented in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I would also ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD immediately following this statement.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1617

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. It is the purpose of this legislation to obtain more effective management of public lands by providing for the speedy resolution of intergovernmental title disputes involving lands to which the United States asserts title, which interfere with effective administration or disposition of public lands.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Interior shall report by July 1, 1986, and annually thereafter, to the Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources and the House Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs on the status of negotiations for the settlement of any claims by States to lands administered by the Department of the Interior.

SEC. 3. Subsection (f) of section 2409a of title 28, United States Code, is amended by inserting ", except for an action commenced by a State," after "section" and by inserting after the first sentence the following: "Any civil action under this section by a State may be commenced regardless of when such action accrued." Such subsection is further amended by striking out "Such" and inserting in lieu thereof "For purposes of this subsection, an".

NATIONAL GOVERNORS ASSOCIATION COMMITTEE ON ENERGY AND ENVIRONMENT, FEBRUARY 27, 1984

The state and federal governments share responsibility for orderly development and management of the nation's energy resources. As disputes over state or federal ownership of lands associated with these resources may preclude their development, it is in the interest of both parties to resolve such controversies.

The Quiet Title Act of 1972 applied a twelve-year statute of limitations to claims against the federal government regarding title to parcels of land. It also removed a prior prohibition, based on federal sovereign immunity, on such suits against the federal government. Under the principle that no statute of limitations runs against sovereign states, quiet title actions were brought by states against the federal government for resolution of title disputes.

The U.S. Supreme Court decision in Block v North Dakota (May 3, 1983), held that the twelve-year statute of limitations does apply to state claims. The effect of this decision is to leave unresolved state/federal title disputes. If the United States can successfully demonstrate that the state knew or should have known of a federal claim twelve years before the suit, the quiet title action would be dismissed without determination of its merits. The basic title issue will remain judicially unresolved.

Because energy and other resources frequently occur on publicly-owned land, the need to settle definitively federal/state title disputes is evident. Without final judgment, leasees of parcels in question will be uncertain as to their rights to occupy, and granting of leaseholds may be stymied.

Congress is currently considering legislation amending the Quiet Title Act to declare the statute of limitations inapplicable to state claims. The Governors support such legislation as necessary to provide orderly land management and domestic energy resource development.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF ATTORNEYS GENERAL, JUNE 26, 1983

Whereas, the federal and state governments coexist as sovereigns in our federal union; and

Whereas, the disputes over title to lands between federal and state sovereigns have caused uncertainty and impeded the orderly resolution of title disputes in the states; and

Whereas, it is in the interests of both states and the United States that such uncertainties be decided on their merits; and

Whereas, the U.S. Supreme Court has recently held that such resolutions may be precluded by the application of the statute of limitations to the claims of sovereign states against the United States; and

Whereas, it is an accepted and cardinal principle of law that no statute of limitations should run against a sovereign state; and

Whereas, if states are precluded by the statute of limitations from asserting claims against the United States, a cloud will nevertheless remain over the disputed property, thus preventing the resolution of title and seriously impeding the process of leasing and orderly utilization of the mineral resources upon such land; and

Whereas, the Supreme Court has suggested that in the absence of a solution by Congress, states having claims against the federal government could assert them by issuing leases to federally-claimed lands, asserting title to much lands and engaging in other activities calculated to confuse and impede the orderly management of such lands; and

Whereas, such controversies should be resolved by litigation on the merits; and

Whereas, it is within the power of Congress to provide for such orderly solutions by legislation,

Now, therefore, be it resolved, that this Association requests Congress to enact legislation to permit sovereign states to bring such actions in quiet title against the United States to obtain resolution of such actions on the merits, free from the procedural obstacles created by the statute of limitations.

WESTERN ATTORNEYS GENERAL RESOLUTION

Whereas, the federal and state governments coexist as sovereigns in our federal union; and

Whereas, the disputes over title to lands between federal and state sovereigns have caused uncertainty and impeded the orderly resolution of title disputes in the states; and

Whereas, it is in the interest of both states and the United States that such uncertainties be decided on their merits; and

Whereas, in Block v. North Dakota, the U.S. Supreme Court held that such resolutions may be prevented by the application of the statute of limitations to the claims of sovereign states against the United States; and

Whereas, it is an accepted and cardinal principle of law that no statute of limitations should run against a sovereign state; and

Whereas, if states are precluded by the statute of limitations from asserting claims against the United States, a cloud will nevertheless remain over the disputed property, thus preventing the resolution of title and seriously impeding the process of leasing and orderly utilization of the mineral resources upon such land; and

Whereas, such controversies should be resolved by litigation on the merits; and

Whereas, it is within the power of Congress to provide for such orderly solutions by legislation; and

Whereas, H.R. 3917 [1] would provide for such a solution by exempting the claims of sovereign states from application of the 12-year statute of limitations in the federal Quiet Title Act;

Now therefore be it resolved, that this Association requests Congress to enact H.R. 3917 to permit sovereign states to bring actions in quiet title against the United States and to obtain resolution of such actions on the merits, free from the procedural obstacles created by the statute of limitations; and

Be it further resolved, that the secretary of this Association be directed to transmit copies of this resolution to the appropriate Committees of Congress, the U.S. Attorney General and the Secretary of Interior.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF STATE LEGISLATURES

The National Conference of State Legislatures supports legislation amending the Quiet Title Act to declare the statute of limitations inapplicable to state claims. Such legislation is necessary to provide orderly land management and domestic energy resource development.

The Quiet Title Act of 1972 applied a twelve-year statute of limitation to claims against the federal government regarding title to parcels of land. It also removed a prior prohibition, based on federal sovereign immunity, on such suits against the federal government. Under the principle that no statute of limitations runs against sovereign states, quiet title actions were brought by states against the federal government for resolution of title disputes.

The U.S. Supreme Court decision in Block v. North Dakota (May 3, 1983), held that the twelve-year statute of limitations does apply to state claims. The effect of this decision is to leave unresolved state/federal title disputes. If the United States can successfully demonstrate that the state knew or should have known of a federal claim twelve years before the suit, the quiet title action would be dismissed without determination of its merits. The basic title issue will remain judicially unresolved.

The state and federal governments share responsibility for orderly development and management of the nation's energy resources. As disputes over state or federal ownership of lands associated with these resources may preclude their development, it is in the interest of both parties to resolve such controversies. Therefore, it is important to amend the Quiet Title Act to prevent the application of the statute of limitations to state claims.

THE WESTERN STATES LAND COMMISSIONERS ASSOCIATION, JANUARY 1984

Whereas, the Federal and State Governments constitutionally coexist as sovereigns in the Federal Union; and

Whereas, numerous disputes over public land titles between the Federal and State Sovereigns presently exist and even more will unquestionably be found in the course of further survey and utilization of public lands; and

Whereas, it is in the interest both of the States and the Federal Government that such disputes be promptly and finally decided judicially to prevent serious administrative difficulty and delay in the orderly administration and utilization of the public lands of both Federal and State Sovereigns as may be required in the public interest; and

Whereas, in Block v. North Dakota, the United States Supreme Court held that such judicial resolution may be prevented by the application of the time limitations in the existing Quiet Title Act procedures to claims of the states, notwithstanding the accepted and cardinal principle of law that statutes of limitations do not run against claims by a sovereign state; and

Whereas, the Court also held that the application of the limitations on suit did not extinguish the underlying dispute, but that it would still continue; and

Whereas, only action by the Congress can now provide for the needed resolution of these disputes and permit the process of orderly administration and use of the sovereign lands in dispute; and

Whereas, a bill presently before the Congress (H.R. 3917) provides for the needed solution by exempting all title disputes between the two sovereigns, the State and the Federal Government from the application of the 12-year limitation period in the Federal Quiet Title Act;

Now therefore be it resolved, that this Association requests Congress to enact H.R. 3917 [1] to permit sovereign states to bring actions in quiet title against the United States and to obtain resolution of such actions on the merits, free from the procedural obstacles created by the statute of limitations; and

Be it further resolved, that the Secretary of this Association be directed to transmit copies of this resolution to the appropriate Committees of Congress, the U.S. Attorney General and the Secretary of the Interior.

EASTERN LANDS AND RESOURCE COUNCIL, APRIL 11, 1985

Whereas, disputes over title to lands between federal and state sovereigns have caused uncertainty and impeded the orderly resolutions of title disputes in the states and:

Whereas, it is in the interest of all states and the United States that such uncertainties be decided on their merits; and

Whereas, the U.S. Supreme Court held in Block v. North Dakota that the orderly resolution of title disputes between states and the federal government may be prevented by the application of the statute of limitations to the claims of sovereign states against the United States; and

Whereas, it is an accepted and cardinal principle of law that no statute of limitations should run against a sovereign state; and

Whereas, even though states are precluded by the statute of limitations from asserting claims against the United States, a cloud will nevertheless remain over the disputed property, thus preventing the resolution of title and seriously impeding the process of leasing and orderly utilization of the natural resources upon such land; and

Whereas, such controversies should be resolved by litigation on the merits; and

Whereas, the ELRC is composed or representatives of many of the Eastern States where these types of disputes may arise; and

Whereas, such legislation would achieve this result by exempting sovereign states from application of the 12 year statute of limitations in the Federal Quiet Title Act in disputes with the United States over land titles;

Now therefore be it resolved, that this Council recommends that each of the member states urges its Congressional delegation, the appropriate members of Congress, the United States Attorney General and the Secretary of the Interior to support enactment of this Federal legislation.●

By Mr. GORE (for himself and Mr. COCHRAN):

S. 1618. A bill to amend the Communications Act of 1934 to clarify policies regarding the right to view satellite-transmitted television programming, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

SATELLITE TELEVISION VIEWING RIGHTS ACT

● Mr. GORE. Mr. President, today Senator COCHRAN and I are introducing the Satellite Viewing Rights Act of 1985. This bill is similar to provisions in legislation I introduced in the House last year, which ensure that the marketing and distribution of satellite television programming be conducted in a fair, competitive marketplace with negotiated, reasonable prices.

As my colleagues are aware, legislation which passed as part of the cable deregulation bill last year settled once and for all the issue of whether or not it is legal to manufacture, sell, and use a satellite Earth station. As long as the Earth station is maintained for private use, it is entirely legal. Public Law 98-549 is entirely clear in establishing that fact. As long as signals remain free of encryption, or scrambling, new legislation would not be necessary.

Earth station owners are willing to pay a fair price for satellite television signals. The provisions passed as part of Public Law 98-549 make it possible for programmers to be compensated for unscrambled signals when that compensation is negotiated in fair marketing agreements. Under a negotiated system of compensation for unscrambled programming, both programmers and Earth station owners benefit. Programmers would not be forced to incur the major costs of scrambling, and Earth station owners would continue to have access to a diverse range of information and entertainment programming.

However, one programmer, HBO, has already begun scrambling its signal part time, and intends to be scrambled full time in the near future. Other programmers have also stated that they expect to scramble their signal within the next year. Earlier this year HBO promised that they would not scramble until there was an accessible system in place to sell the signal to owners of private Earth stations, and until there were sufficient signal decoders available for purchase by Earth station owners. Unfortunately, HBO has reneged on that commitment and moved ahead with scrambling.

[1] Identical to our companion bill, H.R. 2484, in this Congress.

[1] A similar resolution was adopted August 22, 1985, which urges its members to support H.R. 2484 and legislation having the same effect.

There is no prohibition on scrambling. Programmers are free to exercise that right to protect their signals. But I believe programmers do have a responsibility to make their products available to Earth station owners at fair and reasonable rates. The vast majority of Earth station owners live in rural areas not served by cable systems. They have been passed by because they live in densely populated areas which cable companies have determined are not profitable to serve.

Many of these rural families have been able to become part of the technological revolution in television programming by purchasing a backyard Earth station. For once, new technology has come first to rural families, instead of the slow, trickle down process we have witnessed with other telecommunications improvements. I believe that is an exciting development, and one which should be encouraged. However, the intention of programmers to scramble signals, and the efforts of some to actually stifle the use of backyard Earth stations gives me deep concern.

Until very recently, some of these programmers absolutely refused to even consider selling scrambled programming to backyard dish owners, despite their assurances that their real concern was not private individuals but wholesale commercial theft of their signal property. As a principal author of the language addressing satellite programming in the cable legislation, I worked with programmers to address the concern of commercial theft. The new law substantially strengthens the sanctions against illegal signal piracy. To their credit, most programmers are not now refusing to serve backyard Earth stations. Instead, the problem now facing Earth station owners, dealers, and manufacturers is the potential for anticompetitive pricing and distribution schemes which are intended to monopolize satellite television programming and, worse, shut down Earth station sales everywhere.

The bill we are introducing today addresses this potential for anticompetitive behavior by programmers and distributors of satellite-delivered, scrambled television signals. The bill would prohibit terms and conditions in the sale and distribution of these signals which have the effect of substantially restricting the availability of programming. Any party who has been denied reasonable access to such programming would be able to petition the Federal Communications Commission for relief. The bill would not prejudice the outcome of any FCC finding, but would simply make the FCC the last-resort arbiter of disputes between programmers or distributors and those who wish to receive programming.

The best solution to the dilemma facing Earth station owners and programmers in determining a fair system for system delivery is the free, open, and competitive marketplace. I support that approach above any other. However, the potential for severe market distortion is clearly present. There is considerable vertical integration in the programming and distribution of satellite programming—many of the major programmers also own substantial interests in local cable operations. More troubling is the prospect for special consortium agreements between all programmers and all cable operators to essentially monopolize the distribution of programs to home Earth station owners.

While not all programmers or cable operators wish to shut down the sale and use of Earth stations, some of the more powerful ones have openly stated that that is their motive. That prospect is, to me, clearly anticompetitive. And because of the huge market clout of these few, their intentions deserve attention and, I believe, legislation to prevent an outcome that is patently unfair to Earth station owners. Our bill is intended to do just that.

Over the past 6 months I have had extensive discussions with programmers, cable operators, potential distributors, representatives of the Earth station industry, and others who are involved in the marketplace for satellite television programming. This marketplace may someday fall into place, and at that time no Federal presence would be required. But until that has not yet occurred, and there are clear signals that it will not occur without substantial prodding.

This bill is not a complicated or unreasonable measure. It does not mandate a compulsory license or mandatory regulation of satellite television programming, or reregulation of the cable industry. It does not prevent programmers from moving ahead with their legitimate plans to protect their signals from unauthorized commercial theft. The bill is intended to accomplish one simple goal: To make it possible for all of our constituents, whether rural or otherwise, to take part in telecommunications opportunities which are promising to reshape our society into a truly global village.

I look forward to possible hearings on this issue, and I urge my colleagues to cosponsor the Satellite Television Viewing Rights Act of 1985.●

By Mr. WILSON (for himself, Mr. DOLE, Mr. PACKWOOD, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. ZORINSKY, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. COHEN, Mr. D'AMATO, Mrs. HAWKINS, Mr. HECHT, and Mr. BOSCHWITZ):

EXEMPTING ISRAEL BONDS FROM IMPUTED INTEREST RULES

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I was dismayed last week to read in the Wall Street Journal a brief report on an unintended impact of the imputed interest rules that we passed as part of last years tax bill. Unfortunately, as we have focused on one major aspect of those rules—the effect on the sale of real estate—we have overlooked one small, but significant effect that certainly no one in this Chamber could have had in mind.

The problem we must address is that under the imputed interest rules, Israel bonds would become so disadvantaged that no one could afford the tax consequences of buying them.

Under present law, anyone who buys a bond is deemed to have received taxable interest at a market rate—even if the actual interest received is less than that market rate. The pros and cons of this rule have been fully debated, the central issue being whether certain debt instruments are issued at below-market rates in order to facilitate tax avoidance. Clearly, we do not need to rehash this matter, as both the Senate and the House have recently voted on it. However, no one can reasonably contend that Israel's decision to issue bonds at below-market rates is tax motivated.

Israel bonds serve a vital role in the fight against Israel's staggering financial responsibilities. At present, Israel devotes approximately two-thirds of its budget to defense and debt service. Many of the bonds that are issued do yield market rates, but as a means of lowering the costs of debt service, some bonds yield as low as 4 percent. This savings of more than 50 percent on what Israel would otherwise have to pay is of enormous importance. Furthermore, it must be evident that the people who buy these bonds do so not as a matter of tax planning, but with entirely philanthropic motives. Indeed, according to the Wall Street Journal, Israel sold more than $102 million of its bonds in the United States in 1984, and an additional $44 million worth in the first 7 months of this year.

For our tax laws to penalize such efforts—by taxing the holders of Israel bonds for income of more than twice what they actually receive—would not only be unfair, but truly counter to our national interests. It is quite apparent to this Senator that we should do all that we can to encourage voluntary efforts to solve Israel's almost overwhelming financial problems. And, I would hope that it is just as apparent to the entire Senate. I am pleased to announce that the Senators DOLE, PACKWOOD, MOYNIHAN, ZORINSKY, CRANSTON, COHEN, D'AMATO, HAWKINS, HECHT, and BOSCHWITZ have agreed to cosponsor the bill.

At this point, I ask unanimous consent that the bill, the Wall Street Journal article to which I have referred, as well as a copy of a letter from Ronald A Pearlman, Assistant Secretary of Treasury for Tax Policy, be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, Sept. 4, 1985]

TAX REPORT

A SPECIAL SUMMARY AND FORECAST OF FEDERAL AND STATE TAX DEVELOPMENTS

Israel's 4 percent bonds pack a hidden tax wallop for U.S. buyers.

To combat tax avoidance, the 1984 tax act imputes a market interest rate to certain low-rate loans. Last month, Assistant Treasury Secretary Pearlman wrote Congress's tax committees that the act clearly—if perhaps unintentionally—applies to bonds that Israel for decades has sold to supporters. Thus, an owner of bonds bought after June 6, 1984, is treated as receiving taxable interest of the difference between 4 percent and a market rate (expected to be 10 percent to 11 percent for 1985); he also is treated as making a nondeductible gift of that sum to Israel.

The agency Israel Bonds sold $102 million of 4 percent bonds here in 1984, plus $44 million through last July; its lawyers believe Congress didn't mean to attack investments made to bolster Israel's economy, not to avoid U.S. taxes. Pearlman says the Treasury will cooperate if Congress wants to amend the law; the committee chiefs, just back from recess, haven't responded yet. (The act applies to any bond amount; Pearlman's letter apparently erred in limiting the effect to holdings exceeding $10,000.)

Legislative sources expect Congress to fashion an exemption from imputed interest for Israel bonds.

DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, DC., August 13, 1985.

Hon. BOB PACKWOOD,
Chairman, Senate Finance Committee, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The Internal Revenue Service is issuing today proposed regulations under section 7872 of the Internal Revenue Code regarding interest-free and below-market loans, as enacted by section 172 of the Tax Reform Act of 1984. I enclose a copy of the regulations for your information and would like to bring three particular issues to your attention.

Section 7872 governs gifts loans, compensation-related loans, corporate-shareholder loans and tax avoidance loans. In addition to the four categories of loans specifically mentioned in the statute, section 7872(c)(1)(E) authorizes the Treasury Department to identify loans which have a significant effect on the Federal tax liability of the lender or the borrower ("significant effect loans"). Once identified by Treasury in regulations, such loans would be subject to the imputed interest rules of section 7872. Owing to the breadth of this grant of authority and the recent legislative interest in certain loans to life care facilities, which in some circumstances might constitute significant effect loans, we think it preferable not to exercise this authority at this time. Instead, the regulations request comments from define significant effect loans. Thus, the proposed regulations do not identify any significant effect loans; for the time being, section 7872 applies to only the categories of loans explicitly identified in the statute.

The proposed regulations were drafted prior to House and Senate consideration of H.R. 2475, primarily concerning the imputed interest rules, which contains certain proposed amendments to section 7872. Consequently, the regulations define the applicable Federal rate used to measure the amount of imputed interest with reference to section 1274(d) as in effect prior to the amendments contemplated by H.R. 2475. I assure you that the section 7872 regulations will be revised prior to their promulgation as final regulations to reflect any changes in current law on the definition of the applicable Federal rate and the rules applicable to life care facilities.

Finally, as we advised you last January, the below-market loan provisions of section 7872 apply to U.S. purchasers of Israel bonds if the principal amount of the bonds held by a taxpayer exceeds $10,000. Thus, interest will be imputed to the bondholders in an amount equal to the difference between interest at the applicable Federal rate and the rate of interest actually paid on the bonds, and the bondholders will be treated as making a nondeductible contribution to Israel in an equal amount. The statute clearly requires these tax consequences. To the extent that the tax treatment of Israel bonds required under section 7872 was unintended, legislative amendment may be required. We would, of course, be happy to work with the Committee in any legislative effort.

I would be happy to further discuss these or other matters arising under section 7872 at your convenience.

Sincerely,

RONALD A. PEARLMAN,
Assistant Secretary (Tax Policy).

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I rise to commend the distinguished Senator from California and to join him as a sponsor of legislation to exempt Israel bonds from the Deficit Reduction Act's low interest loan rules.

Since I was chairman of the Finance Committee when the Deficit Reduction Act was considered, perhaps it would be helpful if I briefly summarized my recollections on this issue. The provisions we generally refer to as the "Imputed interest" rules, in fact, addressed several different issues. One of these was the problem of no interest and low interest loans which involved, in essence, a gift, compensation to an employee or a dividend to a shareholder. In the gift area, the principal example of the problem which was of concern to the Finance Committee involved large, low interest loans between family members. At the time we considered responses to this problem, no one brought up the question of treatment bonds with low interest rates such as Israel bonds. In fact, knowing that any characterization as a gift would only result in a tax deductible charitable contribution to the Israel bond purchaser. I am confident that, if the issue had been brought before the committee, the response would have been to exempt explicitly Israel bonds from the scope of Internal Revenue Code section 7872.

Mr. President, I can assure the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee that I will do whatever I can to make certain that this technical correction to the imputed interest rules is brought to the full Senate for disposition at the earliest opportunity. There is no reason why there should be any question in anyone's mind that section 7872 does not apply to purchases of Israel bonds.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, today I rise to ask my colleagues to support passage of a measure designed to clarify the tax treatment of Israel bonds.

The State of Israel has for decades sold low interest government bonds to Israel's supporters abroad. This financial support enables Israel to bear an overwhelming defense and economic burden in its fight to remain an independent nation. In order to lower the debt service costs of these bonds to Israel, they are often offered at low rates of interest, with yields as low as 4 percent. This savings to Israel is of vital importance in allowing that nation to meet its responsibilities to its citizens as well as to assume a defense burden which is of great importance to the United States in the Middle East.

When the Deficit Reduction Act was passed in 1984, Congress included a provision aimed at tax avoidance transactions through the mechanism of low-interest loans. At that time, Congress was unaware of the impact of this provision on Israeli bonds. We were made aware that the Treasury Department could not administratively exempt these bonds from the low-interest-loan rules when they issued regulations on August 15. These regulations make clear the need for legislative action.

I am particularly concerned that the issuance of these Treasury regulations will have an extremely negative impact on the sale and marketing of Israel bonds. Congress did not intend this when it passed legislation in 1984. I do not intend to allow unintended tax results to cut off this vital financial pipeline to the State of Israel. Therefore, I will make every effort to support and pass legislation that will ensure that the purchasers of such bonds are not subject to adverse tax consequences.

I also want to make it clear that I will use the earliest possible vehicle to achieve this end. I understand that heavy sales of such bonds take place during the Jewish high holy days, which are close at hand. I will make every effort to have the issue resolved before that time.

Finally, today, along with Senator WILSON of California; the distinguished majority leader, Senator DOLE, and Senator MOYNIHAN; and others, I have cosponsored legislation that will exempt these bonds from the low-interest-loan rules. I know that my distinguished colleagues have pledged as well to solve this issue quickly. The Treasury Department has also assured me that they will cooperate in this effort. I urge similar action by my colleagues in the Senate and in the House of Representatives.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today to join my distinguished colleagues in introducing legislation to correct an unintended consequence of recent tax legislation.

The Tax Reform Act of 1984 included a provision—presently codified as section 7872 of the Internal Revenue Code—designed to impose economically realistic tax treatment on interest-free and below-market loans. The problem is this. For decades, the Government of Israel had issued low-interest bonds to its American supporters. As presently written, section 7872 would require American purchasers of Israeli bonds to pay taxes on the difference between the bonds' return, 4 percent, and the market rate of interest on comparable obligations. In other words, bondholders would be taxed as if they had received a 9- or 10-percent return on their investment rather than the 4 percent they actually receive.

It was never the intention of Congress to include Israel's bonds among those transactions restricted by section 7872. Section 7872 was designed to eliminate certain tax abuses in loan transactions, not to disrupt the bonds sales of one of this Nation's most valued allies. The bill I join in sponsoring today should clarify this matter, by exempting obligations issued by the Government of Israel from the provisions of section 7872. I hope our colleagues will join us in swift passage of this legislation.

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, today I am pleased to join my colleagues on both sides of the aisle, Senator SIMON, from Illinois, Representative MOORE from Louisiana, and Representative GEPHARDT from Missouri, in introducing S. 1620, the National Council on the Access to Health Care Act of 1985.

Mr. President, as we create a price-sensitive health care marketplace, we must make sure that accommodations are made in the system to assure that access to quality health services is secured for all who need care. We must adhere to the warning signals that access to health services may be deteriorating—that patients are being shifted from one hospital to the next because they lack the ability to pay for services, that poor women must come up with a $1,000 deposit before a hospital will admit them for the birth of their child. While the extent of the access problems are not well known, we do know that we never want to return to a two-tiered system, with one standard of care for those who can pay, and second, substandard one, for those who cannot.

S. 1620 amends title XVIII of the Social Security Act to establish a National Council on Access to Health Care to study just how far we've come as a Nation in assuring needed access to health care services for all Americans and what effect the recent changes in the financing of the health care industry is having on the access and quality of services.

The National Council will be composed of 15 members representing broad constituent groups including the elderly and other health care consumers as well as those in the practice of medicine and those distinguished in health care administration and financial management. The Council will study the issue of access and will report to the President and to the Congress its recommendations for legislative and/or administrative action. It is important that the States and localities participate in the Council's investigations and the Council is required to coordinate locally sponsored grassroots "mini-conferences", using the model of the White House Conference on Aging, and at least 10 regional hearings to be held throughout the country.

Mr. President, the establishment of the National Council on the Access to Health Care could not be much more timely. Our Nation's health care system is undergoing change unprecedented in the last three decades. Reform of the system is being initiated by both public and private payers of health care services introducing new incentives for cost containment, rewarding the efficient providers of care and forcing the ineffficient providers to either change or get out of the business.

I have been and will continue to be a strong advocate for this reform that is introducing consumer choice into health care delivery. Only by giving people the opportunity to choose, among competing health plans, the plan that best meets their needs for the best price will we able to keep down the costs. We are working slowly to deregulate the health care industry and as we continue a strategy of deregulation, we will be confronted by the problems of financing of health care services for the indigent.

Between 1954 and 1965, we've demonstrated our national commitment to access through the Social Security Act and through the use of the Tax Code. In 1954, Congress enacted section 106 of the Internal Revenue Code to provide a tax exclusion for an employer's contribution to an employee's health insurance plan. This provision in the Tax Code has encouraged the widespread coverage of employees in private health insurance plans. Today, the majority of the work force is now covered through their place of employment.

We have realized one of the health policy goals set out in 1954—to get the work force covered by private health insurance plans. Today, I am advocating a limit to the employer's tax-free contribution to health insurance plans to encourage consumers to buy smart in the health care marketplace by discouraging the overinsurance and overutilization that's developed through this generous tax subsidy.

Through the establishment of the Medicare and Medicaid programs in the Social Security Act in 1965, the Federal Government has provided health care to two distinct population groups where access has traditionally been a problem—the poor and the elderly. Today, the Medicare program provides health insurance coverage for 27 million elderly and 3 million disabled persons. The Medicaid program, although its benefits are unevenly distributed across the country, provides needed services to some 23 million poor Americans.

Congress has been busy working on reform of the largest health insurance program in the country—Medicare. Medicare's new prospective payment system for inpatient hospital services represents the biggest change in the Medicare Program since its inception. The new financial incentives for cost containment is having a direct impact on hospital management strategies. In addition, the Department of Health and Human Services finally released regulations implementing a provision in TEFRA allowing Medicare beneficiaries the option to join private competitive health plans.

Business is also paying more attention to the costs of its health benefits and is encouraging employees to join competitive medical plans including Health Maintenance Organizations (HMO's) and Preferred Provider Organizations (PPO's). Both public and private payers are realizing the perverse financial incentives inherent in cost-based reimbursement and are moving in the direction of prospective payment and capitated health plans. The prepaid concept places providers at a financial risk providing the needed incentive to keep their patients healthy and out of expensive health care facilities.

And then all the evidence points to the fact that the reforms are working. In fiscal year 1984, health care costs rose only 9.1 percent—the first decrease since 1978 and the lowest rate of increase in over a decade. Medicare beneficiary's hospital length-of-stay are down substantially and the Medicare trust fund, once expected to go bankrupt this year, is now financially stable through 1997. Utilization of expensive health care services is down. Costs are down. And the system continues to provide high quality care. Now that's something we all can be proud of.

We know that consumer choice works. It brings price and benefit competition to bear on the health care marketplace. But as we continue our efforts to deregulate the health care industry, we must make sure we don't undo the achievements we've made to assure access to our country's high quality health care system for all Americans.

Despite the great progress we've made to assure access through public and private means, there are still estimates that over 30 million people have no form of health insurance whatsoever—public or private.

Plus, we still have gaping holes in our Federal health programs. Medicare still has no protection against catastrophic illness and provides no coverage for prescription drugs. In addition, the Medicaid Program currently covers less than half of those whose incomes fall below the poverty line.

Where do these people go to get care? Who pays for the cost? And how many of them are going without care until their illnesses become so severe that they have no choice but to head for the hospital emergency room?

The new cost-conscious marketplace is having a predictable effect on the hospital industry. For many years, the hospital has served as our national health insurance program. They have care for the indigent and treated the uncompensated care case load and have paid for it through their ability to cross-subsidize. The hospital passes the bill onto the patients who can pay—both public and private—and we all end up paying for the costs in the form of increased room rates and other charges.

What Medicare and other payers of services are now saying to the hospitals is that "We only want to pay for the costs of the services provided to our beneficiaries." We no longer are willing to pay for the hidden costs of graduate medical education, new technology, and the costs of caring for the indigent. And if we, as a society, decide that these are services that we are willing to pay for, then we need to make their costs explicit and pay for them. Period. We will, however, need new policies and new financing schemes to assure that doctors are trained and continue to provide the highest quality health care, that our medical system continues to advance in technology and treatment capabilities, and that all Americans are assured access to quality health care.

I firmly believe that the solution to the problem of uncompensated care lies in a more explicit acknowledgment of the national responsibility of the care of the poor. We will need to look for a rearrangement of those services currently proving cash and in-kind maintenance programs involving national, State, and local levels of government. Most explicitly, we need to assure access to high quality health care for all and not to prevent the development of a two-tier health care system. The National Council on the Access to Health Care will provide invaluable help as we work through these complex issues.

I commend the Catholic Health Association (CHA) for their efforts in development of S. 1620. I look forward to working with CHA and with my colleagues who have joined me in the introduction of the National Council on the Access to Health Care Act of 1985. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD , as follows:

S. 1620

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "National Council on Access to Health Care Act".

FINDINGS

SEC. 2. The Congress finds that—

(1) society has a special obligation to assure that all individuals have equitable access to health care services;

(2) significant changes are taking place in the financing and delivery of health care services;

(3) numerous Federal, State, and private entities have studied and are studying the problems attendant to such changes;

(4) many public and private decisions regarding the organization, financing, and delivery of health care are made in the context of grave budgetary constraints without giving full attention to their long-range implications with respect to access and quality;

(5) in order to avoid serious adverse consequences of such ad hoc decisionmaking, there is a compelling need to develop a cohesive, coordinated policy to address the challenges presented by a rapidly changing system; and

(6) achieving an equitable health care system requires at a minimum—

(A) recognition that society's ethical obligation to ensure equitable access to health care for all is best met through a combination of public and private sector arrangements;

(B) recognition that efforts to contain rising health care costs are necessary but should not impinge on equitable access to health care services;

(C) recognition of the need for sufficiently comprehensive health care services to prevent disease and maintain or enhance good health, and to treat disease, injury, and disability;

(D) recognition of teaching, research, information dissemination, and public health care functions as being integral parts of the health care delivery system;

(E) a pluralistic approach which recognizes individual and institutional integrity and the adherence to ethical and religious beliefs;

(F) elimination of factors which may limit access to health care services or the quality of such services;

(G) broad community grassroots, State, and national participation in health care policy issues; and

(H) recognition that the public and private sectors have a mutual responsibility to develop and implement a national policy to assure access to health care services.

CREATION OF COUNCIL

SEC. 3. Title XVIII of the Social Security Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"NATIONAL COUNCIL ON ACCESS TO HEALTH CARE

"SEC. 1890. (a) ESTABLISHMENT OF COUNCIL.—

"(1) MEMBERSHIP.—(A) There is established the National Council on Access to Health Care (thereinafter referred in this section as the 'Council') which shall be composed of 15 members. The President, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the President pro tempore of the Senate shall each appoint 5 members, as follows:

"(i) three members who are distinguished in their representation of one or more of the following fields or constituencies: the elderly and other health card consumers, medical ethics, health insurance, labor, business, law, and the social sciences;

"(ii) one member who is distinguished in the practice of medicine or direct patient care; and

"(iii) one member who are distinguished in health care administration or health care financial management.

The President, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the President pro tempore of the Senate shall consult with one another prior to making appointments in order that as many as is practicable of the fields listed in clause (i) may be represented.

"(B) The Secretary of Health and Human Services, the Secretary of Defense, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy, the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, and the Director of the National Science Foundation shall each designate an individual to provide liaison with the Council. Other Federal agencies may also designate an individual for such purpose.

"(C) A vacancy in the Council shall be filled by the official who made the original appointment, or his successor.

"(2) TERMS.—Members shall be appointed for the life of the Council.

"(3) CHAIRMAN.—The Chairman of the Council shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, from among the members of the Council.

"(4) MEETINGS.—Nine members of the Council shall constitute a quorum for business, but a lesser number may conduct hearings. The council shall meet at the call of the Chairman or at the call of a majority of its members.

"(5) COMPENSATION.—(A) Members of the Council shall each be entitled to receive the daily equivalent of the annual rate of basic pay in effect for grade GS-18 of the General Schedule for each day (including traveltime) during which they are engaged in the actual performance of the duties of the Council.

"(B) While away from their homes or regular places of business in the performance of services for the Council, members of the Council shall be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, in the same manner as persons employed intermittently in the Government service are allowed expenses under section 5703 of title 5 of the United States Code.

"(b) DUTIES OF THE COUNCIL.—

"(1) STUDIES.—(A) The Council shall undertake advisbility studies of the—

"(i) development of a national health care policy to address the issues of access and quality;

"(ii) mechanisms for assigning priorities to the use of public health care resources;

"(iii) ethical and legal bases for such a policy and such priorities;

"(iv) demographic, economic societal, cultural, and aging trends of the United States population and the effects of such trends on the Nation's health needs and health care system;

"(v) differences, if any, in the quality and availability of health care services for various economic and geographic segments of the population;

"(vi) current procedures and mechanisms designed to ensure the quality and availability of health care services to all individuals;

"(vii) capital and operating costs of health care services;

"(viii) efficient and effective use of existing health care resources;

"(ix) appropriate numbers of health care personnel in the various professions and in various geographic regions;

"(x) mechanisms for integrating alternative health care services with traditional acute and longterm care facilities and services;

"(xi) proper role of Federal and State governments and others in the financing, delivering, supervising, and planning of health services; and

"(xii) appropriateness of any other matter which relates to the development or implementation of a national health care policy and which is consistent with the purpose of this Act.

"(B) The Council shall determine the priority and order of the studies required under subparagraph (A). In undertaking the studies, the Council shall coordinate locally sponsored and funded grassroots miniconferences to be held in such numbers and at such locations throughout the country as it shall deem advisable to solicit advice, comments, suggestions, and recommendations from interested individuals, organizations, and the general public. Subsequently, the Council, either as a whole or divided into as many hearing committees as it may so choose, shall convene and conduct a series of hearings in at least the 10 Federal regions of the country for the purpose of receiving the public testimony and reports from the grassroots miniconferences. The Council shall determine how such meetings shall be organized and what criteria shall be established to determine participants in the grassroots miniconferences and hearings. At the conclusion of these public forums, the Council shall publish the recommendations heard and shall give serious consideration to them in its final policy recommendations.

"(C) In order to avoid duplication of effort, the Council shall, in lieu of or as part of any study or investigation conducted under subparagraph (A), use a study or investigation conducted by another entity if the Council sets forth its reasons for such use.

"(D) Studies and investigations under this paragraph shall be coordinated by the National Academy of Sciences under contract with the Council.

"(2) REPORTS TO CONGRESS AND THE PRESIDENT.—Upon the completion of each investigation or study undertaken or utilized by the Council under this subsection, the Council shall report its findings including any recommendations for legislation or administrative action to the President and the Congress.

"(3) ANNUAL REPORTS.—Annually on the anniversary of the date of the enactment of this section, the Council shall report to the President and the Congress the results of its efforts undertaken prior to such date. The third such report shall constitute the final report of the Council and shall include its final recommendations.

"(4) PUBLICATION.—The Council shall publish and disseminate to the public information with respect to its activities.

"(C) ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS.—

"(1) HEARINGS.—The Council may, for the purpose of carrying out this section, hold such hearings, sit and act at such times and places, take such testimony, and receive such evidence, as the Council may deem advisable.

"(2) PERSONNEL.—(A) The Council may appoint and fix the pay of such staff personnel as it deems desirable. Such personnel shall be appointed subject to the provisions of title 5, United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service, and shall be paid in accordance with the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates.

"(B) The Council may procure temporary and intermittent services to the same extent as is authorized by section 3109(b) of title 5, United States Code, but at rates for individuals not to exceed the daily equivalent of the annual rate of basic pay in effect for grade GS-18 of the General Schedule.

"(C) Upon request of the Council, the head of any Federal agency is authorized to detail, on a reimbursable basis, any of the personnel of such agency to the Council to assist it in carrying out its duties under this section.

"(3) CONTRACTS.—The Council, in performing its duties and functions under this section, may enter into contracts with appropriate public or private entities. The authority of the Council to enter into such contracts is effective for any fiscal year only to such extent or in such amounts as are provided in advance in appropriation Acts.

"(4) INFORMATION.—(A) The Council may secure directly from any Federal agency information necessary to enable the Council to carry out this section. Upon request of the Chairman of the Council, the head of such agency shall furnish such information to the Council.

"(B) The Council shall promptly arrange for such security clearances for its members and appropriate staff as are necessary to obtain access to classified information needed to carry out its duties under this section.

"(C) The Council shall not disclose any information reported to or otherwise obtained by the Council which is exempt from disclosure under section 552 of title 5, United States Code, by reason of paragraph (4) or (6) of subsection (b) of such section.

"(5) SUPPORT SERVICES.—The Administrator of General Services shall provide to the Council on a reimbursable basis such administrative support services as the Council may request.

"(6) DEFINITION.—For purposes of this subsection, the term 'Federal agency' means an authority of the Government of the United States but does not include the Congress, the courts of the United States, the government of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the government of the District of Columbia, or the government of any territory or possession of the United States.

"(d) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—To carry out the provisions of this section, there are authorized to be appropriated $3,000,000 for each of the fiscal years 1986, 1987, and 1988.

"(e) TERMINATION.—The Council shall be subject to the Federal Advisory Committee Act; except that, under section 14(a)(1)(B) thereof, the Council shall terminate on September 30, 1988.".

APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS OF COUNCIL

SEC. 4. The President, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the President pro tempore of the Senate shall initially appoint members to the National Council on Access to Health Care not later than 60 days after the date of the enactment of this Act.●

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleagues today in sponsoring legislation which will establish a National Council on Access to Health Care. I feel confident that that mandate of the Council, its makeup and organization will result in some solid and reasonable recommendations to ensure greater access to quality health care for all Americans.

The United States spends a greater percentage of its GNP on health care than almost any other industrial nation. Such a statement seems encouraging until one realizes that, even with this level of expenditure, almost 10 percent of our population have no health care coverage and another 10 percent have inadequate health care coverage. An additional 15 percent have neither the coverage nor the resources to finance a major illness. Most of those without health coverage or with inadequate coverage are the very poor, the working poor, the unemployed, young children and the very old. With our elderly, while Medicare has provided basic health care, we have not even begun to address the quality and cost of long term health care, a problem that will only become more common in the years to come.

Over the years, we have made incremental changes in health care delivery. Medicare and Medicaid have provided sufficient health care coverage to some of the more vulnerable portions of society. Over the past 20 years, other programs like WIC and school lunch and school breakfast have also helped improve the health of young children. But a nation as rich and diverse as ours should not tolerate over 20 percent of the population having little or no access to quality health care.

It is time that we step back and take a long hard look at our present health care system, and consider what alternatives and other options we have to increase the availability of quality, affordable health care for all Americans. It is my sense that there is unanimity among both providers and consumers of health care that our present system is not working. It is also clear that solutions must combine the resources of the public and private sectors.

I believe the National Council on the Access to Health Care offers the Nation the opportunity to bring together those who represent the broadest cross section of interests in the delivery of health care policy. It allows the important process of developing a series of recommendations to improve the delivery of health care to occur outside the confines of the political process. It recognizes the importance of involving as many people as possible through local and regional conferences.

I am confident that my colleagues in both the House and the Senate will view this legislation as a necessary and productive effort. We cannot continue to attempt to fine tune a national health care policy that is inadequate and too costly. Rather, we must take the time and the energy needed to move outside the existing system and undertake the initiatives that will guarantee access to quality health care at reasonable costs for all Americans.●

By Mr. SYMMS:

S.J. Res. 193. Joint resolution to authorize the President to issue a proclamation designating the week beginning October 20, 1985, as "The Lessons of Grenada Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

LESSONS OF GRENADA WEEK

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce a joint resolution creating "Lessons of Grenada Week." My colleagues on the House side, Congressmen NEWT GINGRICH and SAM STRATTON, introduced this bill before the August recess in the other body, and I am pleased to say that the legislation has quickly gained numerous cosponsors.

In 1979, Grenada's constitutional Government was overthrown by Maurice Bishop, an avowed Marxist. After his takeover, Bishop boasted that his small group had grabbed control of the entire country and that he, personally, had complete authority over all Government operations in Grenada. During Bishop's rule he became increasingly close to the Soviet Union and Cuba. The Soviet construction of a 10,000-foot airstrip capable of servicing Soviet bombers is evidence of this friendship.

Documents captured by United States forces during the liberation of Grenada provide conclusive evidence that the Soviet Union and Cuba were preparing to use Grenada as a guerrilla training site and a depot for the shipment of military equipment to leftist rebels in Latin America. These documents show the strategic importance the Soviet Union and Cuba placed on the tiny island of Grenada.

This conclusion is supported by the fact that there were large numbers of Soviet, Cuban, Bulgarian, North Korean, and East German advisers on the island. Millions of rounds of ammunition, thousands of weapons, and various types of military equipment such as armored personnel carriers and antiaircraft weapons were found on the island after its liberation. In addition, the Soviet Ambassador to Grenada was a military officer with a rank equivalent to a four-star general.

Bishop was a willing Soviet puppet, who eagerly cooperated with the massive buildup of Soviet, Cuban, and Eastern bloc arms into an enormous stockpile. In 1983, however, his grip began to slip. Evidence now suggests that he was losing the favor of the Cuban Government, and that the Soviets were concerned about retaining a climate favorable to their strategic designs in Grenada. The erosion of his leadership culminated in his assassination during the bloody coup of October 19, 1983.

Although Bishop's Marxist dictatorship had an appalling human rights record, his executioner was significantly worse. Gen. Hudson Austin, who had helped Bishop gain power, immediately instituted a "shoot on sight" curfew, and tortured and jailed those who refused to bow to his barbarous regime.

The situation in Grenada after Bishop's disposal was one of utter chaos and anarchy. In the midst of this anarchy were a large number of American citizens attending a medical school on the island. As they later confirmed, their situation was tenuous and their safety was in doubt. In order to rescue these American citizens, and at the request of the Organization of Eastern Caribbean States [OECS], who feared aggression from the increasingly militant Grenada, President Reagan wisely ordered U.S. Armed Forces into Grenada.

This decision was necessary first to ensure the safety of Americans from a hostile, possibly Iran-like hostage crisis; and second, to keep our treaty commitments with our OECS allies by answering their call for protection and assistance.

In addition to rescuing our countrymen, our forces uncovered an enormous amount of Communist military equipment, seized 35,000 pounds of Communist documents, including minutes from secret meetings, secret treaties with the Soviet Union and Cuba, embassy dispatches from Moscow, and a variety of other items of immense value to scholars, our intelligence agencies, and the American public. These documents provide indisputable evidence of the deceptive and calculated manner in which the Soviet Union encourages and sponsors revolutions throughout the world.

Because of the President's bold action freedom was advanced and Communist aggression near our borders was confronted and stopped. Aside from the American students whose lives were saved, the main beneficiaries of President Reagan's decisiveness are, of course, the people of Grenada who recently held their second free election in 2 years. Because of our liberation of their country, the Grenadan people now have the political freedom to elect the government of their choice.

A "Lessons of Grenada Week" would focus our attention on the Third World exploitation which is continually practiced by the Soviet Union and their satellites. As we have seen in numerous countries around the world, this exploitation is ruthless and persistent.

In Nicaragua, we have witnessed the Sandinistas' continual persecution of their people and their attempts to exterminate the Miskito Indians. Furthermore, the Sandinistas have pledged to spread their Marxist-Leninist revolution to their peaceful neighbors by violent means, if necessary.

In Angola, Cuban troops prop up the corrupt regime which is preventing peaceful national reconciliation and a democratically elected government. Repeal of the Clark amendment may well curb the adventurism of the Cubans in Africa, deflate Castro's prestige in Latin America, and give democratic resistance forces around the world new confidence.

Most blatant of all is the Soviet Union's destruction of Afghanistan and its people. The Soviet's burning of crops, encouragement of epidemics, destruction of hospitals and sanitation facilities, and repeated bombing of towns, villages, and other nonmilitary targets such as schools and mosques, reveals the true inhumanity of the Soviets.

The Soviets have also instituted a program of forced deportation of Afghan children. Recent reports place the number of 7- to 10-year-old Afghan children who have been sent to the Soviet Union for indoctrination at over 10,000. It is obvious that the Soviet Union's ultimate purpose is the genocide of the Afghan people and the obliteration of the Afghan culture. In this effort, the Red army is making civilians, including peasant children and women, a major target of their war efforts.

I believe that a "Lessons of Grenada Week" is an appropriate commemoration of the October rescue mission and an altogether fitting reminder of the fundamental differences between democratic societies and Communist dictatorships. "Lessons of Grenada Week" will allow the American people to reflect on the importance of the Grenada rescue mission, and, more importantly, on the need to continue to confront the spread of communism throughout the world.

ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS

At the request of Mr. CRANSTON, the name of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. METZENBAUM] was added as a cosponsor of S. 3, a bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act to provide that the combined earnings of a husband and wife during the period of their marriage shall be divided equally and shared between them for benefit purposes, so as to recognize the economic contribution of each spouse to the marriage and ensure that each spouse will have social security protection in his or her own right.

the Senator from Vermont [Mr. LEAHY], the Senator from New York [Mr. MOYNIHAN], and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PRESSLER] were added as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 117, a joint resolution designating the week beginning September 22, 1985, as "National Adult Day Care Center Week."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 132

At the request of Mr. DANFORTH, the names of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. BOSCHWITZ], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. EXON], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KERRY], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. LAXALT], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. LEAHY], and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. NUNN] were added as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 132, a joint resolution designating October, 1985, as "National Head Injury Awareness Month."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 156

At the request of Mr. MURKOWSKI, the name of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. GLENN] was added as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 156, a joint resolution authorizing a memorial to be erected in the District of Columbia or its environs.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 158

At the request of Mr. MURKOWSKI, the names of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. LEVIN], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SIMON], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. NUNN], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. HATFIELD], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ROCKEFELLER], and the Senator from Maine [Mr. MITCHELL] were added as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 158, a joint resolution designating October 1985 as "National Community College Month."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 181

A the request of Mrs. HAWKINS, the names of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. RIEGLE], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. LEVIN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. DOLE], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. DECONCINI], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. ANDREWS], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WEICKER], and the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. INOUYE] were added as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 181, a joint resolution to designate the week beginning September 1, 1985, as "National School-Age Child Care Awareness Week."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 186

At the request of Mr. THURMOND, the names of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. LEVIN], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MATHIAS], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SARBANES] were added as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 186, a joint resolution to designate the week of September 23, 1985, through September 29, 1985, as "National Historically Black Colleges Week."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 191

At the request of Mr. BUMPERS, the names of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. BOSCHWITZ], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HOLLINGS], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. DOLE], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. ANDREWS], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SARBANES], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. COCHRAN], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. PRYOR], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRADLEY], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. DECONCINI], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KERRY], and the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. MATSUNAGA] were added as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 191, a joint resolution to designate the month of October 1985 as "Learning Disabilities Awareness Month."

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 47

At the request of Mr. GLENN, the name of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] was added as a cosponsor of Senate Concurrent Resolution 47, a concurrent resolution observing the 20th anniversary of the enactment of the Older Americans Act of 1965.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 51

At the request of Mr. DIXON, the name of the Senator from New York [Mr. D'AMATO] was added as a cosponsor of Senate Concurrent Resolution 51, a concurrent resolution to congratulate the Society of Real Estate Appraisers on the 50th anniversary of its founding.

SENATE RESOLUTION 37

At the request of Mr. PRYOR, the name of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD] was added as a cosponsor of Senate Resolution 37, a resolution regarding small business and agricultural representatives on the Federal Reserve Board.

SENATE RESOLUTION 183

At the request of Mr. DOMENICI, the names of the Senator from Utah [Mr. GARN], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. HATCH] were added as cosponsors of Senate Resolution 183, a resolution to express the sense of the Senate regarding maintenance of U.S. energy independence and national security interests with respect to uranium.

SENATE RESOLUTION 206

At the request of Mr. DURENBERGER, the name of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. LUGAR] was added as a cosponsor of Senate Resolution 206, a resolution to urge Federal agencies with flood control responsibilities to plan for and execute efficient and effective cooperation and technical assistance to State and local governments to mitigate the consequences of the high water levels on the Great Lakes.

SENATE RESOLUTION 218—ORIGINAL RESOLUTION REPORTED WAIVING CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET ACT

Mr. THURMOND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the following original resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Budget:

S. RES. 218

Resolved, That, pursuant to section 303(c) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, section 303(a) of that Act be waived with respect to S. 1200 as reported. S. 1200 as reported, the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1985, authorizes the payment of entitlement benefits commencing during fiscal year 1989 to cover the full estimated costs to the States for public assistance to the legalized aliens, and for imprisonment costs; and Senate consideration of S. 1200 at the present time would violate section 303(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, in that the bill would provide new spending authority described in section 401(c)(2)(C) of that Act to become effective during fiscal year 1989, before the first concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1989 has been adopted. A waiver of section 303(a) of that Act is necessary to provide for the timely consideration of S. 1200.

NOTICES OF HEARINGS

COMMITTEE ON ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I would like to announce for the information of the Senate and the public the scheduling of a public hearing before the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources to examine the impact of moratoria on Outer Continental Self leasing in Federal waters adjacent to the coastline of the State of California.

This hearing will be held on Tuesday, September 17, beginning at 10 a.m. in room SD-366 in the Dirksen Senate Office Building in Washington, DC.

Those wishing to testify or who wish to submit written statements should contact the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, room SD-358 Dirksen Senate Office Building, Washington, DC 20510. For further information, please contact Jeff Arnold at (202) 224-5205.

AUTHORITY FOR COMMITTEES TO MEET

COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE, SCIENCE, AND TRANSPORTATION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Tuesday, September 10, to conduct a meeting on the nominations of Terrence Scanlon and Anne Graham to the Consumer Product Safety Commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON EDUCATION, ARTS, AND HUMANITIES

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Education, Arts, and Humanities, of the Committee on Labor and Human Resources, be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Tuesday, September 10, 1985, in order to conduct a hearing on the reauthorization of the Higher Education Act of 1985.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Governmental Affairs be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Tuesday, September 10, to hold a hearing on S. 1527, the Civil Service Pension Reform Act of 1985.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

VITAMIN A DEFICIENCY

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I would like to bring to the attention of the Senate the following September 5, 1985, New York Times article about the perils of vitamin A deficiency among the children in developing countries. This article clearly points out the need for the legislation Senator RUDMAN and I have introduced. Our legislation, S. 1451, would earmark $30 million in the Agriculture, Rural Development, and Nutrition account of the AID budget to be disbursed over a 3-year period, for nutrition programs which reduce vitamin A deficiency. We believe the cost to be minimal in terms of the benefit it provides to children worldwide. I call on my colleagues to read the following article and add their names as cosponsors to this important legislation. I ask that the article be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The article follows:

DIET DEFICIENCY OF VITAMIN A IS REVEALED AS A MAJOR KILLER

(By Erik Eckholm)

Dietary deficiencies of vitamin A, long implicated as a cause of blindness, have now been linked to hundreds of thousands of deaths of children each year in Africa, Asia and Latin America.

New findings, described by one expert as "electrifying" in their implications, are galvanizing international efforts to combat the deficiency. The studies indicate that the vitamin deficit, which is widespread in the third world and a major cause of blindness there, is also responsible for significant increases in measles, diarrhea and other potentially deadly diseases among tens of millions of children.

International health officials are developing a plan they hope will eliminate the deficiency worldwide and, in the process, reduce childhood deaths. Experts said the findings had already rejuvenated flagging vitamin therapy programs in Bangladesh and other Asian countries.

Earlier this year, the highest incidence of vitamin A deficiency ever recorded in any population was discovered in famine victims trekking into feeding camps in Ethiopia and the Sudan. Relief officials mounted a quick response, one of many largely unheralded subplots in the larger dramas of life and death in Africa that have caught the world's conscience over the last year. Since March, physicians say, airlifted shipments of high-dose vitamin A capsules to Ethiopia and the Sudan have saved thousands of children from certain blindness and from increased illness.

On the Indonesian island of Sumatra, where inadequate consumption of vitamin A is commonplace, death rates among small children receiving vitamin A therapy were one-third lower than among other children in equally poor circumstances who did not receive the supplements, according to the most recent and conclusive of the studies linking the nutrient deficit to excessive mortality.

That insufficient vitamin A can damage eyesight has long been established. In ancient Egypt and Greece observers noted that the eyes of young children sometimes withered when they consumed an unvaried diet. Today the World Health Organization estimates that half a million children in Africa, Asia and Latin America are permanently blinded each year by xerophthalmia, from the Greek for "dry eye," resulting from inadequate vitamin A. Millions more suffer the lesser, and reversible, debility of night blindness, which causes children to stumble about at twilight. Nutritional blindness has essentially disappeared from the developed world, where diets meet minimum needs for the nutrient.

Although health officials have recognized nutritional blindness as a severe problem for decades, they have seldom granted it high priority when dispensing scarce health funds.

"When the main concern was night blindness, health ministers said, understandably, 'I feel terrible about that, but I can't put my resources into it when half our children are dying before the age of 5,'" said Dr. Alfred Sommer of Johns Hopkins University, who directed the Indonesia studies. But now, he said, in view of the evidence linking inadequate vitamin A to heightened mortality, "ending the deficiency is starting to be viewed as a mainstream activity, not a peripheral one."

The "electrifying" new evidence, said John H. Costello, director of Helen Keller International, "has rekindled interest in the vitamin A problem" among aid agencies such as the United Nations Children's Fund, which finances projects to promote the survival of children, and among third world governments. Helen Keller International, in New York, is the main private group working to prevent nutritional blindness. In Washington, legislation is pending that would more than double the Agency for International Development's vitamin A programs, to $8 million a year.

Dr. Nevin S. Scrimshaw, professor of nutrition at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, called the Indonesia findings "very important." He said the findings had created new enthusiasm for the global strategy to eradicate vitamin A deficiency being promoted by the World Health Organization, which is now trying to raise $25 million for the first five years of the program. Many experts believe that, through vitamin-capsule distribution, nutrition education and fortification of foods with the vitamin, the deficiency could be largely eradicated even without deeper social progress.

According to Dr. Sommer, 5 million to 10 million children develop night blindness or more severe effects of vitamin A deficiency each year, and an additional 20 million suffer more subtle deficiencies that impair their health. In Asia, the deficiency has been found to be rampant in India, Bangladesh, Indonesia, the Philippines and Thailand; little is known about rates in China. In Latin America the deficiency remains a threat in Haiti and isolated pockets elsewhere. Almost nothing is known about the adequacy of vitamin A in African diets, though fragments of evidence indicate a vast problem.

FIRST SIGN IS NIGHT BLINDNESS

The first overt sign of the deficiency is night blindness. Native names for this condition in Indonesia, India and Bangladesh mean, literally, "chicken eye." Its victims, like chickens, which lack ocular mechanisms for vision in low light, tend to walk erratically in the evening dimness. Night-blind children, physicians say, often spend twilight time sitting silently in a corner to avoid embarrassment. In more advanced stages, the whites of the eyes becomes rough and wrinkled. Then the corneas dry and scar, impairing vision, and finally the corneas rupture, leaving the victim totally blind.

The primary victims are the children of the poor and landless who have least access to the green leafy vegetables, fruits, milk, eggs, liver and fish that provide the vitamin. Cultural practices often accentuate the problem. Mother's milk provides vitamin A but postweaning diets often do not. In Indonesia, most adults consume green vegetables but tend not to feed them to small children. And in Bangladesh, girls are less susceptible than boys because they nibble on vegetables, not generally fed to children, as they stir cooking pots.

Exactly how the deficiency promotes potentially deadly diseases is unclear. Experts said it might suppress the immunological system either directly or indirectly by interfering with iron metabolism, which in turn debilitates the white blood cells that attack invading disease agents. Evidence also suggests that the deficiency causes a hardening of mucous membranes in the gastrointestinal and urinary tracts as well as around the eyes. As these normally moist tissues become skinlike and cracked, a process known as keratinization, they may provide microbes with easy pathways to vulnerable organs.

During food shortages, vitamin A intake sometimes actually improves as desperate people turn to eating nutrient-rich leaves from the environment. But during severe famines and where the landscape is barren, as in parts of Africa in recent years, a chronic, subtle deficiency of the vitamin can quickly be transformed into an open ravager of eyesight. Scientists presume that the lengthy drought afflicting Ethiopia, the Sudan and other African countries has exacerbated a pre-existing dietary deficit of vitamin A. Ethiopian tribes have 27 different names for night blindness, indicating long familiarity with the problem, Dr. Sommer noted.

Last winter, as emaciated drought victims arrived at feeding centers in Ethiopia and the Sudan, veteran relief officials noticed signs of eye injury and called for an expert appraisal. In January doctors from Helen Keller International visited 10 centers in the two countries. They were appalled by what they saw: In some camps nearly 10 percent of the children showed advanced forms of eye damage such as dry patches and corneal scarring, the highest rates ever recorded anywhere. "It is certain that many children in East Africa have become blind and thousands more are in danger of becoming blind," the physicians warned.

Beyond suffering years of poor harvests, many famine victims from warring regions of Ethiopia had reached feeding camps in the Sudan only after weeks of walking through parched desert terrain. "Those that made it to the camps had been without vitamin A for a very long time," said Dr. Victoria Sheffield of Helen Keller International, who recently returned from another assessment of conditions in East Africa. Once in the camps, people received little, if any, of the nutrient in their emergency rations; even vitamin-fortified powdered milk does not provide the nutrient at high enough levels to reverse developing cases of blindness.

Within a month of its alarming January report, the New York agency arranged for two million doses of vitamin A to be sent to the Sudan and Ethiopia. Three pharmaceutical companies donated the vitamin capsules, while another private aid group, Catholic Relief Services, and the United Nations airlifted them to Africa. Officials believe the problem is under control for now, but they worry about the deficiency's effects on millions more Africans who have endured years of drought but have not visited feeding centers or health clinics ready to counter the threat.

25,000 CHILDREN STUDIED

In the late 1970's, while studying eyesight problems on the Indonesian island of Java, Dr. Sommer and colleagues found, "quite unexpectedly, that children with night blindness were dying at a much higher rate than the children next door," he said. They found that, other forms of malnutrition aside, the more severe the vitamin A deficiency, the higher the mortality, mainly from increased rates of respiratory diseases and diarrhea.

The scientists, taking advantage of a vitamin therapy program about to begin in Sumatra, then carried out a more scientifically controlled study of 25,000 children in 450 villages from 1982 to 1984. The therapy could not be introduced to all villages immediately, so the scientists were able to compare health in half the villages, where children received megadoses of vitamin A every six months, with health in the other villages, comparably poor, that had not yet received the therapy. In the one-year interval between examinations of each child, they found that the death rate among those 2 to 6 years old who had received the capsules was 35 percent lower than that among untreated children. No other differences in health care or nutrition between the two groups could be discerned. Dr. Sommer presented the Sumatra findings last month to the International Congress of Nutrition in Brighton, England.

Dr. Barbara A. Underwood of the National Eye Institute in Bethesda, Md., who is a specialist in nutritional blindness, said that scientists had generally accepted the evidence linking vitamin A deficiencies with increased disease and death, but that the magnitude of that effect was still open to question. "We are anxious to see this study replicated in other settings," she said.●

DEATH OF DR. KONSTANTIN D. FRANK

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, a great leader of the New York wine industry, Dr. Konstantin D. Frank, died on Saturday at the age of 86.

As an obituary appearing in Sunday's New York Times duly notes, Dr. Frank was the first viticulturist to demonstrate that Europe's finest vinifera grapes could withstand the rigors of the Northeast climate successfully. Previously, New York winemakers cultivated such hardy domestic varieties as the Concord, Catawaba, and Delaware—all exceptionally vigorous labruscas, but lacking the finesse of some of the more refined vinifera grapes, such as Pinot Noir and Cabernet.

Dr. Frank, who arrived in this country destitute 34 years ago, worked with the reknown Frenchman, Charles Fournier, at the Gold Seal Vinyards south of Geneva, on the shores of Lake Keuka. The two produced New York's first vinifera wines—a Chardonnay and a Riesling—in 1957. Offered commercially under the Gold Seal label, the two wines have been popular ever since.

Mr. President, Dr. Frank's importance to the wine industry of New York cannot be overestimated. I ask that the obituary appearing in Sunday's New York Times be printed in the RECORD.

The obituary follows:

DR. KONSTANTIN D. FRANK, 86, NEW YORK STATE WINEMAKER

(By Bryan Miller)

Dr. Konstantin D. Frank, a New York State winemaker who proved to skeptical colleagues that Europe's finest vinifera grapes could thrive in the rigorous Northeast climate, died yesterday at the Ira Davenport Hospital in Bath, N.Y., at the age of 86. He had suffered a stroke a week ago.

Before Dr. Frank's arrival, New York winemakers cultivated primarily such hardy American varieties as Concord, Catawba and Delaware grapes, which bore little resemblance to the grapes used in the fine wines of Europe.

Since colonial times, grape growers had tried unsuccessfully to transplant the European Chardonnay and Riesling grapes, which make some of the most elegant wines in the world.

Dr. Frank, a Russian immigrant with a fiery temperament, arrived in Geneva, N.Y., in the early 1950's and declared that he would succeed where all others had failed. If Riesling grapes could grow in Russia "where it gets to 40 below and your spit freezes before it hits the ground," he once said, New York State would pose no problem.

A NATIVE OF ODESSA

Dr. Frank was born in Odessa, a fifth-generation descendant of Germans invited by Czar Alexander I to bring Western culture and technology to Russia. He earned his doctorate in agricultural science at the Odessa Polytechnic.

After the 1917 revolution, in which two of his brothers were killed, Dr. Frank was appointed head of the nationalized Troubetskoy estates, whose 2,000 acres of vineyards blanketed the banks of the Dnieper River.

In 1943, when the Germans overran the Ukraine, Dr. Frank went to Vienna. After the war he moved to Bavaria, until, in 1951, destitute at the age of 52, he came to the United States, settling in Brooklyn with his wife, two daughters and son. He worked in an Automat until he saved enough money to go to the State Agricultural Station in Geneva. The only job he could find was hoeing blueberries.

WORKED WITH CHARLES FORNIER

In 1953 be found work at the Gold Seal Vineyards, south of Geneva on the shores of Lake Keuka, where his boss was the renowned Charles Fornier, a former champagne maker in France. Mr. Fornier was experimenting with hybrid grapes, trying to come up with a combination that would have the vigor of native grapes and the finesse of vinifera.

Dr. Frank and Mr. Fornier began a scientific collaboration that bore fruit—vinifera fruit—in four years. In 1957 they unveiled their first experiemental vinifera wines, a Chardonnay and a Riesling. They succeeded by grafting vinifera vines onto sturdy native roots. The two were offered commercially under the Gold Deal label and have been popular ever since.

Dr. Frank eventually went off on his own and started a winery, Vinifera Wine Cellars, with the dream of producing vinifera red wines from the grapes that make the great Bordeaux and Burgundies, Pinot Noir and Cabernet. That goal eluded him. His son, Willi, and son-in-law, Walter Volz, have assumed management of the winery in recent years.

"He certainly was a pioneer along with Charles Fornier," said Hermann J. Wiemer, who owns a winery in Dundee, N.Y., bearing his name. "His courage influenced my decision to try growing vinifera in New York State. Otherwise I would have left and gone out to California."

Mr. Wiemer described Dr. Frank as "very opinionated" and strong in his convictions. "When everybody in Geneva and at Cornell was saying his ideas were impossible, he never gave up," Mr. Wiemer said.

Dr. Frank is survived by his wife, Eugenia; three children, Willi, of Hammondsport, N.Y., Hilda Volz, of Bath, N.Y., and Hellen Schelling of Catskill, N.Y., and six grandchildren.

The funeral will be held Monday at 10 A.M. at the Bond-Davis Funeral Home in Hammondsport.●

THE BALTIC STATES

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, every year this country celebrates Baltic Freedom Day and Lithuanian Independence Day even though those States are neither free nor independent. Why, then, do we go through this annual exercise?

We do it because it is important to remember how the Soviets swallowed up those nations and robbed their people of the traditions they valued so highly. As we watch Soviet actions in eastern Europe and Afghanistan, the Baltic experience serves as a classic case study of Soviet expansionist tactics—armed invasion, obliteration of national identity, and suspension of individual rights.

The loss of their national identity and the freedom to enjoy their cultural traditions was a great blow to the citizens of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania, but Baltic-Americans have done their best to keep those traditions alive.

The freedom and independence we celebrate each year refer to the Baltic spirit if not to today's political reality.

That spirit is described in an article from the Wall Street Journal of July 31, written by Seth Lipsky, and I ask to have the article printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, July 31, 1985]

BALTIC WITNESS AGAINST THE SOVIET TYRANNY

(By Seth Lipsky)

COPENHAGEN.—The community of exiled Balts put the Soviet Union on trial here last week. Before a panel of judges, convened at the Hotel Scandinavia by the World Baltic Conference, witnesses testified on Soviet crimes in Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania in the years since those nations were taken captive under the terms of Stalin's pact with Hitler. Exiles, including many assimilated into Western life, came to hear others, some recently arrived, report on the Russification of their homelands, a process that represses native culture, language and politics and replaces it with an alien ideology from Moscow. The verdict seemed clear enough. Then the group took a chartered ship up the Baltic coast to gain a glimpse of the lost lands.

As protests go, it wasn't much; the 150 or so people involved included almost no famous figures, although one legendary Soviet dissident, Vladimir Bukovsky, was on hand. But the fate of the Balts is something to think about as the glitterati gather in Finland this week to congratulate themselves on the signing a decade ago of the Helsinki Final Act. It reminds us that statesmen can sign all the documents they want, whether they be Molotov and Ribbentrop inking the 1939 Russo-German pact or Gerald Ford, Leonid Brezhnev and a few others putting their names to the 1975 Helsinki accords. Still, the claims individuals hold in their hearts have a way of haunting the diplomats.

The World Baltic Conference found its mark in Helsinki in 1973, when the ground work was under way on the now notorious Final Act. The conference, then a year old, had sent a delegation to Helsinki to press free Baltic interests. One of their number—a Latvian named Uldis Grava, who otherwise works as a marketing man for the Newspaper Advertising Bureau in New York—got invited to a press reception at the East German embassy, where he ended up face to face with the Soviet foreign minister, Andrei Gromyko. The ensuing conversation so angered Mr. Gromyko that he stalked out of the reception and had the Finnish government arrest the Baltic delegates at their hotel. It took the American secretary of state—then William Rogers—to get the Balts bailed out. They've been getting the Soviet goat ever since.

The gathering here last week is the latest example. Tass went into a tizzy. It used adjectives like "recidivist burglar" and "alcoholic troublemaker" to describe witnesses against the Russification of the Baltic nations. The Soviets sent to Copenhagen their own delegation of captive Balts, with Russian escorts, to tell local newspapers that everything back home was peaches and cream. Their claims won't emerge as credible with those who followed the testimony, some in writing, some in person, of the free Balts. They conveyed not merely the humiliation of an invasion by the Red Army such as struck the Baltic nations in 1940; they emphasized the more maddening attempts, under way in Tallin, Riga and Vilnius, to erase the concept of a nation.

A defector, Valdo Randpere, formerly assistant to the Estonian minister of justice, told how the legal code of the Russian republic was transferred to Estonia. A young Russian, Sergei Zamascikov, who was educated in Latvia, defected in 1979 and now lives in Los Angeles, described university reserve officers training classes, where future Soviet military leaders hear condemnations of Latvian ethnic traditions considered to be "bourgeois nationalism." A one-time Lithuanian communist now teaching in England, Alexander Shtromas, spoke of those "who grew old only to realize the monstrosity of the cause they chose to serve." A former Soviet tobogganer and now a Munich housewife, Rita Bruvere, told of Russians telling Latvians on an overcrowed bus in Riga: "We slaughtered too few of you fascists."

Then there was the case of an ex-agent in the Latvian KGB, Imants Lesinskis, now living in the U.S. under a new name. The World Baltic Conference wrote to him at the post-office box through which he maintains contact, and he agreed to participate. He was put on the schedule. Two hours before he was to testify in Copehhagen, he telephoned regrets, as too many spies were around. At 8:30 the next morning, though, according to a conference organizer, Mr. Lesinskis walked into the hotel. He appeared uncomfortable amid the photographers and met conference officials in private. He asked to be driven into the city. His escort of Balts drove him about town, and when he was satisfied he wasn't being tailed, he got out of the car and walked into the train station and out of sight.

So it goes on the front lines of the Cold War. On Sunday, the Baltic Star docked at Helsinki, after its charter up the coast. About 400 Balts staged what the Associated Press called "Finland's first major anti-Soviet protest" since the Warsaw Pact invaded Czechoslovakia in 1968. Mr. Bukovsky, who spent 15 years in Soviet labor camps, was the demonstration's featured speaker. The 10 years since the signing of the Final Act, Mr. Bukovsky told a crowd of 2,000, "have been marked by the communist authorities by the increased aggression, by the unprecedented arms buildup, by the support of international terrorism, by the increase of repression, by jamming radio broadcasts, by imprisoning anybody who is willing to speak out."

Few think the free Balts, in their persistent vigil, threaten the Soviets—except, it would seem, the Soviet themselves.●

GLENN OHRLIN HONORED BY NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE ARTS

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, the National Endowment for the Arts this week will honor 12 master American artists with its highest award. I am most pleased that one of the recipients will be an Arkansan, Glenn Ohrlin of Mountain View. Glenn, a cowboy singer, storyteller, and illustrator, will be recognized in a ceremony on September 12, 1985, as one of the Endowment's National Heritage Fellows. I would like to share with my colleagues some of the specifics of Glenn Ohrlin's talents and life, and I ask that his biography be printed in the RECORD. I am proud to represent this individual whose many talents we have come to enjoy.

The material follows:

GLENN OHRLIN

Glenn Ohrlin was born in 1926 in Minneapolis and, at age fourteen, moved to California with his family. Two years later, he left home to become a buckaroo in Nevada, and he has been a working cowboy ever since, first as a ranch hand, then as a rodeo circuit rider, and now as the owner of a ranch near Mountain View, Arkansas where he lives in a stone house that he built himself.

Glenn Ohrlin is a master raconteur, specializing in the most outrageous tall-tales which he delivers in classic dead-pan style. He is also an excellent draftsman and illustrates his own books. The "Hell-Bound Train," with detailed and loving drawings of cowboys and their gear. He is best known, however, as a collector and performer of cowboy songs, some 100 of which he put into his own book along with his personal recollections of cowboy life and lore.

Glenn Ohrlin's song repertoire stems from material that originated in the period 1875–1925—traditional British ballads carried west, mid-19th century sentimental melodies, journalistic poetry, bawdy songs and hobo ditties. He sings them in the classic flat unornamented western style and accompanies them with simple understated guitar rhythms. This is the laconic, tough, masculine in style of western balladry at its peak, powerful and strongly affecting, in part because of its lack of adornment. It is also extremely deceptive; like many such western artists Glenn Ohrlin has a sly wit that sneaks up on you and can cloak the most outrageous sentiments with surface respectability.

During the past two years, Glenn Ohrlin has worked closely with the group of western folklorists who organized the extremely successful Cowboy Poetry Gathering in Elko, Nevada in January of this year. He represented the cowboy poets at the various meetings, during which the program was drawn up, and helped select the final list of artists to be invited. At the Gathering itself, he both performed and acted as host for several poetry readings and concerts. Scholar and singer, throughout the event, he exemplified simultaneously the art form and the artist, assuring by virtue of his lifetime devotion ot western tradition that the goals of authenticity and excellence were ever met.●

PROPOSED ARMS SALES

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act requires that Congress receive prior notification of proposed arms sales under that act in excess of $50 million or, in the case of major defense equipment as defined in the act, those in excess of $14 million. Upon such notification, the Congress has 30 calendar days during which the sale may be reviewed. The provision stipulates that, in the Senate, the notification of proposed sales shall be sent to the Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

In keeping with the committee's intention to see that such information is available to the full Senate, I ask to have printed in the RECORD at this point the notifications which have been received. The classified annexes referred to in several of the covering letters are available to Senators in the office of the Foreign Relations Committee, room SD-423.

The notifications follow:

DEFENSE SECURITY ASSISTANCE AGENCY,
Washington, DC, September 9, 1985.

In reply refer to: I-04584/85ct.

Hon. RICHARD C. LUGAR,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Pursuant to the reporting requirements of Section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act, we are forwarding herewith Transmittal No. 85-52 and under separate cover the classified annex thereto. This Transmittal concerns the Department of the Army's proposed Letter of Offer to Korea for defense articles and services estimated to cost $178 million. Shortly after this letter is delivered to your office, we plan to notify the news media of the unclassified portion of this Transmittal.

Sincerely,

PHILIP C. GAST,
Director.

NOTICE OF PROPOSED ISSUANCE OF LETTER OF OFFER PURSUANT TO SECTION 36(b) OF THE ARMS EXPORT CONTROL ACT

(i) Prospective purchaser: Korea.

(ii) Total Estimated value:

	Million
Major defense equipment[1]	$138
Other	40
Total	178

[1] As defined in section 47(6) of the Arms Export Control Act.

(iii) Description of articles of services offered: Twenty-one AH-1S COBRA TOW helicopters with spare engines, concurrent spare parts, special tools, training, support personnel and test equipment.

(iv) Military department: Army (XVE).

(v) Sales commission, fee, etc., paid, offered, or agreed to be paid: None.

(vi) Sensitivity of technology contained in the defense acticles or defense services proposed to be sold: See annex under separate cover.

(vii) Section 28 report: Included in report for quarter ending June 30, 1985.

(viii) Date report delivered to Congress: September 9, 1985.

POLICY JUSTIFICATION

KOREA-AH-1S COBRA TOW HELICOPTERS

The Government of Korea has requested the purchase of 21 AH-1S COBRA TOW helicopters with spare engines, concurrent spare parts, special tools, training support personnel and test equipment. The estimated cost is $178 million.

This sale will contribute to the foreign policy objectives of the United States by helping to improve the security of a friendly country which has been and continues to be an impetus for modernization and progress in Eastern Asia. The sale of this equipment and support will enhance deterrence and contribute to the preservation of peace and stability on the Korean peninsula.

The AH-1S Cobra TOW helicopters proposed in this sale will enhance the Republic of Korea defensive capability and complement the preservation of peace and stability on the Korean peninsula, a key element in the security of Northeast Asia.

The sale of this equipment and support will not affect the basic military balance in the region.

The prime contractors will be Bell Helicopters Textron, Incorporated of Fort Worth, Texas and AVCO Corporation, Lycoming Division of Stratford, Connecticut.

Implementation of this sale will not require the assignment of any additional U.S. Government personnel: however, seven contractor representatives will be required in Korea for one year.

There will be no adverse impact on U.S. defense readiness as a result of this sale.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Pursuant to the reporting requirements of Section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act, we are forwarding herewith Transmittal No. 85-49 and under separate cover the classified annex thereto. This Transmittal concerns the Department of the Navy's proposed Letter of Offer to the United Kingdom for defense articles and services estimated to cost $54 million. Shortly after this letter is delivered to your office, we plan to notify the news media of the unclassified portion of the Transmittal.

Sincerely,

PHILIP C. GAST,

UNITED KINGDOM—PHALANX CLOSE-IN WEAPON SYSTEMS

The Government of the United Kingdom (UK) has requested the purchase of four PHALANX Close-in Weapon Systems (CIWS), spare parts and engineering support. The estimated cost is $54 million.

This sale will contribute to the foreign policy and national security objectives of the United States by improving the military capabilities of the United Kingdom; furthering NATO rationalization, standardization, and interoperability; and enhancing the defense of the Western Alliance.

The sale of these four additional Close-in Weapon Systems would significantly enhance the close-in anti-aircraft warfare capability of UK ships. The UK has the military assets to utilize these systems effectively.

The sale of this equipment and support will not affect the basic military balance in the region.

The prime contractor will be the General Dynamics Corporation of Pomona, California.

Implementation of this sale will require the assignment of one additional U.S. Government representative and two contractor personnel in the United Kingdom for three months.

There will be no adverse impact on U.S. defense readiness as a result of this sale.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Pursuant to the reporting requirements of Section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act, we are forwarding herewith Transmittal No. 85-29 and under separate cover the classified annex thereto. This notification replaces Transmittal No. 85-23 and concerns the Department of the Navy's proposed Letter of Offer to the Federal Republic of Germany for defense articles and services estimated to cost $313 million. Shortly after this letter is delivered to your office, we plan to notify the news media of the unclassified portion of this Transmittal.

POLICY JUSTIFICATION

FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY—HARM MISSILES

The Government of the Federal Republic of Germany (FRG) has requested the purchase of a quantity of 944 AGM-88A High Speed Anti-radiation Missiles (HARM), associated spare and repair parts, test equipment, site survey, training, technical assistance, and support services at an estimated cost of $313 million.

This sale will contribute to the foreign policy and national security objectives of the United States by improving the military capabilities of the FRG; furthering NATO rationalization, standardization, and interoperability; and enhancing the defense of the Western Alliance.

The FRG needs the HARM missiles to provide a defense suppression weapon to combat the missile threat faced by their TORNADO aircraft. HARM will assist in achieving air superiority by enabling their TORNADO aircraft to reach enemy targets and accomplish their tactical mission.

The sale of this equipment and support will not affect the basic military balance in the region.

The prime contractor will be Texas Instruments Corporation of Dallas, Texas.

Implementation of this sale will not require the assignment of any additional U.S. Government personnel or contractor representatives to the FRG.

There will be no adverse impact of U.S. defense readiness as a result of this sale.●

JOHN J. DRISCOLL

● Mr. DODD. Mr. President, this Thursday, September 12, will mark the end of an era for the labor movement in Connecticut. John J. Driscoll, president of the Connecticut State Labor Council, AFL-CIO, for the past 24 years, will step down on that day. At the age of 73, John Driscoll will retire as the venerable leader of the largest labor organization in my State. In honor of his retirement, I would like to share with my colleagues and with the people of the United States a short summary of his admirable life and career.

John has lived a full and remarkable life. His 50-year career in the labor movement spans the dark days following the Great Depression, through the organization of Government workers in the 1960's, to the struggles in the high technology workplace of today.

John Driscoll was born in Waterbury, CT in 1911, the son of Irish immigrants. His first ambition was to be an architect, but after a year at MIT, he transferred to Wesleyan University in Middletown, CT, where he received degrees in philosophy and English. Aiming to be a college professor, he took a fellowship in philosophy at Brown University in Rhode Island. There he started to read about what industrial unions could do for workers. Inspired by his readings, he enrolled at Harvard Law School to pursue a career in labor law. Once again, he felt he was not using his energy to the best advantage.

John eventually took a job at the Bristol Co. in Waterbury, a manufacturer of scientific instruments. He immediately began organizing the company's workers. Shortly after, he was asked to work for the National Union of Mine, Mill & Smelter Workers' local organization. He moved on to become secretary-treasurer of the State's Congress of Industrial Organizations. From there he joined the United Auto Workers. When the UAW withdrew from the AFL-CIO, he stayed on with the newly merged union.

He challenged the Communist leadership of the Mine, Mill & Smelter Workers and helped unionize brass workers in Connecticut. In 1961, he was elected president of the State Labor Council. He has held that position ever since.

The accomplishments of his tenure include obtaining legislative approval of collective bargaining for municipal and State employees and public school teachers, the Fair Employment Practices Act that prohibits job discrimination on the basis of race, creed, or color, and improvements in unemployment compensation benefits. He is a veritable walking history of the labor movement in Connecticut. He is a scholar, a brilliant strategist, a tough negotiator, a compassionate leader, and an eloquent orator. He is a tough, streetwise union organizer, known to all in Connecticut as "Mr. Labor."

Needless to say, Mr. President, we are very proud of John Driscoll in Connecticut. He will be greatly missed when he retires.

JUNK BOND TAKEOVERS

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, although the spate of stories about hostile junk bond financed takeovers no longer dominates the front pages of the daily newspaper, the threat presented to the integrity of our Nation's financial institutions and to our capital markets by the junk bond phenomenon has not abated. Takeovers financed with junk bonds continue.

Last June, I introduced S. 1286, the Junk Bond Limitation Act of 1985. The purpose of this bill is to ensure that the limitations on junk bond ownership which apply to federally chartered financial institutions are also applied to federally insured financial institutions which are State chartered. It also mandates that only the most financially secure federally insured financial institutions, those whose net worth is greater than 6 percent of their total worth, shall be permitted to invest in junk bonds. Finally, the bill makes it clear that the Federal Reserve's margin requirements apply to junk bond financed hostile takeovers.

Although my bill addresses only the most immediate and onerous aspects of the junk bond craze, there also are other detrimental aspects of the slew of takeovers financed by junk bonds. In particular, I am referring to the decreased amount of funds available for research and development by American industries and the dimunition in competition which results from corporate takeovers and takeover attempts. The petroleum division of the American Society of Mechanical Engineers has drafted an instructive statement on these effects of hostile takeovers. I ask that excerpts from the "Statement of the ASME Petroleum Division on the Detrimental Effect on the National Economy of Hostile Corporate Takeovers in the Petroleum Industry" be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

STATEMENT OF THE ASME PETROLEUM DIVISION ON THE DETRIMENTAL EFFECT ON THE NATIONAL ECONOMY OF HOSTILE CORPORATE TAKEOVERS IN THE PETROLEUM INDUSTRY

The free enterprise system is one of the great social inventions of mankind. It allows the economy to be optimized through companies and individuals acting in their own self-interest in a way that proves to be in the best interest of society as a whole. These adjustments include: Control of monopolies; transfer of payments by the government to the disadvantaged; and, restriction of unfair competitive activities not in the best interest of society. Utilizing a mixed economy, the United States has maintained the most stable and prosperous economy in the world.

Corporate mergers which increase the utilization of research and development and allow more efficient production are an essential and beneficial part of the free enterprise system. However, in the petroleum industry recent raids on profitable, stable companies have resulted in a substantial loss in competition and future technology. Competition insures a low and fair price of commodities to the consumer and induces industry to conduct research, development and implementation programs to obtain a temporary advantage over their competition. If competition in an industry declines, the need for investment in research and development declines also. Research and development programs are considered so important by American industry for its own viability that it spends $39.3 billion a year of corporate funds or 33% of pretax income on this effort. The expenditure of a third of corporate profits is most enlightening in that research and development efforts do not immediately result in corporate profits. Depending on the type of industry and research involved, R&D usually affects profits 5 to 30 years downstream. Therefore, a company only interested in temporary, rather than long term, profits can increase its short term profitability by reducing or eliminating its research and development program.

After the recent takeovers of Cities Service, Gulf, Getty and General American Oil, we estimate, based on the companies' market shares, that competition has been reduced by 10 percent. If Phillips Petroleum and Unocal are taken over, total competition will be reduced by 20 percent and with reduced competition, research and development efforts will decline by 15 percent.

Although reduction in competition in the petroleum-fuel industries has, and will have if continued, an immediate effect on price competition, of more importance, is the effect on the nation's future if the loss of commercial incentive and the accompanying substantial decrease in research and development is allowed to continue. Research and development in this industry has already declined by $170 million per year and may decline further to a total of $345 million per year. This reduction is particularly harmful since the petroleum industry does comparatively little research and development at present; spending one-fifth of the American industrial average. Despite a temporary stability in fuel prices, the U.S. does face the serious problem of acquiring a future reliable and stable fuel supply through research and development.

* * * * *

Examination of the 10K reports submitted to the Security and Exchange Commission before and after the takeover of Gulf shows a drop in research and development of $70 million a year; $26 million of this drop occurred before the actual takeover while Gulf was under attack, and the rest after the takeover. Before the takeover, Gulf had one of the best diversified futuristic research and development programs in the petroleum industry. Attempting to estimate the decrease in research and development along the terms outlined above, we find that the probable future loss per year in research and development from the total takeovers of Cities Services, Gulf, Getty Oil, and General American Oil amount to approximately $173 million per year or 7.7% of the research and development budget of the oil industry. Prospective takeovers of Phillips Petroleum and Unocal with another $170 million of research and development bring the possible losses from takeovers to $343 million or a $15.4% possible loss of the total research and development budget in the petroleum-fuel companies since the beginning of the takeover efforts.

It must be emphasized that the takeover efforts do not have to be successful in order to lose R&D. As can be seen in the Gulf takeover case, substantial amounts were being lost just as result of company economies in resisting the takeover. We find also that on the stock market, which has only a short time view of things, the takeover companies (Chevron and Texaco) have suffered a serious drop in stock price. Therefore, even the stock market does not view the increase in scale of these two companies as a favorable development.

* * * * *

Finally, there is evidence that the value given to an old line company with a view to remaining competitive and viable for the future is low in the stock market. The philosophy behind the takeover of these companies in the petroleum area largely rests on the fact that, at the moment, oil costs about $10 a barrel, whereas in the latest takeovers, it is possible to obtain reserves for $5 a barrel. Such reserves, after they are developed, are likely to be sold for $25 a barrel eventually increasing over 20 years to a very high price. A company that has a long view of its operation and of the nation's future would attempt to acquire and maintain oil reserves in order to stay in business over the long haul. Recent examples of hostile corporate takeover attempts present clear evidence, however, that there is an intent to dispose of assets for the quick, short-term gain, and some current federal statutes now provide the corporate raider with advantages to reach this goal.

The use of so-called junk bonds—high-yield, high-risk, debt—appears to be a leading tool in the scheme to distribute a company's equity in a tax-favored manner that results in liquidation of the company. The plan of the breakup of such companies and the sale of reserved assets at a price close to that of development of new assets provide the leverage for destroying the company.

Federal laws that aid the substantial high-risk debt financing of hostile corporate raids need to be changed, in our opinion, because these takeovers result in the liquidation of otherwise profitable companies; and the destruction of such companies and the research and development that they provide, together with competition in the industry, make it contrary to the national interest to permit their destruction. Until some speculator thinks of a new trick, it appears to be sufficient to pass legislation which would remove the unfair advantage that allows the hostile takeover attempts to lead to a successful speculative maneuver for short-term gain.

* * * * *

Therefore, we arrive at the conclusion that a viable company with a plan to be competitive for a long time in the future is a valuable national asset because of the competition it provides and from the research, development and commercialization program that it sponsors. These companies should be preserved from unfair attack. However, we applaud increased competition and takeovers that may result in a more efficient business, a lower price of commodities, and larger research and development programs.●

ADVANCE NOTIFICATION PROPOSED ARMS SALES

● Mr LUGAR. Mr President, section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act requires that Congress receive advance notification of proposed arms sale under that act in excess of $50 million or, in the case of major defense equipment as defined in the act, those in excess of $14 million. Upon receipt of such notification, the Congress has 30 calendar days during which the sale may be reviewed. The provision stipulates that, in the Senate, the notification of proposed sales shall be sent to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Pursuant to an informal understanding, the Department of Defense has agreed to provide the committee with a preliminary notification 20 days before transmittal of the official notification. I ask that the official notification be printed in the RECORD in accordance with previous practice.

I wish to inform Members of the Senate that such a notification has been received.

Interested Senators may inquire as to the details of this advance notification at the office of the Committee on Foreign Relations, room SD-423.

The notification follows.

DEFENSE SECURITY ASSISTANCE AGENCY,
Washington, DC, September 9, 1985.

Dr. M. GRAEME BANNERMAN, deputy Staff Director, Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR DR. BANNERMAN: By letter dated 18 February 1976, the Director, Defense Security Assistance Agency, indicated that you would be advised of possible transmittals to Congress of information as required by Section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act. At the instruction of the Department of State, I wish to provide the following advance notification.

The Department of State is considering an offer to an East Asian country tentatively estimated to cost $50 million or more.

Sincerely,

PHILIP C. GAST, Director.

CONFIRMATION OF JACK LAWN TO HEAD DEA

● Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, recently a very important Presidential nominee was confirmed by the full Senate. On July 16, 1985, Jack Lawn was overwhelmingly confirmed to be the new Administrator of the Drug Enforcement administration.

Mr. President, as chairman of both the Senate Subcommittee on Children, Family, Drugs and Alcoholism, and the Senate drug enforcement caucus, I am aware that there is no more important position in Government than Administrator of the DEA. As illicit narcotics continue to permeate our society to the extent that our national productivity is lowered, our military readiness is impaired, our children and young adults are corrupted, and our rates of violent crime are increased, it becomes obvious that illegal drugs represent our Nation's No. 1 problem. The Drug Enforcement Agency is the Government body charged with enforcing our drug control laws, and there is no one better for the job of running this vitally important agency than Jack Lawn.

An experienced law enforcement officer, Jack Lawn served with distinction and valor with the Federal Bureau of Investigation for many years, in numerous and diverse posts.

Mr. Lawn gained his invaluable expertise not only in the Criminal Investigative Division, where he was responsible for handling inquiries from the House Select Committee on Assassinations relating to the Martin Luther King, Jr., and John F. Kennedy assassinations, but he also served as Chief of the Civil Rights-Special Inquiry Section of the Criminal Investigation Division in FBI Headquarters in Washington. His distinguished career with the Federal Bureau of Investigation led to Mr. Lawn's appointment as Acting Deputy Administrator of the Drug Enforcement Administration in 1982. In a very short time, Mr. Lawn became Deputy Administrator of the DEA, and then was appointed as Acting Administrator when Bud Mullen left the post.

Mr. President, I am fortunate to have worked with Jack Lawn for a number of years, and have been nothing but impressed by his leadership, his experience, his knowledge, and his dedication. Because it is so vital to the future of our society that we effectively counteract the threat of drug abuse, it is necessary that pivotal roles, like that of Administrator of the Drug Enforcement Administration, be filled with unique and qualified individuals—individuals like Jack Lawn.

I congratulate this deserving man for his appointment to head the Drug Enforcement Administration, and I congratulate as well my colleagues in the U.S. Senate for their wisdom in expeditiously confirming Mr. Lawn to head this agency.●

THE GUARD DOG PROGRAM IN MINNESOTA

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, the only viable population of the eastern timber wolf in the lower 48 States exists in northern Minnesota where the species is listed as threatened under the Endangered Species Act.

An ongoing conflict exists between protection of the wolf and the interests of farmers who have livestock in areas inhabitated by the wolves. There is a solution to this conflict which has yet to be tried and tested, that is, the use of specially trained guard dogs to protect the livestock. This proposal, developed by Ray Coppinger of the New England Farm Center, has the support of Fish and Wildlife Service personnel working in the field of wolf related research, the Minnesota Department of Natural Resources, environmental groups, and the farming community.

Mr. President, the House has included $45,000 for this project in H.R. 3011, the Interior and related agencies appropriation bill for 1986, and I have expressed to Senator McCLURE my hope that the Senate will see the merits of the project and retain this funding level.

Mr. President, I ask that an article on the Guard Dog Program in Minnesota be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The article follows:

[From the Minneapolis and Tribune Sunday Magazine, June 30, 1985]

DOGS VERSUS WOLVES

(By David Stamps)

Late April, and the ground in northern Minnesota is still frozen so close to the surface you can't dig a hole deep enough to bury a turnip. But above ground, things are starting to thaw by degrees.

The Ojibwa Indians, observing the annual return of warmth and color to the world, called April's full moon the Pink Moon. Something in the night air makes even the northern lights look less like the icy apparitions of winter. But there is a sound that chills the flesh like a gust straight out of January. The long, ghostly wail of a timber wolf momentarily freezes the night. Even the few early marsh frogs cease their chorus for a minute.

For Clarence Priem, who owns a herd of 180 Angus and Hereford beef cattle in northern Itasca County, the wolves, howling will grow more unsettling in coming months. Wolf pups have scarcely opened their eyes now; from May to October, when the pups must be fed and instructed in the deadly art of the pack, Priem's farm can become a target of wolves' hunting forays. Calves and occassionally an older cow are the victims. It's not easy to make a profit in the cattle business anywhere these days. Farming 720 acres adjoining wolf country doesn't make it any easier.

But this season there may be help in keeping losses down. Three years ago Priem recruited a special shepherd to live full-time with the herd. His name is Andy, short for Anatolian shepherd, one of the half-dozen breeds of guard dog imported from Europe and Asia within the last decade to protect American livestock.

Though not as penetratingly frightful as a wolf's howl, Andy's hefty "woof" is more than enough to inspire alarm in most creatures. Any nocturnal prowler that heard it would be wise to retreat as fast as four legs or two could carry it.

The sight of Andy by daylight, particularly his short, sturdy muzzle, is convincing proof that his bite is equal to his bark. This season, his first as an adult, could be when Andy proves his usefulness. At age 2 last year, not full grown, he killed two coyotes. To hear Clarence Priem's wife, Hazel, tell the story, the word kill is an understatement. He mauled them. When the dead coyotes were found, not a bone was left unbroken.

Which of itself proves noting. Contrary to hunters' tales of 50 or even 70-pound trophies, coyotes—brush wolves, they are sometimes called—weigh only about 30 pounds, less than a third of a full-grown Anatolian shepherd. Andy already weighs about 100 pounds. Wolves are another matter. Adult males can also weigh up to 100 pounds. Moreover, they hunt in packs. Many people express skepticism that a single dog could be of much use.

But then most Americans, whose idea of a guard dog is a mean German shepherd on a long chain, are unfamiliar with the specialized livestock-guarding breeds—the Anatolian shepherd herd from Turkey, Shar Planinetz from Yogoslavia, Maremma from Italy, Kuvasz and Komondor from Hungary. The great Pyrenees from Spain, introduced to the United States in the '30s as a show dog, is the only breed most Americans know even by name. Yet for centuries guard dogs in Europe and Asia have successfully protected livestock—mostly sheep and goats, but in some cases cattle—against predators, including wolves.

Americans' ignorance of guard dogs can jeopardize their survival in this country. Each year a few guard dogs are shot by hunters.

"A lot of hunters, if they saw Andy out with the herd, would shoot him and come up to the house to say they did me a big favor," says Clarence Priem. "Most people just assume any dog with a herd of cattle is chasing them. Hell, a wolf could be carrying off a heifer, and a hunter would probably drive right by and never see it."

Also contributing to the skepticism about guard dogs' effectiveness may be that most Americans are not all that knowledgeable about wolves either.

A senior official at the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service in Washington reportedly expressed his own opinion that guard dogs would be useless against wolves because, he said, the wolves would kill the male dogs and breed the females. But that's unlikely. Wolves, one of the few members of the dog family that mate for life, seldom interbreed with dogs in the wild, though they are physically capable of doing so. When wolves kill dogs, they don't discriminate between females and males.

The key to Andy's effectiveness as a guard dog is that he may never actually fight a wolf. Wolves avoid confrontations with animals capable of fighting back. Thanks to Nature's cunning programming, a wolf understands that any disabling injury that prevents it from hunting is a fatal injury. The pack won't provide for an injured adult.

Though confident it could ultimately kill a guard dog, a wolf would be reluctant to risk injury at the jaws of an opponent like Andy. A wolf need not even see Andy or hear his deep-voiced bark to sense the wisdom of giving the farm a wide berth. A sniff of one of the many fence posts marked with Andy's urine may be enough to get the message: There's a very big canine around here.

Guard dogs' potential role as a buffer between wolves and livestock puts them in the middle of a raging controversy. The 1,200 eastern timber wolves estimated to live in northeastern Minnesota represent the only viable wolf population in the lower 48 states. In recent years that has made Minnesota the site of a heated battle between preservationists, who wish to see the wolf population protected, and the Department of Natural Resources (DNR), which in 1980 proposed a sport-trapping and hunting season as part of its bid to "manage the state wolf population."

That battle appeared to be ended in January of this year when the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals upheld a 1984 ruling from Federal District Judge Miles Lord, who had ruled that a sport-trapping and hunting season would violate the Endangered Species Act of 1973. Minnesota wolves have been protected under that act since 1974. But reports that the Montana Department of Natural Resources is testing the legislative waters for an amendment to the Endangered Species Act to allow hunting of wolves and grizzly bears makes it very likely that the "war against wolves," as Lord called it, could continue here.

51-059 O-86-14 (Pt. 17)

So long as it does, farmers like Priem feel caught in the middle. Wolf predation of livestock is the prime reason cited by the Minnesota DNR for the need to reduce the state wolf population. Yet only a small percentage of wolves kill livestock. In 30,000 square miles of northern Minnesota wolf territory, there are about 12,000 farms that raise livestock. On average, only 20 to 30 farms per year are sites of confirmed losses to wolves.

Clarence Priem, who has been raising cattle since taking the farm over from his father 20 years ago, know this as well as anyone. Some years wolves kill a dozen or more of his cattle; the very next year there may be no losses.

As far as Priem is concerned, the point is not that wolf loss is negligible. (In one year alone, when a shortage of hay after a harsh winter forced him to turn the herd out to pasture early, he claims to have lost more than 30 head.) Rather, he believes that the number of farmers actually victimized by wolves is so small that their voices will invariably be drowned out in the preservation-vs.-management debate.

It comes as no surprise to find that Priem doesn't side with the preservationists.

"The people down in Minneapolis who want to protect the wolves, most of them have never seen a wolf. They probably never will see a wolf, and they wouldn't know the difference between a wolf and a big dog if they did see one," he says. "Myself, I don't know what good a wolf is."

At the same time, Priem doesn't care for the DNR's proposal for a sport-trapping and hunting season. "I don't think there are many hunters clever enough to kill wolves," he said. He doubts that the DNR would be as effective as the federal agents at trapping wolves. He fears they might not trap at all, requiring farmers to do the dirty work themselves.

Since 1978, when Minnesota wolves were reclassified from endangered to threatened, the Fish and Wildlife Service has been allowed to trap and kill wolves that are thought to be livestock predators. When a cow or calf is killed, Priem reports the loss to William Paul, a technician at the Fish and Wildlife office in Grand Rapids, Minn.

Paul first determines whether the loss can be confirmed as a wolf kill, in which case, thanks to 1978 stage legislation, Priem can collect reimbursement up to $400 per animal. If indeed a wolf is the culprit, Paul will set traps. Trapping is now limited to a quarter mile from the farm and to 10 days' duration, unless additional predation occurs. Wolf pups, since they do not kill large livestock, are released unharmed. In some cases the entire pack of six to eight adults may have to be caught.

In 1982, when the Fish and Wildlife Service asked Minnesota farmers who have suffered wolf predation whether they would like to try using guard dogs, Priem was one of four who accepted to offer, saying, "Take anything they give you. It can't do any harm. Hell, you could tie a red flag on a stick out in the pasture, and it might help."

As a pup, Andy was of little use the first season. The first step was to "bond" him with the cattle, which Priem accomplished by shutting him in the barn with six orphan calves. The second season he showed some promise. When a cow died, Andy steadfastly guarded the carcass for 10 days. Normally when wolves find a cow carcass they start eating at the back legs and keep eating as far as their hunger takes them, frequently to the head and shoulders. So long as Andy guarded the cow, there was no scavenging.

But while Andy kept guard at the carcass, wolves killed a calf in another pasture. The prompted a call for trapping. To keep Andy out of the traps, he was locked in the barn. Immediately the wolves moved in on the dead cow. When Andy returned to the job, Paul, the Fish and Wildlife biologist, observed him flush a wolf pup and chase it out of the pasture.

Of five dogs placed on four farms, Paul considers Andy to be one of the two that are successfully guarding livestock against wolves. (A pair of dogs at one farm tended to roam too far afield. Another dog got into trouble for unprovoked killing of neighbors' dogs.) Two successful guard dogs out of five is not a great percentage, but then there is no more guarantee that an individual guard dog will be a success than any thoroughbred racehorse will be a winner.

"It takes a complex mix of the dog's breeding, instinct, environment and training to achieve success with a guard dog," says Ray Coppinger, biology professor and director of the Livestock Dog Project at Hampshire College in Amherst, Mass.

Prompted by the grim realization that predator control of coyotes—including poison, explosive baits, even gassing of pups in dens—was costing $30 million per year and having virtually no success, some Western livestock raisers asked Coppinger and his wife, Lorna, to try to adapt European guarding species to work in this country. Ray Coppinger has imported dozens of dogs—including Andy's mother, rescued from a rock pile in Turkey, where it had been abandoned as an unwanted female pup. More than 500 dogs have been placed on farms across the country. About 250 are working in 35 states.

It's a slow process to learn what breeds respond to what training to make effective guard dogs, and the Coppingers admit that a lot of mistakes have been made in the project. But now the team claims a 70 percent success rate for dogs used to guard sheep against coyotes. Still there are no guarantees. A farmer leases a pup for $1 for the first year. If it doesn't work out or dies, the Coppingers will replace it. If it does work out, the farmer agrees to pay $120 per year plus food and veterinary expenses.

Ernest Haehnel, a Sheep raiser near Motley, Minn., considers his leasing of a Shar Planinetz from the Coppingers five years ago to be one of the better investments he's made.

"Since Boomer has been with the flock, we haven't lost a single sheep to coyotes," says Haehnel.

Haehnel wasn't losing sheep before getting Boomer, the first of the Coppingers' dogs in Minnesota, but only, he insists, because he was penning the entire flock near his house every night—a burdensome chore considering that Haehnel raises some 450 ewes. He now leaves them out all night. Haehnel is so pleased with the success of Boomer that in 1982 he leased another dog, Ben an Anatolian shepherd and littermate of Andy's, to work an adjoining 640-acre section he'd purchased.

George Jurgenson, DNR conservation officer for the area, agrees that the dogs are probably responsible for Haehnel's excellent record.

"In a good year, when there are plenty of mice for coyotes to eat, a farm the size of Ernie's could lose only nine or 10 lambs," he says. "But in a bad year it could lose 20 to 50. I think those dogs are worth their weight in gold."

Some of Haehnel's neighbors find it's hard to believe that Boomer is a guard dog, since the only time they see him is when the sheep are penned up for lambing or shearing. Then, contrary to accepted guard-dog policy, he likes to snooze in the yard.

"I'll admit the big lummox looks pretty useless when he's sleeping," says Haehnel, "but you should hear him out with the sheep at night. When he barks it's like the roar of a lion."

Except for his size—114 pounds—Boomer does not look particularly dangerous. Two common physical traits of all guard-dog breeds are their short muzzles and floppy ears, which given them the appearance of overgrown puppies. In a sense that's exactly what they are, and what makes them effective.

The result of selective breeding is perfectly illustrated by the contrasting behavior of Boomer and Haehnel's border collie, Tip. When put in with the sheep, Tip exhibits classic canine traits that have been bred to perfection in sheepherding dogs. He barks, chases and nips at the sheep. His threatening eye contact alone is enough to unsettle the flock from the other side of a fence. Boomer, arrested at a state of perpetual, albeit overgrown, puppyhood, would rather lick the ewes' faces than chase them. Even then they placidly ignore him.

"You're wasting your time to try to get him to fetch a ball or a stick," Ray Coppinger told Haehnel when he took Boomer. "Guard dogs have a puppy's typical disinterest in objects." But, like puppies, they are very fond of other creatures. A guard dog, raised with sheep or cattle, will grow up to show more affection toward them than humans, providing the owners don't treat it like a pet.

Farmers may have to reinforce a dog's early training by occasionally chasing it out of the farmyard and back to the flock. A successfully trained guard dog will come to the farmhouse once a day for food and a quick pat on the head and then return to the pasture.

But guard dogs can turn very unpuppylike when something endangers the flock. They are independent and readily show disapproval of any changes involving their stock, even a move to a new pasture.

"Boomer has to be tied up when Tip works the flock, or he would tear him to pieces," says Haehnel. He also has to be tied up when the shearer comes or when sheep are being loaded into a stock truck.

"You don't tell Boomer what to do, you ask him," says Haehnel. "I treat him the same way I do a bull or any other large male animal."

The success of dogs like Boomer has prompted the Coppingers to expand the scope of the Livestock Dog Project. Recently they have placed dogs in New Mexico to guard against mountain lions. Last year they submitted a proposal to the Fish and Wildlife Service calling for a more extensive test of guard dogs in Minnesota's wolf range. They have already purchased some cows and are training dogs to adjust to them. If funds could be made available soon, the project could start this summer.

"It could be a spectacular project," says Ray Coppinger. "It's the only kind of predator control that doesn't kill the predator. It protects both predator and prey."

The proposal calls for only $43,400, but chances for quick approval do not look promising. A quarter of a million dollars have been appropriated this year for lethal and nonlethal control of livestock predators, but unless Congress specifically instructs the Fish and Wildlife Service to do so, the agency will probably not use any of that money for guard-dog projects.

The Fish and Wildlife Service does not support funding of the guard-dog project in Minnesota. The service agreed reluctantly to support guard-dog projects in Texas and Oregon only after intense lobbying by conservation groups.

Karen Woodsum, Great Lakes regional representative for Defenders of Wildlife, a Washington-based environmental group that leads the pro-guard-dog lobbying effort, believes that the Fish and Wildlife Service has a built-in bias in favor of lethal control methods.

"If it doesn't involve killing the predator, they don't consider it control," she says.

Though the Fish and Wildlife Service in Washington officially opposes the guard-dog project, local Fish and Wildlife staff members say that they think the project has some potential and that they would like to see it funded. They also dispute the charge that the service is against all nonlethal control methods.

"Before our budget was cut last year," says Bill Paul, "we were experimenting with a bunch of nonlethal control techniques—sirens, flashing lights, taste aversion."

Clearly it will take more than five dogs on four farms to determine their effectiveness against wolves. One farmer or four can't make all the trials and all the errors needed to determine what breed or what training will work best. The Priems admit that they did very little to train Andy other than to raise him with the orphan calves. And putting him out with cows as a pup on his own may have been a mistake, they now realize.

"The first time he tried to lick a calf, one of the cows knocked him on his butt," recalls Clarence Priem. "Then some of the others bullied him."

Andy took to the cattle despite the harsh treatment, but he now seems to prefer spending time with a herd of 150 yearlings that are kept in a separate feed lot. He patrols the farm, including the calving pasture, but mostly he stays with the younger cattle.

At best, guard dogs are probably only a partial solution to the wolf problem. Clarence Priem believes that a dog like Andy, who must be free to roam, would never work out at a farm near a highway. Though much too independent to learn tricks, guard dogs do develop their own peculiar traits. One of Andy's is to lie down in front of the school bus that stops for the three Priem children. (He has also been known to carry dead piglets from a neighboring farm into the yearling pasture and guard them as well as the cattle.)

Andy's most engaging trick is to jump into the troughs at feeding time. If Clarence Priem doesn't give him a pat on the head, he'll jump into each of the six troughs. But as soon as he gets the requisite pat, he trots away to the edge of the herd, sometimes grabbing a mouthful of feed before he goes.

"It's a big problem, and he's not the entire solution," says Priem, "but he helps. One thing I'll sure say for him, he's not just a dog. He's got his own ideas."●

PROPOSED ARMS SALES

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act requires that Congress receive advance notification of proposed arms sales under that act in excess of $50 million or, in the case of major defense equipment as defined in the act, those in excess of $14 million. Upon such notification, the Congress has 30 calendar days during which the sale may be reviewed. The provision stipulates that, in the Senate, the notification of a proposed sale shall be sent to the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

In keeping with my intention to see that such information is available to the full Senate, I ask to have printed in the RECORD at this point the notification which have been received.

The material follows:

DEFENSE SECURITY ASSISTANCE AGENCY,
Washington, DC, September 9, 1985.

In reply refer to I-04433/85ct.

Hon. RICHARD C. LUGAR,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Pursuant to the reporting requirements of Section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act, we are forwarding herewith Transmittal No. 85-50, concerning the Department of the Army's proposed Letter of Offer to Pakistan for defense articles and services estimated to cost $25 million. Shortly after this letter is delivered to your office, we plan to notify the news media.

Sincerely,

PHILIP C. GAST,
Director.

TRANSMITTAL NO. 85-50

Notice of Proposed Issuance of Letter of Offer Pursuant to Section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act

(i) Prospective purchaser: Pakistan.

(ii) Total estimated value:

	Millions
Major defense equipment [1]	$22
Other	3
Total	25

[1] As defined in section 47(6) of the Arms Export Control Act.

(iii) Description of articles or services offered: One hundred ten M113A2 armored personnel carriers with machine guns, spare parts and related support equipment.

(iv) Military department: Army (JDO, VFG).

(v) Sales commission, fee, etc., paid, offered, or agreed to be paid: None.

(vi) Sensitivity of technology contained in the defense articles or defense services proposed to be sold: None.

(viii) Date report delivered to Congress: 9 Sept. 1985.

POLICY JUSTIFICATION

PAKISTAN—M113A2 ARMORED PERSONNEL CARRIERS

The Government of Pakistan has requested the purchase of 110 M113A2 Armored Personnel Carriers with machine guns, spare parts and related support equipment. The estimated cost is $25 million.

This sale will contribute to the foreign policy objectives of the United States by enabling Pakistan to increase its capability to provide for its own security and defense, particularly in view of the increased threat resulting from the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan.

The Government of Pakistan will use this equipment to pursue its overall force modernization plan and to enhance its basic defense capability.

The sale of this equipment and support will not affect the basic military balance in the region.

The prime contractor will be the FMC Corporation of San Jose, California.

Implementation of this sale will require the assignment of four U.S. Government personnel to make three trips to Pakistan for a period of 21 days on each trip.

There will be no adverse impact on U.S. defense readiness as a result of this sale.

PAKISTAN—M109A2 155MM HOWITZERS

The Government of Pakistan has requested the purchase of 88 M109A2 155mm full-tracked self-propelled howitzers with M2 .50 caliber machine guns. The estimated cost is $78 million.

This sale will contribute to the foreign policy objectives of the United States by enabling Pakistan to increase its capability to provide for its own security and defense, particularly in view of the increased threat resulting from the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan.

The Government of Pakistan will use this equipment to pursue its overall force modernization plan and to enhance it basic defense capability.

The sale of this equipment and support will not affect the basic military balance in the region.

The prime contractor will be Bowen McLaughlin York of York, Pennsylvania.

Implementation of this sale will require the assignment of six U.S. Government personnel to Pakistan for three weeks on four separate occasions.

There will be no adverse impact on U.S. defense readiness as a result of this sale.●

IMMIGRATION REFORM AND CONTROL ACT OF 1985

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now turn to consideration of S. 1200, the immigration bill.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—I have no objection personally—but I am constrained to object on behalf of a Senator or Senators.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of S. 1200, the immigration bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Kansas that the Senate proceed to the consideration of S. 1200.

ORDERS FOR WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 11, 1985

ORDER FOR RECESS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that once the Senate completes its business today, it stand in recess until 12 noon Wednesday, September 11, 1985.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

Mr. DOLE. I further ask unanimous consent that following the two leaders under the standing order, there be a special order in favor of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] for not to exceed 15 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR PERIOD FOR TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, following the Proxmire special order, I ask unanimous consent that there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond 1 p.m., with statements limited therein to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CLOTURE VOTE AT 2:30 P.M.

Mr. DOLE. I ask unanimous consent that at 2:30 p.m. the Senate vote on cloture on the antiapartheid conference report with the mandatory quorum call of rule XXII being waived.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. So there would be at least that rollcall, and I would assume, if we can turn to S. 1200, there could be other rollcall votes.

I also indicate that we will not be in late tomorrow evening—I would say 6, 6:15, 6:30.

RECESS UNTIL 12 NOON

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move, in accordance with the order previously entered, that the Senate now stand in recess until 12 noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and at 7:31 p.m., the Senate recessed until tomorrow, Wednesday, September 11, 1985, at 12 noon.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

FRANK TUCK HAS LEARNED MUCH IN HIS 76 YEARS

HON. TONY COELHO
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, recently Mr. Frank Tuck, a prominent figure in the San Joaquin Valley Chinese-American community, celebrated his 76th birthday. Mr. Tuck was the subject of a recent article describing the rich cultural tradition he and his family have maintained in the San Joaquin Valley of California.

Mr. Tuck is a living example of the success that has been achieved by our Nation's immigrant families. He recounts, with amazing clarity, the colorful history of his family—their achievements and assimilation into American society.

It is citizens, such as Frank Tuck, who possess the ability to share with us the contributions of their own cultural heritage, and serve as an important reminder to us all of the ethnic diversity that makes our country great. In recognition of his many contributions I am submitting a copy of the article as it appeared in the Fresno Bee on July 21, 1985.

FRANK TUCK HAS LEARNED MUCH IN HIS 76 YEARS

The old ways and cultures of old Chinatown disappeared so long ago that fairly a third of Fresno's population has cause to wonder why it is even called Chinatown anymore.

And well they might. The "Orientals," as the early Fresno Polk directories listed them instead of by name, have passed into the beyond.

Their descendants have moved across the railroad tracks, above the Shields Avenue no-man's land, beyond Shaw Avenue, and spread out in all directions to be assimilated by the community.

Indeed, the venerable Frank Tuck, dean of the local Chinese community, even wonders why the name Chinatown has survived, because the community makeup many years ago changed to predominantly black and Hispanic.

Tuck, a retired tobacco wholesaler, traces his Fresno roots back to 1874. That's when the county seat was moved here from Millerton and his maternal grandparents, the Ah Kits, moved with it.

His eyes seem to ponder the world from some other time. His unchanging expression, except for the easy grin that radiates wrinkies like a stone tossed onto a mirrored pond, makes him look like some ancient, time-worn statue.

Yet, there is an unmistakable warmth about him, and a keen sense of perception.

Few people in town have touched more of the flock than old Frank Tuck, and his list of community services is too long to be chronicled. He is probably best known for 40 years of association with the old international Institute that was on Waterman Street in west Fresno, dealing with the problems and welfare of hundreds of immigrants.

He has crossed every social line, serving as president of the West Fresno Improvement Association, the Fresno Zoological Society, the Muscular Dystrophy Association, the Toastmasters and the Fresno District Fair Board.

He was born 76 years ago today, on F Street. And his birthday will not go unremembered, although it will be celebrated a day late, tomorrow night in the Cathay Restaurant at Chestnut and Butler avenues.

Doctors and lawyers and Indians and chiefs, old-time friends and politicians and some of his cronies will gather there for a Chinese birthday dinner, and no doubt some reminiscing.

One of his sadder observations is of what he calls the degeneration of Chinatown. At one time, it was a thriving cultural center, stores bulging with customers and merchandise, old China Alley bustling, and a thousand cotton-pickers crowding the streets on Saturday nights. The community boasted a Chinese opera house, and restaurants comparable to San Francisco's.

El Trocadero tavern at Tulare and F Streets was one of the busiest in the San Joaquin Valley, folks jammed the Canales tortilla shop on F Street, and Baretta's Beer Garden on Fresno Street was where Fresnans danced under the stars.

That was all 30 and more years ago, when west Fresno was Chinatown and some of its most prominent—and many of its nonprominent—residents were Chinese.

"The young Chinese have all but discarded the way of the old culture and become totally Americanized," reflects Tuck. With the demise of the first Chinese settlers, the younger ones became "as American as hot dogs." They belong to the Chamber of Commerce, service clubs, and have almost divorced themselves from old Chinese ways.

"About the only old-world customs they retain are a celebration of Chinese New Year and the fall moon festival. I foresee the end of the Chinese tongs in a few years because they have outlived their usefulness."

He remembers the days when the tongs engaged in wars when a gangster element took over some of them to control gambling and opium trafic in California cities.

On a quiet, June night in 1921, as a boy of 11, he was returning with his mother, Becky, from his father's old Lyceum motion picture theater in the 1000 block of F Street when a tong war erupted.

"We were about 50 feet from China Alley and Tulare Street [a gambling row that occupied the alleys between F and G streets] when we heard pistol shots and saw a man drop to the pavement dead. He was Fook Kee, a prominent Chinese merchant.

"My mother rushed me back to the theater and a few minutes later Deputy U.S. Marshal Sidney J. Shannon showed up and told my father [the unofficial mayor of Chinatown] his life was in danger and took him to his home in Divisadero Street by Van Ness Avenue.

"Earlier that same night two other Fresno Chinese were stabbed to death in the tong war which had spread to the whole West Coast."

Tuck recalls that Shannon kept his father under cover for nearly three months while negotiations were under way to settle the tong strife. Frank and his brother, James, and their mother would go by streetcar to the Shannon home three times a week to visit the senior Tuck.

The Shannon and Tuck families had been close for many years, and at one time operated the old McCray blacksmith shop at Millerton.

The tongs originally were set up as a sort of welfare organization when most of the Chinese in the West were single men, shanghaied for delivery to America to work in the mines.

Tuck's grandfather came to America that way. He was a coolie during Gold Rush days and later owned a general store in Sonora.

Chinese paid monthly dues to their particular tong and when they were temporarily unemployed, or too old to work, the tongs provided food and shelter.

Tuck grinned, recalling the myths about the tongs having a myriad of underground tunnels in west Fresno where they allegedly smoked opium and dealt in white-shave traffic.

"These stories," Tuck says, "were figments of the imagination based on the false premise of why Chinese constructed their homes with passageways from their cellars into a common countyard."

While there were perhaps three or four opium dens in Fresno at one time, there never was widespread addiction among Chinese.

"It is strange how in just one generation the public's image of a nationality charges totally, the old stigmas wiped away," Tuck observed. "Today, the Chinese are the last people on Earth anyone would connect with dope.

"There is a pride with the Chinese, to excel, in business and in the profesions. We have many professional people, doctors and dentists and accountants and engineers.

"But one profession that the Chinese frown on is that of the lawyer. They do not encourage their young to go into that. Why? It is considered less than honorable. That is why there are so few Chinese lawyers."

The major influx of Chinese into west Fresno came after the San Franciso earthquake. And at one time in the valley, says Tuck, Chinese laborers harvested most of the farm crops.

Tuck's family history is one of California's most colorful. Material ancestor Ah Kit was the first chinese to join the gold miners at Rootville, a tiny settlement on the south bank of the San Joaquin River that antedated the founding of Millerton in 1854.

In 1895, Tuck's father, John Chan Tuck, moved to west Fresno from Sonora, marrying Becky Kit. The newlyweds took up residence in the 1000 block of G Street, where Frank was born, a half-block from the old house on F Street where he still maintains an address.

He spent a good deal of his growing-up days in the theater that his father operated from 1916 to 1945, where rode the West's great celluloid cowboys—Tom Mix, Hopalong Cassidy, Gene Autry, Roy Rogers, Buck Jones and John Wayne.

West Fresno rose to its greatest economic heights during the period from the outbreak of World War II—the city becoming a majority military area with Hammer Field, Camp Pinedale and a major encampment at the fairground, not to mention endless convoys and troop trains passing through—to the mid-1950s, when mechanization, particularly the cotton-picking machines, took over thousands of farm jobs.

Tuck recounts times when west Fresno sidewalks were "wall-to-wall" people. There were 14 houses of prostitution thriving on Kern, G, F and Tulare streets, and old Chinatown was where folks from across the track came for Chinese food and visited after the theater or an evening of ballroom dancing.

Probably west Fresno's most famous, or infamous legend has to do with China Alley, that two-block alley between the 900 and 1000 blocks of F and G streets. It housed as many as 15 Chinese lottery operations, which reportedly employed as many as 700 people and added millions of dollars to the community's economy.

It even thrived during the Great Depression, he recalled, people somehow always having money to gamble. "There were at least five daily lottery drawings, at 10 a.m. and at 2, 4, 7 and 10 p.m."

The lottery was a good deal like Keno, players marking various numbers (actually they were Chinese symbols), playing the 10 cents a game and up, with a payoff limit per ticket of $5,000.

Lottery runners fanned out through the city and countryside, canvassing businesses, hotels, pool halls, taverns and everywhere else that people congregated.

Tuck particularly remembers a young Armenian runner nicknamed "Smitty," who covered offices in the Patterson Building. "He had mastered enough Chinese to even work in the lottery drawing house."

Frank Tuck can spin tales for hours about old Chinatown, and about the illustrious and not-so-illustrious old-timers who lingered there before passing on to their reward, or punishment, as their individual life lottery tickets dictated.

He has known the good and the bad and the indifferent and could no doubt blemish more than one good name in this town by rattling long-hidden skeletons in the closets.

But those stories are well hidden behind those old eyes. And probably most of us he's known across the years are better off for it.

Happy birthday, Frank Tuck. Happy birthday to you.

CONGRESSIONAL RESOLUTION OF SUPPORT FOR THE SAKHAROVS

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, today I am pleased to join my colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. BARNEY FRANK, in introducing a resolution reaffirming the human rights of Drs. Andrei Sakharov and Yelena Bonner. This sense of Congress resolution urges the President to relay to the Soviet Union our strongest concerns about the lack of information with regard to the whereabouts and well-being of these two noted individuals.

Dr. Sakharov, a Nobel Peace Prize winner, and his wife, Dr. Yelena Bonner, have been exiled to Gorky for the past 5 years. In the last half year, their condition has deteriorated rapidly; Dr. Sakharov was reported to be on a hunger strike, and Dr. Bonner is in need of medical attention that can only be obtained in the West. This past summer they disappeared from their apartment, and since the spring, only two postcards have been received, the most recent of which is already several months old.

Dr. Sakharov's stepson, Alexei Semyonov, is extremely concerned about the lack of postal and telephonic communications with his parents, and brought a postcard to me in June contending there was evidence of tampering. Because the situation has worsened of late, Alexei has begun a hunger strike, now in its 12th day, which petitions the Soviet Government to release his parents, wherever they may be; allow the freedom of communication called for in the Helsinki Final Act and other international agreements to which the Soviet Union is signatory; and further to grant him a visitor's visa so that he may visit his parents and learn the true state of their mental and physical health.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation requests the President, "to protest, in the strongest possible terms and at the highest levels, the blatant and repeated violations of the Sakharovs' rights by the Soviet authorities, and to call upon all other signatory nations of the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe to join in such protests." I urge our colleagues to join this noble effort by cosponsoring the resolution and urging the Foreign Affairs Committee to hold early hearings.

Mr. Speaker, the full text of this resolution, which I commend to my colleagues attention, follows:

H. CON. RES. 186

Whereas the Universal Declaration of Human Rights guarantees to all the rights of freedom of thought, conscience, religion, opinion and expression;

Whereas this same Declaration states that "no one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest, detention, or exile;" and that "no one shall be subjected to arbitrary interference with his privacy, family, home or correspondence;"

Whereas the Declaration further states that "everyone has the right to freedom of movement and residence within the borders of each State," and that "everyone has the right to leave any country, including his own, and to return to his country;"

Whereas the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights provides that "everyone lawfully within the territory of a State shall, within that territory, have the right to liberty of movement and freedom to choose his residence," and that "everyone shall be free to leave any country, including his own," and that "no one shall be arbitrary deprived of the right to enter his own country;"

Whereas the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe provided that each of the "participating states will respect human rights and fundamental freedoms, including the freedom of thought [and] conscience . . . for all," and recognized that all human rights "derive from the inherent dignity of the human person,"

Whereas this same Act pledged that the participating states would "deal in a positive and a humanitarian spirit with the applications of persons who wish to be reunited with members of their family, with special attention being given to requests of an urgent character—such as requests submitted by persons who are ill or old;"

Whereas the Act further commits participating states "to facilitate wider travel by their citizens for personal or professional reasons;"

Whereas the Act specifically affirms the "right of the individual to know and act upon his rights and duties" under the agreement, and affirms the positive role individuals play in the implementation of the Act;

Whereas the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics signed the Final Act of the Conference on Cooperation and Security in Europe, is a party to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and has ratified the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights;

Whereas Nobel Laureate Andrei Sakharov, who, exercising his right as an individual to monitor compliance with the Final Act, had become a leader of the human rights movement in the Soviet Union, was arrested and exiled to Gorky in direct contravention of the abovementioned human rights agreements;

Whereas his wife Elena Bonner, as a result of her efforts to exercise her right of self-expression, has been detained and charged with anti-Soviet agitation;

Whereas Dr. Bonner is thought to be in urgent need of medical attention available only in the West;

Whereas Dr. Sakharov is reported to have undertaken a hunger strike, to the point of endangering his health;

Whereas communication between the Sakharovs in the Soviet Union and their children and stepchildren in the United States has been repeatedly interrupted, delayed, and tampered with by the Soviet authorities,

Whereas the absence of reliable communications between the branches of the family has created serious doubt as to the state of well-being of Dr. Sakharov and Dr. Bonner;

Whereas Mr. Alexei Semyonov, the stepson of Dr. Sakharov and the son of Dr. Bonner, has embarked on a hunger strike to dramatize the plight of his family and to protest the cruel obstruction of his efforts to communicate with his loved ones;

Whereas Mr. Semyenov has demanded a visitor's visa to visit the Soviet Union so that he can reassure himself with his own eyes that his parents are alive and well: Now, therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the sense of Congress that, in accordance with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, and the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, the Soviet Union should drop all charges against Elena Bonner, restore to her and to Dr. Sakharov the full rights to travel (domestic and international) and free expression, allow unimpeded correspondence between them and their relatives and friends in the West, and allow Alexei Semyonov permission to visit them in the Soviet Union.

SECTION 1. The Congress urges the President—

(1) to protest, in the strongest possible terms and at the highest levels, the blatant and repeated violations of the Sakharov's rights be the Soviet authorities, and

(2) to call upon all other signatory nations of the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe to join in such protests.

SEC. 2. The Clerk of the House shall transmit copies of this resolution to the Ambassador of the Soviet Union to the United States and to the Chairman of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

PRESERVING THE AUTHORITY OF THE SECRETARY OF LABOR UNDER FECA

HON. AUGUSTUS F. HAWKINS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. HAWKINS. Mr. Speaker, on August 1, 1985, I engaged in a colloquy with the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA] to clarify the intent and effect of language in H.R. 2068, the Foreign Relations Authorization Act, Fiscal Years 1986 and 1987. The colloquy made clear that the language in sections 112 and 118 of H.R. 2068 does not empower the Secretary of State with authority nor dilute the existing exclusive authority of the Secretary of Labor to decide questions of eligibility for medical and disability benefits under the Federal Employees Compensation Act.

At the time of the colloquy I included for the RECORD two letters from Secretary of Labor Brock, and requested that an anticipated letter from the Secretary of State be included in the RECORD when it was received. Since the letter from the Department of State was not received in my office until August 19, I am including it at this point in the RECORD for the information of my colleagues.

I have also requested that the letter be included at the appropriate point in the permanent CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 1, 1985:

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, DC, August 7, 1985.

Hon. AUGUSTUS HAWKINS,
Chairman, Committee on Education and Labor, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: In connection with the pending enactment of H.R. 2068, the State Department authorization bill for FY 86-87, I would like to clarify our understanding as to the intent and effect of sections 112 and 118 of the bill.

Sections 112 and 118 concern the overseas contracting authority of the Secretary of State. It is the position of the Administration—and we understand that this position is consistent with that of the managers of the bill for the House of Representatives and the Senate—that neither sections 112 or 118 contained in the Conference Report may be construed so as to affect the Secretary of Labor's existing authority under the Federal Employees Compensation Act to determine questions involving the employment relationship of any individual with the United States Government and the application of any benefits under that act to any such individual. It is further understood by the Administration that the terms "any other law administered by the Secretary (of State)" may not be construed, and is not intended to grant the Secretary of State any authority to decide questions of eligibility of such individuals for medical and disability benefits under the Federal Employees Compensation Act.

In addition, the Department of State is in full accord with Secretary Brock's letter of July 29, 1985 on the same subject with respect to the Federal Employees Compensation Act.

I would appreciate it if you could make this letter a matter of record in connection with the enactment of this measure.

With best wishes,

Sincerely,

WILLIAM L. BALL III,
Assistant Secretary,
Legislative and Intergovernmental Affairs.

EXPOSING APARTHEID

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I am inserting a review of a book from the September 26 edition of the New York Review of Books by Leonard Thompson entitled "The Mythology of Apartheid." The review is particularly noteworthy because it is by Bishop Desmond Tutu.

I hope that Bishop Tutu's review will provide further insight on the warped historiography that is the intellectual and moral basis for apartheid. By striking directly at the myths behind apartheid, Bishop Tutu cuts it at its core.

[From the New York Review of Books, Sept. 26, 1985]

MYTHOLOGY

THE POLITICAL MYTHOLOGY OF APARTHEID, BY LEONARD THOMPSON

(By Bishop Desmond Tutu)

I remember as if it were yesterday our reactions as black primary school children when we read what the Reverend Mr. Whitehead had to say when describing the relations between the Xhosas on the eastern border and the white frontiersmen. Mr. Whitehead was, I believe, a Methodist missionary who wrote a history textbook which we were obligated to use if we wanted to pass our history examinations. I must underline that my contemporaries and I were not the radicalized and highly politicized students of the sort who were involved in the 1976 uprising and in the current violent protest against the vicious and immoral policy of apartheid. We were rather docile and thoroughly unsophisticated and naive, hardly questioning what appeared to be the divine ordering of our segregated society. It is therefore particularly noteworthy that it was such innocents who found certain features of Mr. Whitehead's historiography disturbing.

We found it distinctly odd that in virtually every encounter between the black Xhosas and the white settlers, Mr. Whitehead invariably described the Xhosas as those who stole the settlers' cattle and of the white settlers he would write that the settlers captured the cattle from the Xhosas. We did not press this point at all, or hardly at all, in class discussion; but when we were outside we would mutter that it was very funny. It certainly seemed to be stretching coincidence to breaking point. We often remarked that after all, these farmers had no cattle when they landed in South Africa, and all their cattle had had to be procured from the indigenous peoples.

But if we had given expression to any of these misgivings it would have put an end to our chances of success in the examinations. We would have committed South Africa's unforgivable sin of mixing politics with whatever else we were at the time dealing with. At other times we were a little annoyed to read that such and such a white person had "discovered" this or that, as if there had been no other human beings, for example, to see the Victoria Falls before this superior denizen of another hemisphere came upon them.

These were the vague and unformed misgivings and perhaps hurt feelings of somewhat unsophisticated and really unlettered black pupils, feelings that had not been buttressed by any scholarly research or evidence that could stand up to critical scrutiny. Much later we heard a great deal about Western historical objectivity; it all seemed to suggest that Western historians were able to describe the naked, the real facts without any kind of embellishment or accretion, that they were quite uninfluenced by who they were and where they were, able, as it were, to stand outside themselves and give an account of what had "really" taken place, which would in all material respects be the same account given by any other self-respecting historian.

I have been skeptical of this claim to objectivity especially when it was made in South Africa about journalism (which chronicles contemporary events as a primary source for later historiography) on behalf of white journalists who, it was averred, were somehow paragons of the virtue of journalistic objectivity, as against what might be described as the engaged journalism of their black counterparts; for example, in giving an account of what took place in the 1976 uprisings. I believed that we could not just speak of the truth. It had to be truth from the perspective of some observer. What was the truth of what set off the Soweto uprising? It seemed to some of us that who you were, and where you were, determined to a very considerable extent what you were able to see as the facts. You were not just an unconcerned viewer from the sidelines. Your values had been formed by the community to which you belonged and what rated as being important and significant depended very much on the sort of spectacles with which your nature and upbringing had endowed you. The aesthetic, ethical, and moral values a person derives mainly from the community in which he lives will determine very largely what he will judge as being beautiful, good, and true.

Leonard Thompson in his scholarly case study of the South African situation from the standpoint of a sympathetic but critical historian gives me good reason to have trusted my instincts about the way history has been recorded in South Africa. He starts by describing what he understands by political mythology—that which seeks to provide the historical element in an ideology and is the collection of tales that are used to legitimize or to discredit a regime. He was attracted to this study by a collection of materials showing how politicians in South Africa had made use of falsified versions of history. He seeks to show that South African politicians are not in this matter a breed apart, somehow unique "in exploiting history for political ends." It just happens that some are perhaps more blatant than others in doing so.

In defining the character of political myths and mythology, Thompson shows how these are virtually universal phenomena by quoting examples from countries as diverse as the United States of America and the Soviet Union. Hence they are what he calls "ubiquitous," with a remarkable capacity to be adjusted as the circumstances to which they seek to be relevant change. He also calls them "malleable" for this reason. He then provides three criteria for evaluating the political myth. First, how well does it stand up to the critical scrutiny of the historian who uses a rigorous historical method for evaluating the available evidence and how consistent is the conclusion with the historical data? Second, how closely does the particular myth agree with scientific knowledge? Can it stand up to close questioning from competent practitioners of the science most relevant to the discussion? And finally he uses what he calls a utilitarian criterion, which does not ask whether the myth is true or not but whether its effects are good or bad. Some myths are quite dispensable, such as the myth about the truthfulness of George Washington. Its loss from the American lexicon would not materially affect the nature of American patriotism and national self-esteem.

Others are less so, being integral to the entire ideology of the regime they seek to legitimize. It is possible that at a certain stage in the evolution of the Afrikaner people's self-consciousness, abandoning the myth of an early Covenant among Boers (see below) had deleterious repercussions on their consciousness as a people, believing themselves, as they did, to be besieged by hostile foes in an unfriendly and unknown environment.

Myths, in Thompson's analysis, are either conservative or radical. The latter are developed by local or foreign opponents of a system that they seek to over-throw, while the former are intended to justify that regime. Since political myths are historical phenomena they will tend to change, adapting themselves to changing circumstances, though the change, it is hoped, would not alter the core of the mythology too drastically.

Thompson's pioneering study concentrates on the central racist ideology of the Afrikaner people, according to which, following much that was current as science in the West, and following in the wake of a burgeoning white imperialism that rode roughshod over colonial peoples, white people were inherently superior to black people. After all, this had been claimed by the taxonomical studies that spoke mystifying about brain and cranium size and subsequently about the psychological evidence deriving from IQ tests, etc.

This concept of racial superiority justified various actions and views—for example, that there was nothing wrong per se in enslaving black people or in white men having sexual relations with their womenfolk, since this would ensure that some of their stock would now be improved through this magnanimous infusion of white blood; that there could be no equality between black and white in church, state, or court; that it would be perfectly in order for a white master, without having to be accountable to anyone, to beat the daylights out of his servant who had been uppity. The overall effect was to declare that blacks were human, but not quite as human as white people. The whites had a task imposed on them by God to evangelize and civilize these benighted natives, who were likely to remain as children needing the white man to bear the burden of being their guardian.

This is a view of the nature of things which has remained tenaciously part of how most white South Africans have perceived God's ordering of things. And it is not only Afrikaners who have been guilty of these supremacist views. Even the so-called liberal English-speaking South African has deep down in his heart tended to hold to such views, but he has been careful not to be as blatant in their expression as the less subtle Afrikaner. Racism certainly did not see the light of day in South Africa only in 1948 when the Afrikaner Nationalists, under Dr. Daniel Malan, won a shock victory over General J.C. Smuts with their unashamed doctrine of white baaskap (overlordship), of keeping the black man in his place. This aim was enshrined in the policy that has come to be execrated in the world apartheid (separateness), attracting the opprobrium from the world community which it so richly deserves.

Professor Thompson shows that the Afrikaner political mythology began its career as a radical liberation mythology intended to mobilize the Afrikaners in their struggle for self-determination against a rampant British imperialism. He describes the evolution of the political myth in the story of the uprising of Afrikaner frontiersmen against British hegemony in 1815. It is quite remarkable how selective the chroniclers turned out to be in their accounts of what actually took place. (Perhaps it should not be considered remarkable at all—all history is selective. You select what you consider to be significant. The question is whether your selectivity gives a rounded narrative that tries to take account of all the relevant information and material.)

It is instructive to note how later historians gave an interpretation that seems to have eluded those whose experience was contemporary with the particular set of events. The Afrikaner uprising provided convenient material for agitating against the British administration. First, those who rebelled were shown to be principled people. They were held to be right in refusing to allow a white person to be compelled to answer charges in court brought by a servant. Even more important, they were quite right to resist being apprehended by a British-controlled contingent made up of Hottentots. To show the British administration in an even worse light, the emotive name of Slachter's Nek (Butcher's Neck) was used of the rebellion when the execution of the rebels took place in another place with a more innocuous name. The British were callous and quite unmerciful because the ropes at first broke and the condemned men fell without being killed.

Many believed, or so it was said, that when this happened British tradition was to pardon the miscreants. A later myth had it that just after the execution was eventually carried out successfully, a reprieve for the condemned arrived. Nothing is said about the character of the rebels or about their dubious sexual morality. Nor is it pointed out that hardly any self-respecting Afrikaner frontiermen joined the insurrection and that many of these people concurred with the action of the Cape administration. When the British had withdrawn and the Afrikaner had attained independence, it was important that this myth of British injustice be played down to foster unity between the English-speaking and Afrikans-speaking South Africans.

We are given another example of such manipulation of history for practical motives in the myth of the Covenant allegedly made on the eve of the Battle of Blood River in 1838 by the Afrikaners against the Zulus. Professor Thompson points out how striking it is that on one has preserved the precise wording of this Covenant, which has such a pivotal place in Afrikaner history. It is said to have enjoined the Afrikaner and his posterity to observe the day with religious solemnity and to build a church to commemorate the victory over the Zulus. But strangely enough, for several years afterward, those who first took part in the Covenant organized no ceremonies to commemorate the event; and there is no evidence that those who built a church connected it with the Covenant.

It was much later that Afrikaner politicians used the event as an important rallying point for their people in their struggle against the British and the blacks for supremacy in South Africa. Before the building of the Voortrekker Monument between 1938 and 1948 and the emergence of South Africa as a republic outside the Commonwealth in 1961, the Covenant was used in a thoroughly chauvinistic manner. The annual commemoration of what was called Dingaan's Day (later the Day of the Covenant and then Day of the Vow) was used to beat the Afrikaner jingoistic drum. In more recent times, government speakers and others have sought to make the observance a more national affair, one that includes even the blacks who in former times were virtually pilloried. Some Afrikaner historians have called in question the folk mythology relating to the government. One of these was tarred and feathered for his pains.

Professor Thompson points out that he has not referred to the political mythology of either English-speaking South Africans or the blacks. But he has certainly put us in his debt by the gentle process of demythologizing he carries out in his book and by the ways he calls us to the task of continuing such analysis. My own concern is why the Afrikaner, in view of their history, have been so unsympathetic to the aspirations of blacks. Of all the whites in South Africa, the Afrikaners should have been the most sympathetic because they once believed themselves to be oppressed; and once they embarked on the course of liberation, no one was able to stop them. Why do they think that the same inexorable logic of history will falter in the case of the blacks? Or is it that, as a wit once put it, "we learn from history that we don't learn from history"?

ACCUSED KILLERS OF LAND REFORM ADVISERS GO UNTRIED DESPITE DUARTE'S PLEDGES

HON. ROBERT G. TORRICELLI

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. TORRICELLI. Mr. Speaker, in January 1981, two U.S. land reform advisers, Michael Hammer and David Pearlman, employees of the American Institute for Free Labor Development, and the president of the Salvadoran Agrarian Reform Institute were murdered while eating dinner in downtown San Salvador by two members of the National Guard. Despite strong evidence of complicity in the killings by high-ranking officers in the Salvadoran military, El Salvador's judicial system has thus far avoided prosecuting them. While President Duarte has vowed to investigate human rights abuses and mete out justice, it appears that the result of investigations surrounding these murders may be similar to those regarding the 1980 killings of four American nuns, in which only the four gunmen of the National Guard were convicted, and none of the higher ups who authored the crime. An article appearing in a recent issue of the Council on Hemispheric Affairs' bi-weekly publication, the Washington Report on the Hemisphere, by COHA research associates Leslie Singer and Corinne Rosen, explores some of the developments in the Pearlman-Hammer case.

I would encourage all of my colleagues to read Singer and Rosen's article in view of the close connection of this administration with a government which thus far has shown an inability or unwillingness to bring to justice those reponsible for murdering American citizens in El Salvador.

On July 3 Judge Rolando Calderon refused to order the arrest of Capt. Eduardo Alfonso Avila, one of the military officers implicated in the January 1981 murders of two American land reform advisors, Michael Hammer and David Pearlman, employed by the American Institute for Free Labor Development (AIFLD), and Jose Viera, the president of El Salvador's land reform agency, the Instituto Salvadoreno de Transformacion Agraria, were shot as they ate dinner at the Sheraton hotel in San Salvador. Although three new witnesses have offered testimony directly implicating Avila and Lt. Lopez Sibrian in the murders, the judge said that he found no criminal evidence against the Salvadoran army captain in connection with the killings.

Attorney General Santiago Mendoza Aguilar, a Christian Democrat appointed by Duarte following the dismissal of rightist Jose Francisco Guerrero from that post in May, authorized his office to appeal the lower court's decision.

In a press statement issued by AIFLD on May 22, following meetings between Salvadoran President Jose Napoleon Duarte, that organization, the AFL-CIO and the Hammer family, Duarte reportedly gave assurances that he is receiving the full cooperation of the Salvadoran military establishment in carrying out his commitment to prosecute military officers guilty of human rights violations. Duarte also promised to reactivate the special investigative unit and to examine new evidence in the AIFLD murders, pledging to bring the perpetrators to justice.

According to the gunmen's testimony and an AIFLD investigation, Hammer, Pearlman and Viera, were slain by National Guard members Dimas Valle and Gomez Gonzalez, acting on the orders of Avila and Sibrian. Hans Christ, part-owner of the hotel, allegedly pointed out the intended victims to the officers and later led the gunmen to them. Christ's brother-in-law and hotel partner, Ricardo Sol Meza, also was implicated in the killings.

No convictions have been obtained despite the fact that the Salvadoran government has known the identities of everyone purportedly involved in the crime since the gunmen confessed in September 1982. A Salvadoran Embassy official in Washington recently stated that the confessed killers will go to trial later this summer.

In April 1981, the Salvadoran government arrested Sol Meza and attempted to extradite Christ, who had fled to Miami. The charges against both men were dropped in August 1981 when Judge Jose Albino Tinetti, appointed by the Supreme Court to investigate the charges against Sol Meza, stated that there was not enough evidence to prosecute them. The court's decision was sustained by both the Salvadoran Appeals Court and the Supreme Court.

Following the gunmen's confessions, Sibrian was arrested in connection with the murders, but charges against him were provisionally dismissed by a Salvadoran appeals court in October 1982 because Valle and Gonzalez could not identify Sibrian after he altered his appearance by shaving his moustache and dying his hair.

The provisional dismissal meant that the prosecutor had to present new evidence against Sibrian within one year—before the statute of limitations expired. Under Salvadoran law, the gunmen's disclosures cannot be used as evidence against the officers because the testimony of a confessed murderer cannot be considered as evidence against another accused of the same crime. The appeals court's decision was upheld by the Fifth Penal Court and the Supreme Court. The higher court also ordered a definitive stay of the proceedings against Sibrian, thereby closing the case against him. According to the Salvadoran Embassy to the United States, however, Duarte introduced a bill in the Legislative Assembly in June which would extend the statute of limitations to allow the introduction of new evidence so that Sibrian can be tried. The lieutenant was discharged from the army by the president in November 1984, but was only charged with "military infractions."

In December 1983, Capt. Avila was arrested by the Salvadoran police and taken into custody; however, he was charged only with leaving his post without permission—a minor military infraction—rather than for his role in the murders. However, he did testify in March 1984 that he did "not know the facts of the crime" and stated that he did not know the gunmen. He was subsequently released.

The New York Times reported June 28 that Patsy Walker, the wife of former American military attache Col. Gerald S. Walker, testified that Avila confessed his role in the murders to her in 1982, and implicated Sibrian by stating that a man named "Fosforito," reportedly Sibrian's nickname, was aware of all that had happened at the Sheraton Hotel. A Costa Rican citizen, Carlos Francisco Aguilar, also testified that Avila told him of his involvement in the Sheraton killings and in "various operations" in El Salvador, also implicating Sibrian in such activities. In light of the Salvadoran court's refusal to order Avila's arrest on the basis of these new developments, it seems unlikely that Sibrian will be prosecuted using the new evidence, assuming that the statute of limitations bill passes and can be used to nullify the 1984 Supreme Court decision which acquitted him.

In a March 1985 report on unresolved political killings in El Salvador, a U.S. lawyers' group noted that Capt. Avila's uncle is a judge on the Supreme Court and has reportedly used his influence in the past to assign judges to the case who sympathize with the officers' positions. The report also stated that six of the nine judges on the Salvadoran Supreme Court are closely tied to right-wing parties and the military. According to El Salvador's new constitution, promulgated in 1983, the nine judges, appointed by the rightist-controlled National Assembly prior to the Christian Democrats' electoral victory in March 1985, will serve until June 1989 and are responsible for appointing all lower court judges, who hold their positions for life.

Given the nature of El Salvador's tainted and corrupt judicial system and the military's traditional unwillingness to prosecute its own members in politically motivated killings, the Duarte government faces serious obstacles in its efforts to prosecute Sibrian and Avila. Furthermore, prosecution of the two surely isn't one of the major priorities of the Salvadoran president since he became convinced that the unsolved, high-visibility murders will not deter the U.S. Congress from pouring military aid into the country.

ANSEL ADAMS, CONSERVATIONIST

HON. TONY COELHO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, last month, a mountain peak in Yosemite National Park was dedicated in honor of the dean of nature photographers, the late Ansel Adams.

Mr. Adams' death last year ended a most prolific career dedicated to capturing on film the magnificence of our national parks, including Yosemite, in a way that only he could. Not content to preserve their beauty only on film, as a dedicated conservationist Mr. Adams also fought to preserve these lands in their natural state for the enjoyment of future generations.

Anyone who has experienced the magnificence that is Yosemite can appreciate the great debt we all owe to Mr. Adams for his efforts to record and preserve the beauty of this and other national parks. The dedication of Mount Ansel Adams is certainly a fitting tribute to this great man, as it will serve to remind us of the principles he stood for for many years to come. I would like to express my appreciation to his son and daughter-in-law, Mike and Jeanne Adams, two very good friends of mine, for all that Mr. Adams contributed to our Nation.

An outstanding article about Mr. Adams appeared recently in the Fresno (CA) Bee, and I think it is fitting that it be reprinted here in recognition of his achievements:

[From The Fresno Bee, Aug. 24, 1985]

ANSEL ADAMS, CONSERVATIONIST

A lineup of notables will gather in Tuolumne Meadows today for a ceremony dedicating a Yosemite National Park mountain peak in honor of Ansel Adams. He died last year at the age of 82 after finally losing his stubborn grip on the here and now.

A 119,000-acre Wilderness Area in the Sierra between the Minarets and the John Muir Wilderness already has been named for Adams. Designating a specific mountain in his honor will thus add more luster to Adams' reputation.

Scheduled to participate in the ceremony today will be Interior Secretary Donald Hodel, Sen. Alan Cranston, and other assorted government grandees, along with conservationists and celebrities like actor Robert Redford.

No doubt everybody will praise Adams for his accomplishments as a landscape photographer and as a leader in the conservation movement.

My regards to them. They are to be respected for their homage to a great man. But the ones who are the most important in Ansel Adams' career, especially as a conservationist, will not be part of the crowd.

They can't be. They are the unborn, the generations of the 21st century and even beyond that, who will be able to enjoy Yosemite and the other places of natural grandeur that Adams helped save from destruction.

You think I am puffing Adams, giving him too much credit, that white-bearded old Michelangelo of the camera?

I'm not. Adams was a great photographer, perhaps the most skillfull nature photographer America has produced. But he was more. His photographs helped create a climate for conservation every bit as much as did the writings of John Muir.

Adams caught images of rocks, clouds and trees on film, but his art transformed them beyond the material. Bathed in a magical light whose secret only he seemed to know, they assume a spiritual quality. When seen this way, "with the inner eye of the spirit," he wrote, "the clear realities of nature . . . reveal the ultimate echo of God."

Looking long and closely at Adams' photographs with that inner eye of the spirit is enough to make one determined those scenes will never succumb to exploitation because they are sacred.

But Adams didn't just let his art speak for him. From 1920 onward, he was involved in activities to protect the environment from those who would despoil it for selfish gain. He was one of the founders of the Wilderness Society and he fought to return Yosemite Valley, where he had a photographic shop, to a more natural state after years of ruinous commercialization.

In those early days, he once reminisced, the valley was a place of "general disorder, garbage, dust and uncontrolled camping. Livestock was staked out or turned loose in the meadow. The firefall was pushed nightly over Glacier Point [for the benefit of tourist] . . . Camp Curry had a pool hall and a bowling alley where nightly thunders vied with the roar of the waterfalls."

Adams joined with park officials and others to rid the valley of the worst abuses. He wasn't entirely satisfied with the results, criticizing the "bureaucratic power and the quasi-feudal paternalism of the concessions," but no one can deny conditions are better today than when he denounced them.

In more recent times, Adams continued to be active on behalf of conservation efforts despite his advanced age. He worked, for instance, for the establishment of a Big Sur national park. He also opposed the attempts of then Interior Secretary James Watt to open formerly protected natural resources to development.

Watt reacted to the troublesome old man with customary scorn. Adams, Watt contended, had never taken a photograph with a human being in it.

That wasn't so. Adams' defenders pointed out that he took at least a thousand portraits, one of them the official presidential portrait of Jimmy Carter.

I'd even go further. I'd say the spirit of man was present in every scene Adams turned his camera to, no matter what the ostensible subject was.

Adams, who looked like Walt Whitman, quoted these lines of the poet in his own writings:

"The earth never tires,/

"The earth is rude, silent, incomprehensible at first, Nature is rude and incomprehensible at first,/

"Be not discouraged, keep on, there are divine things to be envelop'd,/

"I swear to you, there are divine things more beautiful than words can tell."

Whitman said it in words. Adams said it in photographs.

EXTRADITION AND NORTHERN IRELAND

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct the attention of my colleagues to an insightful article that appeared in the August 25, 1985 Bergen Record entitled "Pact Imperils Irish Rebels in U.S." by Mark Lieberman. The article analyzes the complex issues that have been brought forth through the signing of an extradition treaty supplement between the United States and the United Kingdom. I would like to praise my colleague from New Jersey, Representative TORRICELLI, for his role in the effort to defeat this treaty and commend his actions to the attention of my colleagues.

On August 1, a hearing was held by the other body on this treaty supplement which would completely eliminate the political offense clause from our mutual extradition treaties. The primary effect of this action would be to deny political refugees from Northern Ireland the right to seek asylum and protection in the United States. The political offense clause happens to be the cornerstone of extradition treaties both in the United States and in Great Britain. It is also disturbing that our State Department intends to negotiate similar treaties with other nations as well.

Representative TORRICELLI and I both joined 53 of our colleagues in writing to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to request further hearings on this treaty. BOB's initiative in opposing the treaty is exemplary and I commend the many actions he has taken in the Congress to support an end to political repression in Northern Ireland and foster human rights and freedom in this troubled spot.

I encourage my colleagues to read the following article on the ramifications of this treaty:

PACT IMPERILS IRISH REBELS IN U.S.

(By Mark Lieberman)

Arrests without warrant, trials without jury, felony convictions based solely on the testimony of paid police informers, widespread legally sanctioned use of torture to obtain "evidence" from detainees who may be arrested on the mere suspicion of a policeman and then imprisoned for up to seven days without ever being charged with a crime, journalists subject to arrest for talking to political dissidents or filming their activities, political parties banned, strip searching of female suspects, some as young as 13 . . .

South Africa?

Guess again.

Those are some of the vicious—and well-documented—hallmarks of the legal system of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, a system that the U.S. State Department maintains is "a judicial process which provides fair treatment to defendants."

And if Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher and the bureaucrats of the Reagan administration have their way, Irish political exiles in this country will no longer be able to seek relief from extradition by claiming that their alleged crimes in the United Kingdom qualify for the "political-offense exception" clause in the current Anglo-American treaty. Instead they'll be handed over to the "tender mercies" of the British.

Nor will anyone else be able to claim protection under the political-offense clause. The proposed revision to the U.K.-U.S. extradition treaty, which was presented to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee Aug. 1, eliminates the clause altogether.

Some, but not all, of the Irish exiles have been members of the Irish Republican Army. They've persuaded American judges on numerous occasions that their alleged crimes were part of an ongoing political struggle with the British government and therefore not extraditable offenses. Since the Fenians rebelled against the crown in 1860, the United States has never extradited an Irish rebel.

Now the Reagan administration is asking the Senate to ratify a document that would eliminate the political-offense exception, a concept that has been a tenet of American jurisprudence since Secretary of State Thomas Jefferson refused to give up three French "revolutionaries" in 1791.

In the past five years alone three Irish republicans who allegedly committed crimes in the United States have succeeded in proving to American judges that their crimes were political in nature, thereby defeating British efforts to have them extradited.

In the most recent case Joseph Doherty, a former IRA member, faced a U.S. district Court judge in New York in April and won a case in which the British government tried to have him extradited and jailed in Northern Ireland for his alleged role in an attack on a member of the Special Air Services, the elite plain-clothes unit whose sole mission is to engage in armed combat with men like Joe Doherty.

"This case," said Judge John Sprizzo, "presents the political-offense exception in its most classic form."

Doherty is still imprisoned in New York's Metropolitan Corrections Center, where he has been for the past two years. The British government, having failed to have him extradited, is now seeking his deportation, according to Doherty's attorneys.

Meanwhile Jim Barr, a 28-year-old Belfast native, is imprisoned in Pennsylvania, held 14 months on a charge of illegal entry into the United States. He has stood trial twice on that charge. The first trial ended in a hung jury, the second when the government dropped the charge against him. Barr is being held on an international extradition warrant from the British government, which seeks to incarcerate him for his alleged role in a 1981 attack on a British soldier in Belfast. Barr has never been convicted of a crime in this country.

And Liam Quinn, an American citizen, is sought by the British in connection with alleged IRA bombings in the United Kingdom. Quinn has been held in a California prison more than four years, despite the fact that a judge long ago ruled that his alleged offenses were political in nature and that he should be freed.

If the proposed revision to extradition treaty is ratified, Doherty, Barr, and Quinn will almost certainly be the first to suffer the consequences, since the treaty retroactively eliminates the political-offense exception.

But Professor Charles Rice of Notre Dame Law School, an expert on extradition law, says that those men are not the only ones who should worry about the treaty being ratified.

"The treaty is an affront to the rule of law," Rice said. "It is nothing more than an attempted end-run around judicial decisions which have long recognized the political nature of the conflict in Northern Ireland. If it is ratified, every ethnic and national group ought to be concerned."

Others worry about the ramifications of this revision, known as Document 99-8. Rep. Robert Torricelli, D-N.J., one of the earliest opponents of the treaty, told me:

"The United States has always had a special role in preserving the political rights of people who have had those rights denied them in their own countries. This treaty would give the State Department vastly expanded judicial powers, powers which rightfully belong to an independent judiciary. Our national interest does not benefit by being made subservient to the interests of the British government."

Torricelli joined 54 other House members who persuaded Sen. Richard Lugar, Foreign Relations Committee chairman, to permit a fuller public hearing on the treaty. A second hearing on the measure will be scheduled when Congress reconvenes next month. Opponents of the treaty will be permitted to give their views.

In response to thousands of impassioned letters and phone calls from members of the New Jersey Region of the Irish-American Unity Conference (IAUC), the Irish-American Fenian Society, and the Ancient Order of Hibernians, other members of the state's congressional delegation have also gone on record to demand a fuller hearing. (If the treaty is approved by the Foreign Relations Committee, it must then pass in the Senate by a two-thirds' majority.)

"The provisions of the treaty jeopardize all peoples fighting tyranny worldwide," says Dr. Robert Linnon of Livingston, regional director of IAUC. "It's vitally important that before Congress reconvenes, we make the American people aware that if this treaty is ratified, no political exile will ever be safe in America."

Bergen County Freeholder Director John Curran said that he'll introduce a resolution critical of the treaty at the freeholders' next meeting.

"America must continue to be a haven for those whose politics have placed them in danger in their native countries," Curran said. "Where else but in America can such people find protection and the freedom to speak out against oppression?"

Introducing the measure at the Aug. 1 session of the Foreign Relations Committee, the state Department's legal adviser, Abraham Sofaer, warned that the measure must be ratified because of the "increasing difficulty of combating international terrorism."

Sen. Claiborne Pell, D-R.I., among others, was incensed at the blanket condemnation of Irish nationalists implicit in the use of the word terrorism.

"Don't you ever forget, Mr. Sofaer," Pell cautioned, "that one country's terrorist is another country's freedom fighter."

Sofaer attempted to calm the Senators' fears by assuring them that "this treaty is aimed at violence, not at free speech."

Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., angrily disagreed with Sofaer's contention that if the political-offense exception were eliminated, Irish political exiles would receive a fair hearing and trial in British courts.

"If we ratify this treaty," Biden said, "we will be admitting that the justice system in Northern Ireland is fair—a notion I absolutely abhor."

Sofaer responded, "We would be doing well here if we had a system of justice that worked as well as the one over there does." The words brought an audible gasp from the crowded hearing room.

Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., also disagreed violently with Sofaer. "This treaty would violate the fundamental ideals under which this country was founded," Dodd said. He then asked Sofaer if he thought it fair that Irish nationalists may be imprisoned for life after a nonjury trial and solely on the basis of evidence given by admitted police informers.

"Absolutely fair," said Sofaer, evoking another gasp from the audience.

Several senators also expressed concern over the retroactivity provision of the proposal.

"Don't you realize that under this treaty Eamon de Valera," one of the fathers of Irish nationalism, who fled to America. "would have been extradited?" asked Senator Biden.

The senator could have added that if the proposed treaty were in effect during the Revolutionary War, George Washington would also have fit neatly into the government's characterization of a terrorist and would have been liable for extradition to Great Britain.

Other civil libertarians have found other points to abhor and fear in the proposed treaty. The Rev. Sean McManus, national chairman of the Washington-based Irish National Caucus, told me after the Senate hearing that he was deeply concerned that if the treaty is ratified, extradition decisions would be taken from the hands of judges and placed in the hands of State Department bureaucrats.

"The political-crimes defense to extradition has survived for more than a century," wrote Professor Christopher Pyle of Mount Holyoke College for testimony that he'll deliver before the Foreign Relations Committee next month.

Pyle, author of "Extradition, Political Crimes, and American Law," warns, "This treaty would not enhance the extradition of true terrorists" such as airplane hijackers, "who are already extraditable under the terms of the current U.S.-U.K. treaty. . . .

"When the United States finally did join the international extradition movement in the 1850's, we did so on the express condition that political offenders need not be surrendered. To assure that they would not be, we wrote the political-crimes defense into our treaties. Now comes an administration that wants to undo all the work of Jefferson, Marshall, and Webster—that does not respect the line they drew between foreign policy and laws and that wants to surrender persons for reasons of state."

During our nation's brief lifespan French revolutionaries and Irish Fenians, Afghan rebels and Vietnamese boat people, Nationalist Chinese, white Russians, PLO and Irgun members, anti-Castro Cubans and anti-Marcos Filipinos have all benefited from the visionary craftsmanship of the great architects who build the house of safety that became America.

Throughout our history our courts have assured that there shall always be room in that house for dissenters, exiles, and political outcasts. If this proposed revision is ratified, we will have shut and bolted the golden door forever.

MYOPIC ASSESSMENT OF POVERTY

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, poverty—especially in the ways it is measured has been a major concern to me. I strongly believe that poverty should be accurately measured so that we, the public policymakers, can make accurate decisions regarding programs to assist the American poor.

Recently, the Census Bureau published the latest statistics on poverty indicating that poverty rate has significantly declined. The Reagan administration has rushed to characterize it as another triumph. I do not question the fact that the poverty rate has declined, but I do question the administration's reaction.

I submit the following essay by Michael Harrington which was published in the New York Times on September 5, 1985. I feel that Mr. Harrington has accurately surmised the administration's over-reaction to the latest picture of poverty in America.

WILLFUL SHORTSIGHTEDNESS ON POVERTY

(By Michael Harrington)

The White House euphoria over the drop in the poverty rate to 14.4 percent in 1984 is deeply disturbing. In celebrating a statistical "triumph," President Reagan and his staff have obscured a larger injustice.

Any reduction in the number of the poor is, of course, a reason to rejoice. And that is true even though the event is hardly a surprise. Every expert predicted the 1984 decline in poverty because real economic growth of almost 6 percent in that year would inevitably help some people at the bottom of the latter.

But the Administration's simplistic and ideological response to the new numbers—they prove, in Mr. Reagan's view, the superiority of free enterprise—blindly ignores the fact that the poverty rate is now higher than it has been in any year since 1965, with the exception of 1982 and 1983. A one-year improvement, from 1983 to 1984, is said to vindicate our economic policies. But there is no comment on the fact that we have "advanced" to poverty levels we reached 20 years ago.

This willful shortsightedness is not new. In recent years, shoddy interpretations of statistics have regularly provided a basis for moral indifference and political complacency.

For instance, unemployment went from a recession high of almost 11 percent in 1982 to 7.3 percent in October 1984. In the 1984 election campaign, this trend was cited as a measure of the Administration's economic success, and one was constantly reminded of the millions of jobs generated by the recovery. Few remembered that John F. Kennedy targeted a 3 percent unemployment rate, or that the Republican Party was salvaged by the electorate in the Congressional elections of 1970 because joblessness had soared to 4.8 percent.

So eight and a half million people out of work—and millions driven from the labor market who are forced to take part-time jobs—are just a fact of social life these days. The most dynamic recovery in 30 years, as the President calls it, has an employment rate which, in the antediluvian age of a decade ago, would have been associated with a deep recession.

Another example. In 1981, the Congressional Budget Office tells us, the Reagan tax cuts increased the disposable income of households with over $80,000 a year by $8,930 and decreased that of households with less than $10,000 a year by $440. That reactionary governmental redistribution of income was partly the result of deductions that discriminated in favor of the rich and against the poor.

By law, the Treasury is required to itemize those deductions in a "tax expenditure budget." How does one deal with such scandalous numbers? The Administration simply redefined tax expenditures to make them go down on paper even as they went up in real life. America was turned into a fairer society by a crafty stroke of the pen.

And now there is the jubilation that there were only 33.7 million poor people in 1984—which is higher than the number of the poor in 1964, when President Johnson declared his war on poverty.

This new callousness, however, does not simply corrupt our values. It muddies our understanding as well. There is growing evidence that economic growth in the 80's is much less effective in eliminating poverty than it was in the 60's, that the reshaping of the occupational structure, the technological revolution, and the internationalization of the economy are creating an environment in which poverty is all the more tenacious.

And that is a threat, not simply to the poor but to all of us, an important fact that the current ignorant celebration utterly obscures.

REJECTION OF FOOTWEAR INDUSTRY IMPORT RELIEF ADDS TO U.S. TRADE CRISIS AND THREATENS AMERICAN JOBS

HON. BOB EDGAR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, in a disastrous move, President Reagan last week rejected the International Trade Commission's recommendation of import relief for the domestic footwear industry. This is another in a long set of decisions and inactions that have led to further industrial decline and job losses for thousands of American men and women. Without a U.S. trade policy, for the workers of this country on Labor Day, 1985, the trade crisis looms as the No. 1 threat to American jobs and industry.

Far more is at stake with the footwear case, however, than the fate of a single industry. Frankly, it challenges the credibility our entire system of trade law. Continuing passivity in the face of unfair trade practices threatens to seriously damage the industrial base of our Nation's economy and is of special concern to those of us in older industrial States, such as Pennsylvania.

There can be no long-term prosperity and stability if our basic industries are simply allowed to decline and erode. Right before our eyes we are seeing this happen in many industries: textiles, garments, steel * * * the list goes on. Even "high-tech" industries are now being affected. Rejecting the footwear industry's case, one that is clear and pressing, sends a message of indifference about the present staggering trade imbalance and is evidence of the administration's mismanagement of American resources in international trade.

The footwear industry's plight represents a classic case for import relief, the type of case our trade laws were designed to address. Foreign imports now account for over 75 percent of the domestic market. Thousands of jobs have been lost in the process. If action is not taken, the American footwear industry could be extinct by the end of the century. Not only will this result in the loss of many more jobs, but will eliminate domestic competition, a consequence which will ultimately hurt American consumers as well.

For Pennsylvania, this case is also especially important in its own right, since over 10,000 workers in 20 counties are employed in the industry. In fact, Pennsylvania ranks as the third largest footwear manufacturing State. Footwear plants in Allentown, Wilkes-Barre, Lancaster, Hanover, Johnstown, Greencastle, Akron, Auburn, and Danver were among the 105 American footwear operations shut down in 1984.

Under the normal procedures of U.S. trade law, management and labor of the American footwear industry have joined together in seeking relief under section 201 of the Trade Act in order to provide time for the industry to become more productive and competitive. The Federal International Trade Commission [ITC], an independent and bipartisan group of trade experts, unanimously ruled that imports are damaging the domestic footwear industry. The ITC also recommended, 4–1, a 5-year global quota to provide time for modernization. The President, who must act on the recommendations, rejected them.

Taking some sort of constructive action seems in my mind to be mandated by the trade crisis our Nation faces. It is a crisis that has unemployed or underemployed millions of working Americans and thrown the agricultural sector into its sharpest nosedive since the Great Depression. Another clue that a change of course is required comes from recent history. Before the Reagan administration took office, the trade deficit was not a major problem; since then it has increased fivefold to the point that in 1985, it is predicted to exceed a record $150 billion. In fact, most of the reasons are of this administration's own making.

A major cause of high real interest rates and the overvalued dollar is the staggering budget deficits. And the underlying reason for this effect should be no mystery to the Reagan administration. The quick-fix policies it pursued in 1981 and 1982 are now coming back to haunt us. While preaching the need to save money on domestic programs, the savings were merely applied to the military budget. And on top of this, the administration initiated the largest tax cut in American history—one that primarily benefited big business and the wealthy.

The revenue lost then has never been made up, and Government borrowing continues at a shocking rate just to pay the interest on the national debt. In fact, for the first time in this century, the United States is now a debtor Nation, just like Brazil, Argentina, and Mexico. The overvalued dollar, forced up by high real interest rates caused by excessive Government borrowing, raises the price of American goods in foreign markets making them artificially less competitive. Conversely, the price of imports are unnaturally lowered here, giving foreign goods a clear advantage.

Yet the Reagan administration refuses to act even when, as with the footwear section 201 case, import injury is clear and evident. This unwillingness to exercise the powers of the Presidency to ensure free and fair trade and the strange belief that there is no middle ground between absolute free trade and absolute protectionism are also largely responsible for the trade crisis we face today. Similarly, the administration has fallen down on the job in negotiating and enforcing international trade agreements. As a result of these failures, our Nation's main export right now is American jobs.

Mr. Speaker, no one will deny that there are complex reasons for our trade problem—including the budget deficits, high real interest rates, and an overvalued dollar—but only the Reagan administration contends that the solution is inaction. By not acting in the section 201 footwear case, the Reagan administration abandons the remedies available under present trade law and sends a message to the rest of the world that the United States is unable to effectively compete in the international marketplace. It affirms what many have suspected: that the United States has no trade policy at all.

The bottom line is that this inaction is a case of trade mismanagement. I believe in managed trade—in a concerted strategy to improve competitiveness and in coordinated policies to address marketplace realities. As trade policy managers, we can promote, when possible, a fair worldwide economic system through the free market. But unlike policymakers, we must also realize that the success of such a system depends on the acceptance of free market principles by all or most of our trading partners.

So in managing trade, when unfair trade practices, subsidized industries, and the dumping of foreign products threaten American jobs and industry, we should not be afraid to protect ourselves through the limited application of carefully chosen restrictions in imports. And while managing trade sometimes involves addressing unfair trade practices in specific industries, I also support other initiatives such as:

(1) Modernizing our country's trade laws to better cope with the realities of the world marketplace;

(2) Restoring sense to Government spending policies and reducing the bloated value of the dollar abroad to make American goods more competitive;

(3) Aggressively negotiating new international agreements with other nations to include emerging services and technologies, and eliminating unfair trade barriers and practices to ensure trade that is both fair and free;

(4) Encouraging industrial modernization agreements that bring labor, management, and capital together to achieve greater productivity and competitiveness;

(5) Rebuilding our Nation's aging infrastructure—our highways, bridges, railroads, sewage systems and waterways—so we can move and produce goods more efficiently.

Following Labor Day, 1985, we must, as a Nation, realize that the trade imbalance is an issue that we can no longer ignore. Reagan's decision to reject the footwear industry import relief case is a step backward in the effort to formulate a rational trade policy. The United States has many more resources than the Reagan administration gives it credit for; we should not be afraid to use them. Mr. Speaker, Our Nation must adopt a concerted strategy of managed trade to get America moving again before industries and communities in Pennsylvania and throughout the Nation are further devastated and more jobs are lost.

A POETIC REMINDER OF AN EVENT WE DARE NOT FORGET, THE ANNIVERSARY OF THE DOWNING OF KAL 007

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, a constituent has written a moving poetic reminder of the terrible day when the Soviet Union's leaders ordered their air force to destroy a civilian airliner with 167 men, women and children, including our good colleague, Mr. Larry McDonald of Georgia. Mr. Richard E. Franklin, the writer, and I had hoped to put this in the RECORD on September 1, originally, the actual anniversary of the Massacre at Sakhalin. Our calendar did not permit, since the House was not in session until the 4th of September.

It is important to remember events such as the shooting down of KAL 007 and the murder of Maj. Arthur D. Nicholson, Jr., in East Germany. While at opposite ends of the Soviet Empire, these two events together cannot fail to remind us of the nature of the Soviet regime. We must be vigilant. With thanks to Mr. Franklin, I am pleased to submit this for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

MASSACRE AT SAKHALIN

(By Richard E. Franklin)

An SU-15 fighter plane, a Russian in control,
Was hunting down a jumbo jet, on a peaceful flight to Seoul.
The pilot had his orders from the Kremlin, and he knew
He must destroy the liner, with its passengers and crew.
What makes the Kremlin mind to fret, what causes it to kill
A peaceful group of voyagers who trespass o'er their hill?
For O the dreadful consequences of their ungodly sin,
Will forever live in infamy:
Remember Sakhalin!

The captain of the KAL, his passengers and crew,
(And some of them were children, and some were babies, too.)
Were unaware, and innocent of a misdirected course,
That would cause the Kremlin to direct
The use of deadly force.
What makes the Kremlin mind to fret, what causes it to kill
A peaceful group of voyagers who trespass o'er their hill?
For O the dreadful consequence of their ungodly sin
Will forever live in infamy
Remember Sakhalin

Down below, in the darkness, the Russian pilot flew,
Stalking the sleeping liner, awaiting his awful cue.
"Aim at the target," Moscow said, and the pilot aimed his sight,
To launch an 'Anad' missile, thundering into the night.
"Fire," came Moscow's dread command.
"Fired," came the heinous reply,
And they all died on that liner, and the free world questions, why?
For O the dreadful consequence of their ungodly sin
Will forever live in infamy:
Remember Sakhalin!

CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO THE FIREHOUSE

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to offer my sincerest congratulations to the Firehouse Restaurant in Sacramento on this elegant institution's silver anniversary.

Tradition sets the Firehouse apart and has made it one of northern California's best-known landmarks. Although parts of the building were renovated, the restaurant retains the charm and style of the late-19th century gold rush town, its horsedrawn engines protected. Many of the ornate original fixtures remain including the brass fire pole which can now be found in the main bar. The Firehouse is the perennial choice of individuals who wish to show out-of-town guests the finest that Sacramento has to offer in dining, and is often the host of national and world leaders who come to visit California's capitol.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the city of Sacramento and its citizens, I commend the proprietors, Catherine Cope MacMillan and Donna Cope, for their meticulous supervision of cuisine and service excellence. I also wish them a happy anniversary and thank them for allowing us to retain such a beautiful institution.

GIAMPAOLI FAMILY STILL PACKING AFTER 55 YEARS

HON. TONY COELHO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, recently an article was featured in the Merced Sun-Star which highlighted the achievements of some very good friends of mine, the Giampaoli family of Le Grand, CA.

In the early 1930's, Marino Giampaoli and Carlo Giampaoli came to the United States from Italy. With the help of the Marchini family, they soon founded Live Oak Farms and began to specialize in growing tomatoes. Since that time the farm has grown to the large family operation that is so well known in the area today, packing over 12 million pounds of tomatoes a year, and farming more than 2,000 acres of tomatoes, almonds, wheat, bell peppers, cotton, and corn.

The story of the Giampaoli family is significant because it represents the realization of the American dream—an immigrant family coming to this country and building a successful farming operation from the ground up with much hard work. I would like to extend my congratulations to Ray and Maria Giampaoli, and all the rest of the Giampaoli family, for their success with Live Oak Farms. In recognition of their hard work, I am reprinting the article on their achievements from the Merced Sun-Star below:

GIAMPAOLI FAMILY STILL PACKING AFTER 55 YEARS

(By Dan Campbell)

LE GRAND.—Enter the doors of Live Oak Farms tomato packing shed, and you won't walk far before you meet a Giampaoli.

Three generations of Giampaolis work in the packing house and on the 2,000 acres of diversified crops the family farms around Le Grand, keeping alive a family tradition that dates back to the early 1930s.

The Giampaoli family name has been synonymous with fresh market tomatoes in Merced County for more than 55 years, when four Italian immigrants with small amounts of tomato acreage joined forces to start Live Oak Farms—so named because of a prominant old oak tree that stood in the midst of one of their tomato fields outside Le Grand.

The company was started by Marino Giampaoli, his uncle, Carlo Giampaoli, and Decimo and Florindo Marchini.

At that time tomato farming in the Merced area was done on a small scale, the average farmer working only five or six acres of tomatoes grown up verticle poles—a technique that produced high yields but was much more expensive and labor intensive.

When the Giampalois and Marchinis united, they created one of the first farms in the county with extensive acres of fresh tomatoes.

In the 1940s the labor requirements of pole-grown tomatoes prompted Live Oak to switch to tomatoes planted in rows on the ground.

Fresh tomato planting increased, and packing sheds proliferated around Merced as the industry expanded into the 1950s and 1960s.

As recently as 10 years ago, Live Oak Farms was in competition with seven other packers in eastern Merced County.

Today, there are only two others: Bianchi and Sons Packing Co., the biggest packer in the county with a modern facility on West Olive Avenue, and Central California Tomato Growers on West 15th Street, which is a growers' cooperative.

"We pack as many tomatoes as ever in Merced County—the remaining sheds just pack more," said Ray Giampaoli, one of Marino's sons, who today runs the packing shed.

Part of the reason for the demise of some of the packing sheds around Merced was lack of interest in farming among the younger generation.

That's what happened to the Merced Tomato Growers Cooperative, according to Steve Carignani, who was the sales manager of the cooperative for 29 years before it closed its doors.

At one time the cooperative had 25 grower members and more than 2,000 acres of fresh tomatoes.

"But the growers got old and the sons didn't want to keep farming," Carignani recalled.

That doesn't appear to be a danger at Live Oak Farms.

Not only are the three sons of Marinio Giampaoli still running the operation, there are also eight of his grandchildren, nephews and nieces working on the farm and in the shed this summer.

Marino's three sons—Raymond, Elmo and Dario—bought out the Marchini's share of Live Oak Farms in 1981, although the Marchinis remain a prominent Le Grand farm family with almonds, tomatoes and other crops.

In addition to the packing shed, the three Giampaoli brothers and their uncle—Aldo Giampaoli—farm 2,000 acres of almonds, wheat, canning tomatoes, bell peppers cotton, corn and 350 acres of fresh tomatoes.

Like the other tomato packers, Live Oak Farms picks and packs "green mature tomatoes," meaning fully grown but not yet ripened tomatoes. After packing, the tomatoes are "degreened" in special chambers so they are at just the right stage of ripeness when they reach market all across North America. Live Oak tomatoes are also shipped across the Pacific Ocean as far away as Hong Kong.

While Ray runs the packing shed, Dario oversees crop production, Elmo takes care of the almond orchards and office, and Aldo is in charge of irrigation.

Ray and Maria Giampaoli's son, Bob—a recent graduate of Fresno State University—is field foreman of the farming operation, daugther Donna is office assistant and a student at Fresno State. Another daughter, Sandra, is a tally girl in the packing shed and attends Merced College.

Dario and Josephine Giampaoli's daughter Debbie is a tally girl and attends Merced College, while daughter Kathy, a Le Grand High School student, is working on the assembly line as a tomato sorter. Son Gary is driving a tractor and is a Le Grand Junior High School student.

Aldo and Gilda Giampaoli's son Richard does farm equipment service and operation, and his daughter, Julie, is a tomato weigher and attends Fresno State.

Naturally, not all the children have yet decided on careers, but Ray said it appears there is enough interest among them in farming to ensure there will be a Giampaoli at the helm of Live Oak Farms well into the future.

With all those family members working for the company, do the parents tend to cut the children a little extra slack when it comes to getting a job done? Not at all Raymond said. "I think we tend to expect even more from family members."

All of the children have had to work their way up through the ranks to get the positions they hold now.

None of the wives work in the farming or packing operation any more, but they still keep active. Maria, for instance, is active in the California Women for Agriculture.

The fresh tomato market has been glutted this summer, and will prompt the shed to shut down a few weeks earlier than usual, Ray said.

The market is down for the simple reason that "there are too many tomatoes being grown for the demand," Ray said.

But cutting down planted acres won't necessarily solve the problem, according to Ted Batkin, manager of the Fresh Market Tomato Advisory Board—on which Ray has held a seat for the least 10 years.

When prices are high in the United States—around $6 to $7 a box—Mexican farmers in Baja California "open up the flood valve" and begin pouring tomatoes across the border until the price drops again, Batkin said. Then they go back to shipping their fruit to Mexico City.

With prices closer to $4 to $5 a box this year, there has been much import competition from Mexico.

A WORKABLE PLAN TO SAVE MONEY IN VETERANS' HEALTH CARE

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, it was with great interest that I read the following letter in the Washington Post last week. The distinguished chairman of the House Veterans' Affairs Committee, Hon. G.V. "SONNY" MONTGOMERY, has outlined a fair and workable proposal to counter the proposed "means test" for veterans' health care.

Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, I am very interested in assuring quality health care for the 28 million veterans of this Nation. To arbitrarily impose a "means test," as a method of determining who is eligible for medical care and who is not, is unfair, unworkable and possibly, in the long run, too expensive. I think that Chairman MONTGOMERY's idea is a fair and efficient response to the need to cut costs and remain faithful to those who have sacrificed so much for their Nation. It is my hope that my colleagues on the Veterans' Affairs Committee will support this plan when the chairman unveils it formally. I think that it is a significant improvement over the other health care proposals we have heard and I strongly support it. I urge my colleagues to do likewise.

The letter follows:

"A MEANS TEST FOR VETERANS"

(By G.V. (Sonny) Montgomery)

I read with great interest The Post's concise and factual editorial of Aug. 22 entitled "A Means Test for Veterans," and am in general agreement. However, its conclusion that "there is no reason to maintain a separtate and costly health service" for veterans with nonservice-connected disabilities or "who are not poor" is, in my opinion, incorrect.

Costly? Quite the contrary, there is evidence that Veterans Administration health care is less expensive than that provided by the private sector.

Many veterans would be left out in the cold if we were to implement a broad eligibility restriction excluding all who are not poor from receiving VA health care. Too often, we overlook the middle-income or just-over-the-poverty-level individual.

Take, for example, the veteran of World War II who served in theater for four years and earned four battle stars (and there are many); he might have later served in Korea. During this time, he incurred no service-related disabilities. He is now 60 years old, he needs medical attention, he might have never before requested VA health care, he is just above the poverty level, he cannot afford private health insurance and is unable to defray medical expenses. I believe the federal government owes this veteran health-care assistance. He earned it. The VA must never be required to turn away any veteran who cannot afford needed care.

We have a mandate—a fair mandate, we believe—to come up with VA health care cost savings of $1.2 billion in the next three years. Given the options of cutting present programs or employing alternative methods to raise revenue, the answer is obvious.

First, instead of a base income level of $15,000, as contained in the administration's proposed means test for health care eligibility, it should be raised to $25,000 and automatically adjusted to the consumer price index. No veteran up to this level of income would be required to show his inability to pay for health care.

Under my proposal, any veteran who is above the income level could, on a space-available basis, be admitted to the hospital provided the veteran agreed to make a medical copayment similar to that required by Medicare (estimated to be about $476 in FY '86). Unlike the administration proposal, which only shifts costs to other programs, no veteran would be locked out of the system.

Revenue would be generated by requiring insurance companies that collect premiums from thousands of insured veterans who use VA facilities to pay for their care in those facilities. Insurance company contracts now contain clauses that prohibit such payments.

I believe this plan is fair, would be easy to administer, and would not jerk the rug out from under a veteran who desperately needs health care. While achieving the savings required by the budget, we can actually enhance the veterans' health care program.

LOWENSTEIN CONTRIBUTIONS NOT REFLECTED IN RECENT BOOK

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, one of the most creative and able people ever to serve in this body was the late Al Lowenstein. I have the honor today of serving as president of Americans for Democratic Action, a position he once held, and we in ADA are very proud to be able to talk about Al Lowenstein as one of ADA's leaders.

Earlier this year a preposterous book was written impuning Al Lowenstein's memory in an extraordinary inept and unsubstantiated fashion. A current member of ADA, Denis Wadley of Minnesota, reviewed this nasty diatribe in a article published in the Minneapolis Tribune on July 21. Mr. Wadley does a superb job in his review of rebutting the book's unfair accusations and also in describing the extremely creative role that Al Lowenstein played as a liberal in the United States.

The review follows:

AUTHOR LACKS EVIDENCE THAT LOWENSTEIN WAS CIA AGENT

(Reviewed by Denis Wadley)

Coming from the right, critics of liberals love to portray them as wimpy, gullible idealists with too much faith in platitudes. Coming from the left, critics will carp at liberals' alleged collaboration with the wicked establishment that is the cause of the problems liberals say they want to solve.

Conservative criticisms are easy to deflect, and indeed most people familiar with politics can recite the arguments on both sides. The judgments of the further left require distinctions that liberals themselves have been often reluctant to provide: Where does liberalism end and some hard-left ideology begin? When are liberals being helpful and when are they just shooting the wounded?

The ideological left will usually have little patience with good liberals because good liberals are meliorists: They usually succeed in pushing reform just far enough to take the edge off radical pleadings that the system is too corrupt to improve, and so should be junked—often for some amorphous egalitarianism that will take repression to impose.

For this the left will not forgive liberals, because liberals, only they seem to know, are the far left's worst enemies.

This seems to be why Richard Cummings doesn't seem to like Allard Lowenstein.

Cummings, published here by Grove Press, which often publishes radical books, alleges that Lowenstein, whose wide range of political involvements led him through Southern Africa, the civil rights crusades, and the Vietnam antiwar movement, each with some distinction, was all this time secretly an agent of the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA).

That's right. I spoof you not.

The problem is, Cummings offers not a shred of proof anywhere in the book. Nothing. Zero. But he asserts his charge at least 200 times, each time in varyingly vague circumstantial connections which, he avers, form a clear pattern.

It is the standard attitude of one convinced before he sifts the evidence: even the lack of evidence becomes proof for him. After all, Lowenstein, being a secret agent, wouldn't go around telling everyone, would he? Of course he will deny it; isn't that to be expected?

Lowenstein irritated the hell out of many who couldn't understand his peculiar attraction for young, idealistic people able and willing to devote time and effort to making society better. He could catch people at their selfless best, weld them together in dynamic groups at the cutting edge of reform, and—the one unforgiveable thing for the hard left—actually accomplish something.

Lowenstein headed the "Dump Johnson" movement, which managed to dislodge Lyndon Johnson from the presidency in 1968 by sponsoring the campaign of Eugene McCathy; he spearheaded the liberal alternative to the extremist element in the civil rights movement in the South during the early 1960s; he served three productive terms as national president of Americans for Democratic Action (ADA) (which, though frequently mentioned in Cummings' book, nowhere appears in his rather spotty index); and he produced a remarkably well-written book on racism in South West Africa (now Namibia), called "Brutal Mandate" (1959)—still a fine, relevant treatise.

Had he passed his days giving fine speeches and getting groups to adopt manifestos, he would have been smiled at and forgotten by history, and the hard left would have no reason to complain. Lowenstein actually registered black voters—many of them, and well before the 1965 voting rights law provided federal support. He actually led demonstrations and kept them non-violent, so their credibility wasn't impaired. (Who would ever think the American people would take seriously an antiwar rally—a rally against violence—which degenerated into stonethrowing and fights? Much of what little brutally there was in these marches and demonstrations came from overzealous policemen, not participants. Non-violence showed that the system could solve a problem; violence only fed the radical notion that the system was rotten beyond recall.)

Cummings is in many ways sympathetic to his subject, relating honestly and with great thoroughness Lowenstein's frequent races for Congress (only one successful), his remarkable oratorical skills and the influence of his find book. But a much better and fairer overview of the period and its people would be Allen J. Matusov's "The Unraveling of America: A History of Liberalism in the 1960s" (Harper & Row, $22.95).

In his search for a rationale, Cummings goes for the "good wing" theory—the idea that the CIA has an element that believes in combatting Communism, both in domestic movements and in other nations, not by siding with the military fascist, but with the democratic left. He cities no evidence that such a "wing" was ever influential; and each and every person Cummings connects with Lowenstein's alleged CIA affiliation has denied under oath that any such thing whatever existed.

Not that such arrangements haven't happened. Lowenstein was in the early 1950s president of the National Student Association (NSA), which was exposed in 1967 as having had quite intimate CIA "good wing" ties; but even Cummings acknowledges that this connection began well after Lowenstein's time. Still, the author touches sensitive nerves: Those of us who attended NSA congresses in the 1960s (I went to five) recall the disillusionment of discovering how some idealistic "liberals" we had all looked up to were "initiated" into CIA programs, and this Cummings covers in full and accurate detail.

But assertions about Lowenstein are not proof, however clever an "angle" they give Cummings and Grove Press for this book. Colleagues and friends of Lowenstein ranging in politics from William Sloane Coffin and Joseph Rauh rightward to William F. Buckley Jr.—plus congressional and FBI documents obtained under the Freedom of Information Act—brush off the whole thing as nonsense.

This is not the only book that has recently come to a reviewer accompanied by a multi-sectioned legal brief refuting specifics in a biography; nor, with the more and more relaxed libel and slander standards, especially for the dead, is it likely to be the last.

Much is valuable in this book, and for those who knew or admired Lowenstein, new and interesting information is provided; however, in view of the irresponsibility of the author about his CIA theses, one wonders how speculative some of the rest of the book may be. To some extent, one can judge by the internal documentation; indeed, it is the stark contrast between Cummings' solid research in just about every other area and the complete vagueness and insubstantiality of his CIA allegations that further condemns this jag of his.

Those of us who worked with Lowenstein in these cases—and I admit a bias here—will say, along with Buckley and others, that CIA machinations were utterly out of character for him. It would amount to total hypocrisy for him to spend a 20-year public life defending openness in government and, indeed, opening up much of government previously closed, and then be a secret agent. But some of us have been disillusioned before.

The difference here is proof. In previous cases where such connections have been exposed, the proof has been clear, and the participants have even admitted it. There is no proof with Lowenstein, and that means that any sense of fairness at all will dismiss the charge out of hand. Those who are so cynical that they believe no one is pure—like Cummings, it seems—are free to fantasize; we have a free press. But please permit the rest of us to be willing to believe that on some occasions, such as this one, an honest-to-God idealist manages to preserve his integrity, and be even in death an inspiration to a much more demanding generation growing up now.

ADMINISTRATION'S CHEMICAL WEAPONS POLICY

HON. BOB EDGAR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, Sunday's New York Times included a strong denunciation of the administration's chemical weapons policy from the former head of the Army's chemical warfare activities. Saul Hormats, writing in a letter to the editor, argued that "the real casualties in a poison-gas war are defenseless civilians." He states that:

There are good medical reasons for believing that nerve gas sufficient to kill a small percentage of adults would kill a large percentage of children and a very much larger percentage of infants. We run the risk by promoting the use of such weapons of killing an entire generation of Europe.

This parallels an argument I made during the House debate on chemical weapons on June 19, when I said:

In the commonly described scenario of chemical war in Europe, densely populated civilian areas downwind from the chemical attack would be devastated by airborne chemical agents . . . Navy officials admitted that up to 12 million civilians would be killed in only 24 hours of a chemical war. Military casualties would be negligible in comparison.

Mr. Speaker, later this month the House is expected to vote on the conference report on the defense bill, including a separate vote on chemical weapons. I wish to bring my colleagues' attention to the fact that when the House first considered the defense authorization, it authorized nerve gas production with two significant conditions: First, no production of nerve gas for 2 years to allow an opportunity for chemical weapons limitation negotiations to succeed; and second, even after 2 years, no production of nerve gas without formal approval from NATO.

The conferees gutted even these limited protections by changing the 2-year delay to a bar only on final assembly of chemical weapons, which has been described by "a restriction that really does not restrict." The conferees also watered down the requirement for formal NATO approval to mere consultations with NATO members.

The conferees have ignored the will of the House in dropping the strict conditions on the resumed production of nerve gas. Moreover, they have ignored the clear concern of our allies, the Europeans, about civilian casualties.

I urge my colleagues to oppose the weakened chemical weapons provisions and commend to their attention the Hormats letter, which follows:

WE RISK KILLING AN ENTIRE GENERATION OF EUROPE

To the Editor: Kenneth L. Adelman, director of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, provides a vivid description of the horrors of poison gas during World War I (Op-Ed, Aug. 19), but he fails to say that the attack he describes very likely occurred early on when neither side was experienced in this new kind of war or had adequate gas masks. As chemical warfare continued, as adequate masks became available and as troops became accustomed to this new weapon, gas casualties decreased markedly. Later in the war, from 20 percent to 50 percent of all shells and bombs were gas, yet of the 26.5 million total only 1.25 million were gas casualties.

The vast stores of chemical munitions we and the British had during World War II were unused, not for humanitarian reasons, but because they would not have helped win the war. It was the finding of a group of experts, civilian and military, from Britain, Canada and the United States, assembled at the request of President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill, that introducing chemical warfare would not change the outcome of battle but only prolong it, increasing casualties to no military purpose. From discussions shortly after Berlin fell, with such of my opposite numbers as had not yet gone into hiding, I learned Germany's reason for restraint was the same.

Since World War II, there has been a five- to tenfold increase in U.S. and Soviet antipersonnel weaponry effectiveness as compared with a very modest increase, if any, in chemical warfare. One side's dilution of its air and artillery capability by substituting chemical weapons for, say, 10 percent of its conventional munitions would give the other side a very substantial advantage indeed.

When President Nixon stopped U.S. production of chemical munitions in 1969 he sent a clear signal to the Russians that were they to initiate chemical warfare, our response would not be in kind but would be an effective one. He had no need to spell this out. I'm sure the Russians have done the same arithmetic and reached the same conclusions. Despite Mr. Adelman's protestations, we have absolutely no basis for believing Moscow has taken advantage of our current posture and continued production of chemical munitions. This is to my own past knowledge, supported by more recent General Accounting Office findings.

The real casualties in a poison-gas war are defenseless civilians. We have not good World War I civilian-casualty statistics, but the number of poison-gas deaths must have been high. Recent calculations show that a chemical war in Europe today would likely result in the killing of millions of civilians friendly to the U.S.

There are good medical reasons for believing that nerve gas sufficient to kill a small percentage of adults would kill a large percentage of children and a very much larger percentage of infants. We run the risk by promoting the use of such weapons of killing an entire generation of Europe. Neither Mr. Adelman nor anyone else in the Administration has ever denied or rebutted this.

This concern was discussed in a Senate hearing on May 5, 1982, and was the basis for extended House debate and the overwhelming defeat of President Reagan's request for binary production funds on July 22, 1982.

From my discussions with European journalists and concerned citizens, the peoples of Europe are very much aware of the significance of what the Administration is proposing. For reasons we seem not to appreciate, Europeans are more concerned with preserving the lives of their children, their babies, than supporting a U.S. anti-Soviet ideology.

"We are planning," Representative Millicent H. Fenwick said during the House debate, "for something disgusting, something beneath the dignity of this nation, chemical weapons. We know that they may be put into the air, we may be able to protect our soldiers with their wonderful equipment, but how do we protect the poor innocent civilians miles away when the gas is carried on the wind? There is no way of stopping it.

"You cannot say you are using a legitimate weapon against other soldiers. You are not. You are using something against the public, the children in schools, people in hospitals, people walking the streets. These are the people who are going to suffer from these weapons."

SAUL HORMATS.

JIM FRELK ON CUTTING DEFENSE WASTE

HON. JIM COURTER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, I want to bring to my colleagues' attention an excellent article by Jim Frelk, a defense analyst with the Republican Study Committee. He focuses on the "three culprits" of defense waste: Mismanagement by Congress due to political motivations, a lack of incentives within the Department of Defense, and corruption at the DOD and in defense industry. I commend it to all my colleagues who are interested in slashing waste at the Pentagon. Below is the full article:

[From the Washington Times, Sept. 4, 1985]

CURING DEFENSE WASTE WOES

(By James Frelk)

There is waste in the Department of Defense—lots of it. There are also constructive ways of eliminating it without jeopardizing national security.

Three culprits are responsible for most of the waste in defense:

1. Politically motivated mismanagement by Congress.

2. Lack of incentives within the DOD to reduce waste.

3. Corruption within the DOD and among defense contractors.

While contractor corruption has received the lion's share of media attention, it is, in fact, only a small part of overall defense waste.

Procurement reforms that help the DOD fulfill our national security goals with efficiency are the best avenue for real savings.

Some of the needed reforms would require that Congress first make some changes in its operation. Because of the politically motivated way its legislative system is structured, Congress is responsible for a great deal of defense waste.

If a DOD test fails after Congress has appropriated the money, the program manager's choices are either to waste the money or to ask Congress to reprogram it for an area needing more funds. The latter is obviously the best choice. But to reprogram the money, consent of both the authorization and appropriations committees of both House and Senate is required, and these committees discourage large dollar reprogramming requests.

Streamlining the process so that only approval by the appropriations committees would be needed to approve reprogramming, and allowing larger reprogramming requests, might provide the necessary incentives to eliminate waste caused by program failures.

Congress' annual defense budget also wastes money by limiting the Defense Department's ability to take advantage of the "most economical buy" principle in purchasing its equipment. Inability to buy the right amount at the right time (taking advantage of economies of scale) causes higher per-weapon costs. When Congress can't discipline itself to stick to multiyear acquisition plans, money is wasted. Virtually no well-run private corporation ignores economy of scale in its purchasing practices.

Congress, therefore, should move toward a two-year budget cycle for defense, creating greater savings through a more rational, more efficient, and better planned system of purchasing.

Defense contractors long have been protected from financial losses from cost overruns or other production problems. They have negotiated contracts that forced Defense to pay up to 80 percent of cost overruns while absorbing only 20 percent themselves. Those ratios have changed somewhat, but a 2 percent profit has always been guaranteed, leaving contractors with little incentive to reduce cost overruns. Congress should support all new efforts to stop this gravy train by forcing contractors to assume a greater share of the risks.

None of this is meant to suggest that the DOD is without blame. The Defense Department bureaucracy produces its own disincentives to procurement efficiency:

"Goldplating" is a slang term that describes the manufacture of unnecessarily elaborate weapons or equipment. Defense Department coffee pots, for instance, have been designed to survive airplane crashes that would destroy the aircraft they were in. But most of the waste in goldplating doesn't occur in a weapon's initial design and production. It occurs when mistakes aren't corrected as the weapon moves into increased production.

What's needed are incentives for field commanders to suggest changes that improve the equipment their troops are using. Suggestions that save money or improve equipment could be recorded on a commander's performance report, influencing future promotion decisions.

The military has a dearth of qualified acquisition officers. That's because, under the current system, it's almost impossible for an experienced acquisition officer to be promoted to flag rank. Making such promotions available would be one step in the right direction.

Similarly, largely due to low pay, 75 percent of Defense Contract Audit Agency auditors aren't certified public accountants. (In California alone, 50 percent of DCAA's auditors will have to be replaced this year.) Most good auditors are quickly hired away by auditing firms.

DCAA could improve its auditing force by increasing entry-level pay and developing other incentive programs. It should go after quality, not quantity, in hiring and retaining experienced procurement "police officers."

The fact is that President Reagan has done more than his predecessors to improve defense procurement. Most of the horror stories about the $600 toilet seat or the $300 hammer were uncovered through the Reagan administration's efforts. Instead of using procurement reform as a political football—and as justification for gutting the defense budget—Congress should work with the president and the DOD to create incentives to strike at the heart of waste.

AMTRAK FUNDING

HON. BILL RICHARDSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, during the authorization and appropriation bill dealing with Amtrak, I will be offering the following two amendments which would put the Amtrak funding levels in line with the budget conference agreement adopted prior to the August adjournment.

I am a strong supporter of Amtrak, but we must be fiscally responsible. These reductions will not affect Amtrak's operations nor any existing routes.

AMENDMENT TO H.R. 2266, AS REPORTED OFFERED BY MR. RICHARDSON OF NEW MEXICO

Page 2, line 10, strike out "$616,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$581,400,000".

AMENDMENT TO H.R. 3244, AS REPORTED OFFERED BY MR. RICHARDSON OF NEW MEXICO

Page 24, line 11, strike out "$616,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$581,400,000".

THE FIRST SOVIET ACTIVE MEASURE IS IN USE OF LANGUAGE

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, many of us in the Congress have known Dr. Charles T. Baroch for many years now. He has written and commented on Soviet affairs for decades, and has been a victim of the cold war and a student of it. Almost 10 years ago Dr. Baroch wrote in the Strategic Review, analyzing the report by then General Secretary of the CPSU, Leonid Brezhnev to the 25th Congress of the Soviet Communist Party. He makes the point that the Soviets very carefully appropriate the language of freedom and give it quite a different meaning. Those who measure Soviet words against Soviet deeds quite logically recognize contradictions. How the Western observer attempts to resolve those contradictions is a serious issue. This short analysis by Dr. Baroch may help readers to sort out some of these questions. It should also remind the reader that we are not talking about a "state like any other," to use Dr. Baroch's words in another context, thus not a mirror image of this country.

I am pleased to call this brief article to the attention of my colleagues:

THE BREZHNEV REPORT: THE MEANING OF WORDS

IN BRIEF

In reporting to the 25th CPSU Congress, Brezhnev states that detente does not abolish the laws of the class struggle. He sees detente as a way to create the more favorable conditions for communism. Only after society's revolutionary transformation into communism can man's goals of freedom, progress and peace be achieved.

There is no doubt that the speech of CPSU Secretary General Brezhnev at the recent Party Congress is a very important document. Carefully prepared by the best speechwriters of the Party apparatus and checked for Marxist-Leninist orthodoxy by the top Party ideologues, it is not only a review of Soviet performance of the past five years but a prognosis of things to come in the foreseeable future.

The noncommunist world, obviously more interested in the speech's foreign policy section, will produce innumerable analyses in an effort to detect the hidden meaning of some important passages. Is the relaxation of international tensions a transient phenomenon or is it to become a more durable aspect of international relations? As usual in such reports, Brezhnev supports both interpretations. Contradictions are predictable in Marxist-Leninist documents for two reasons: they are meant to convey a message to those in tune with dialectical terminology—the Communists—and to "disinform" those outside this exclusive club—something they do with considerable success, judging from past performances.

In its editorial of February 26 the New York Times took rather a dim view of Brezhnev's sonorous declarations in favor of detente, disarmament, increased Soviet-American cooperation and trade, etc. The Times sees a contradiction, and rightly so, between those declarations and Brezhnev's statement that "detente" does not in the slightest abolish the laws of class struggle." [1] From this the editorial concludes: "Inevitably, therefore, many Americans will see detente as merely a convenient setting for the Soviet Union and its allies to apply 'salami tactics' to destroy the noncommunist world, nation by nation." [2]

By contrast, one of the paper's leading columnists took a much more optimistic view of the Brezhnev report. Commenting on criticism made by certain presidential candidates of "Washington," i.e., U.S. foreign policy, he claims that on the whole the executive and legislative branches of government are pursuing a bipartisan foreign policy which is "on a steady course," maintaining in support of this argument that:

[1] Quoted in "The Brezhnev Report," New York Times, February 26, 1976, but omitted in excerpts prepared by TASS for the foreign press.

[2] Ibid.

"If Leonid Brezhnev, presiding over the 25th Congress of the Soviet Communist Party in Moscow, really thought the United States was as divided and its Administration as weak and misguided as Messrs. Reagan, Wallace and Carter suggest, presumably he would be taking a very hard cold-war line against the United States, but instead he defended the policy of coexistence." [3]

To prove his point, he quotes Brezhnev as saying: "We make no secret of the fact that we see detente as the way to create more favorable conditions for peaceful socialist and Communist construction." [4]

The question naturally arises as to what has led to so diametrically opposed an evaluation of the Brezhnev address in the same newspaper and, especially, what prompted the columnist to reach so optimistic an interpretation of it.

First, the address, which was carried live on Moscow's TV network, should be placed in proper perspective. In theory its purpose was to inform the CPSU Congress about Party achievements in foreign and domestic policy. The foreign policy review, in fact, contains material repeated over and over for years by top Party officials and represents obligatory reading for all Party members. It was prepared by the Central Committee International Affairs Department with the goal of influencing foreign audiences, chiefly to create the impression outside the USSR of the Soviet constant preoccupation with and concern for international peace, social progress, and individual freedom all over the world. This is its keynote, the message when the Communists expect noncommunist communications media to spread everywhere—sweet-sounding words, which mankind, tired of threatening wars, atomic holocaust, worldwide famine, etc., will avidly absorb.

As for a certain discrepancy between Soviet words and deeds, the New York Times columnist admits its exists, most recently in Angola. Like many others, however, he does not make an effort to locate the roots of this discrepancy, and thus he misreads Brezhnev's speech.

It is always advisable to look for the specific meaning which the Soviet leaders attach to conventional terminology. We tend to accept their vocabulary at its face value and disregard the semantic mutation brought to it by the Marxist-Leninist world view, often to the detriment of our interest.

A successful grasp of Soviet terminology must go behind, so to speak, external forms to search out each term's inner meaning. To do this we must turn, invariably, for the most reliable guidance to top-level Marxist-Leninist ideologists, whose definitions are found in Soviet glossaries and encyclopedias as well as university textbooks.

"Social progress," for example, often mentioned in Brezhnev's report has a dual meaning, as the following brief excerpts from the Philosophical Encyclopedia indicate:

"Ascending, gradual development of human society from lower to higher levels and forms. . . . In the contemporary epoch the general trend of social progress is transition to socialism on a worldwide scale. . . . Communist progress differs qualitatively from the progress of an antagonistic society. . . . The progressive nature of socialism and communism in history can be proven not only theoretically but also from practical results of the successful development of the world socialist system and of the transition of new countries and peoples to the socialist path.[5]

Another favorite which Brezhnev exploits in his address is the theme of freedom. It is also extensively treated in a Philosophical Encyclopedia entry, the main thrust of which is clear from the following excerpts:

"Freedom is necessity perceived by man and his actions corresponding to his perception, possibility and ability to select his actions. . . . Freedom in its dialectical-materialist understanding plays a great role in the progressive development of society. . . . Objective conditions of genuine freedom are realized as a result of the elimination of antagonistic relations between persons caused by private ownership. . . . The socialist revolution initiates the process of liberation of people in all spheres of social life. . . . The road to freedom leads through the dictatorship of the proletariat. Communism is identical with the arrival of genuine freedom.[6]

Of the three concepts in the report, the most frequently dangled is peace. In its entry "peace," the Philosophical Encyclopedia begins familiarly enough: "International relations between peoples and states, excluding use of violent means in implementing policy; absence of war between peoples and states."

It continues with numerous qualifications, however: "Communists, in contrast to bourgeois pacifists, consider the problem of peace within a concrete-historical framework, in connection with given political conditions and the basic interests of the working class and popular masses. They show how to consolidate peace in given conditions, how to struggle against a specific war threat and for a just, democratic and durable peace. . . . During the epoch of imperialism's unlimited sway the democratic peace could not be realized without revolutionary struggle of the masses and the overthrow of imperialist governments. . . . The victory of the October Revolution brought about a turn in world politics from the imperialist peace and wars generated by it to a solid democratic peace which lays the foundation for war's complete elimination. . . . With the victory of socialism in all countries the social and national causes of war will be eliminated once and for all." [7]

Thus, freedom, progress and peace—ideals cherished by men since antiquity—are intrinsically alien to bourgeois-capitalist society and can be achieved only after that society's revolutionary transformation into a socialist and ultimately communist society under scientific management by the Marxist-Leninist parties. This is the message to the world from the 25th CPSU Congress.

VETERAN RECEIVES POETRY AWARDS

HON. DON YOUNG

OF ALASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues, two poems that tell the story of a war troubled mind. These two poems were written by Mr. W.T. Reeves who is a Korean war veteran who resides in Fairbanks, AK. A very high priority of mine is veterans affairs and I think you will agree that the awards that Mr. Reeves has won for his poetry are well deserved.

EXCAVATION

(By W.T. Reeves, Nov. 7, 1983)

Today they started digging, in a sacred ground.
They're looking for the pieces, that others never found.
No Green Peace or Sierra Club anywhere to be found.
No environmentalists to watch the dig,
or enforce the reclaiming of the ground.
I wonder what will be the damage, to dreams of long ago.
And if they'll handle gently,
the ones that I love so.
Or will they come wildly crashing, and throwing things around,
and damage fragile pieces,
in this sacred ground.
It can be quite upsetting,
and puts me in a bind.
For the sacred place they dig,
is in the shadows of my mind.

WHY DO I CRY?

(By W.T. Reeves, Nov. 13, 1983)

The digging has stopped and the crew has gone.
There is a death-like silence that chills to the bone.
A chill of fear for what they never found.
It still lays hidden in the sacred ground.
It moves among the shadows of a troubled mind,
And makes itself known with a salty brine.
It screams in silence from the sacred ground,
Begging the crew to come on down.
The crew gives another pill to calm the mind,
But they can't bury the salty brine.
For twenty-five years the salty sea,
Has made the tears that torture me.
For I believe that men don't cry,
And I don't have an answer when they ask why.
I fear the ward called seven-west,
Where men get battles off their chest.
They fight the wars of days gone by,
Remembering buddies and how they died.
They put their bodies on the line,
And now they pay with troubled minds.
They fought the battle that brought "D" day,
Now they fight a battle called V.A.
For this type of battle we were never trained,
And with our troubled minds we fight the sane.
Why do they fight us for what we have earned,
With our blown off legs and mangled arms?
With troubled minds that can't let go,
Of pain we suffered long ago.

Now they hide us on the seventh floor,
With bars on our windows and solid doors.
Are they really protecting me,
Or don't they want the world to see,
What price we paid for victory?
So to you young students who practice on me,
I don't think a pill will set me free.
I'm not asking for money for days gone by,
I just need an answer, "Why do I cry?".

CONGRATULATIONS TO KCRA-TV

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, this month KCRA-TV in Sacramento celebrates its 30th anniversary in television and 40th anniversary in broadcasting. On September 2, 1955, television history was made when KCRA-TV was born and became the first transmitter in the United States to be fully equipped for color. Since that date, KCRA has become one of the finest and best known broadcasters of local news in the country.

KCRA has attempted over the years to bring world affairs into focus for Sacramento. Since November 1981, KCRA has aired 17 international reports, including documentaries on Cambodia, Yugoslavia, and the Peace Corps. In addition, KCRA pioneered the live local magazine format with "Weeknight" and their consumer-oriented show, "Call 3 for Action," has had resounding success in the betterment of our community.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the community of Sacramento and its citizens, I extend my personal thanks and congratulations on a job well done and my best wishes for many more years of successful and high-quality programming.

NUCLEAR EDUCATION FOR ADULTS

HON. TONY COELHO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, recently, the national convention of the Parent-Teacher Association meeting here in Washington passed a very important resolution written by the Kratt Elementary School PTA of Fresno, CA. The resolution brings attention to one of the most critical problems facing children and adults alike in our world today—learning to cope with the unique pressures of living in the nuclear age.

The resolution, entitled "Nuclear Education for Adults," was the idea of Ms. Mary Lou Diddy, a past president of Kratt PTA, and other concerned members of the chapter. The grassroots movement behind the resolution is aimed at placing a greater emphasis in our Nation's educational system on understanding the realities and dangers of nuclear war, and understanding the long-term effect the threat of nuclear war has on our society.

I would like to commend Ms. Mary Lou Diddy and the membership of the Kratt Elementary School PTA for their tireless efforts to bring these important issues to the attention of our Nation. Their hard work will certainly pay off in the form of a more informed citizenry, more able to cope with the pressures of life in the nuclear age.

In recognition of the national importance of this issue, I ask that this resolution passed by the National PTA be printed below.

NUCLEAR EDUCATION FOR ADULTS

Whereas: the P.T.A., through its primary objectives, has historically been an advocate for the health, safety, welfare, and quality of life for children and youth; and

Whereas: psychological studies have shown that the threat of nuclear war and its possible consequences may have a destructive effect on the well being and emotional health of some children and youth; and

Whereas: in 1984 the National P.T.A. convention delegates passed a resolution endorsing nuclear education, focusing on child and student education; and

Whereas: the representatives of our government have a responsibility to listen to the concerns and opinions of the people before making nuclear decisions that affect all people; and

Whereas: the P.T.A. recognizes that in a democracy the responsibility for decision rests with an inform people, and that the P.T.A. actively promotes public awareness education on issues of deep concern to the welfare of our children; now therefore be it

Resolved: that the National P.T.A. use studies, forums, educational materials and programs and work with community organizations to inform its membership about nuclear age education to include nuclear developments; and be it further

Resolved: that the National P.T.A. develop materials and programs to enable parents to effectively address children's fears concerning perceived nuclear dangers.

SUPERFUND BILL MUST BE STRENGTHENED

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, the Energy and Commerce Committee recently reported a Superfund reauthorization bill (H.R. 2817). I opposed this legislation because the bill simply does not do enough to ensure that hazardous wastesites around the country will be cleaned up.

The Commerce Committee version of the bill is substantially weaker than the bill approved overwhelmingly by the House last year, 323 to 33. Last year, the House bill included such fundamental reforms of the Superfund Program as the adoption of strict schedules for cleanup and uniform national cleanup standards, as well as the establishment of a citizen's right to sue polluters to compel cleanup when EPA and the States are not acting at the site.

All of these crucial provisions have been fatally weakened or eliminated in the Commerce Committee's version of the legislation this year. The bill is unanimously opposed by the Sierra Club, the National Audubon Society, the National Campaign Against Toxic Hazards and other major national environmental organizations.

A recent editorial in the Wichita Eagle-Beacon provides a good analysis of why the Commerce Committee bill is flawed I commend this insightful commentary to my colleagues' attention.

The editorial urges us to work to strengthen this crucial piece of environmental legislation. I am hopeful that we can fundamentally improve this legislation as it moves forward so that when the House votes it will be voting on a bill that will represent real progress in cleaning up hazardous waste around the country.

[From the Wichita Eagle-Beacon, Aug. 12, 1985]

SUPERFUND BILL NEEDS MUCH WORK IF MISSION IS TO BE ACCOMPLISHED

When Congress in 1980 passed the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation and Liability Act, and created the Superfund, it was reacting to a national toxic-waste pollution problem that Americans know now was just the tip of a poisonous iceberg. Over the past five years, administration of the Superfund program has confirmed that improperly-disposed-of toxic wastes threaten the health of millions of Americans in every state in the union.

While virtually no one in Congress now argues the toxic-waste problem isn't serious, neither House seems inclined to do much but sling money at it. It's realistic to think the Superfund bill that eventually reaches President Reagan's desk will allocate at least $7.5 billion toward beginning cleanups of the sites identified as most dangerous. But unless senators and representatives undergo a change of heart as they begin floor action on the House and Senate versions of a Superfund reauthorization bill next month, it's not realistic to think that money would buy taxpayers increased safety from toxic wastes. Nor would the legislation help citizens protect themselves from toxic wastes or collect damages for waste-related health problems.

What's wrong, in a nutshell, is this: Every institution with a vested interest in Superfund reauthorization, save the public itself, has been heard from, and heeded. This isn't much of a surprise in the Senate, where interest in a vigorous Superfund doesn't appear to be exceedingly strong. But the House's impending retreat from the model Superfund bill it passed last year—it died in conference committee—is a major disappointment.

Then, the House understood that a major reason for the Superfund's less-than-stellar performance was the lack of a rigid cleanup schedule for the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency to follow. Not this year. The House version of the bill, adopted by the Energy and Commerce Committee in the frantic days before Congress' summer recess began, theoretically could allow the EPA to begin no cleanups at all by 1990. If the EPA's dismal cleanup record since 1980 is any indication—only six completed—it's naive to think even that many more dumps would be cleaned up the next five years. The rigid cleanup schedule in last year's failed bill should be included in this year's bill.

Too, many chemicals known or suspected to be toxic would fall through the cracks in the impending House bill. Language flaws in the bill also would allow the EPA to enter "quick and dirty" cleanup agreements with dump owners. The House should broaden the bill's list of dangerous chemicals and better define what a "cleanup" is. To allow the EPA too much semantic leeway is to invite phantom cleanups. The nation needs the real thing.

The central objective of fighting toxic-waste pollution is to neutralize or get rid of toxic wastes quickly, regardless of who's at fault. The House seems to have forgotten that, and instead provides those who created waste dumps—even when doing so was perfectly legal—a giant break: limited or no liability for the dreadful mess they created. By adding "strict, joint and several liability" clauses to the bill, members can assure that the EPA doesn't unnecessarily spend tax money cleaning up dumps created by those who are at least morally responsible for menaces to the public health.

Finally, the House needs to go much further toward giving Americans who have been threatened or harmed by toxic wastes full rights to recover damages in court. The current bill pays lip service to this objective, but doesn't give citizens the right to sue polluters or the EPA in federal court. Nor does it give citizens any way to learn what threats that nearby dumps or chemical facilities may pose.

The House Superfund reauthorization bill, in short, needs a lot of work. Given the fact the present Superfund bill expires Sept. 30, House members won't have much time to accomplish this. But somehow they must, lest "Superfund" become a synonym for federal inaction on—and indifference to—a serious public health problem.

COOPERATION AMONG BUSINESS, GOVERNMENT, AND LABOR IN FALL RIVER

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, the city of Fall River provides excellent examples of cooperation among business, government, and labor to promote genuine economic development. One excellent example of this is the work being done to expand the Aluminum Processing Co. at the Fall River Industrial Park.

A recent, excellent article in The Fall River News, which does a superb job of coverting the economic affairs of the city of Fall River, highlights this process through an extensive interview with the administrative manager of APC, Loretta George. Ms. George is an enlightened business leader who has contributed a great deal to the economic, social, and cultural life of the city and I think this article is an excellent example that ought to be studied by people interested in how older urban areas can proceed with economic development.

Mayor Carlton Viveiros of Fall River has an outstanding record in this regard and his administration shows how Federal, State, and local officials can work together with private sector people under the right leadership to produce a great deal of good for the citizens of a particular area.

COMPANY LAUDS MUNICIPAL AGENCIES

(By Sean Flynn)

The major expansion of Aluminum Processing Co. now under way at the Fall River Industrial Park was made possible by close cooperation between the company and city agencies, said APC's administrative manager, Loretta George.

She stressed that the financing of the $8.5 million expansion, which will eventually mean the addition of 150 employees, was the result of combined efforts by the company, Greater Fall River Development Corporation, Office of Economic Development and mayor's office.

On July 26 the company purchased its 250,000-square foot facility in the Industrial Park for $1.5 million from the Great Fall River Development Corporation. Besides the funds for the building purchase, $4.5 million was allocated for new equipment and $2.5 million for a 50,000-square-foot addition to the existing 250,000-sqare-foot facility.

The expansion will be financed with a $5 million Industrial Revenue Bond, a $1.5 million Urban Development Action Grant and $2 million in private funds.

In addition, as part of another ongoing major investment program, a $1.2 million computer-controlled anodizing line is now being installed to augment the existing automatic line.

"We're thankful to the staff of the Fall River Office of Economic Development and Mayor Viveiros for their strong support in acquiring the UDAG grant," said Mrs. George. "John Whalen (director of FROED) went to Washington on our behalf many times."

The support from the major's office meant many letters, as well as calls to legislators, such as U.S. Rep. Barney Frank and Sen. John Kerry, noted Mrs. George. "Competiton was stiff for the remaining UDAG dollars," she said. "I believe the major and FROED have acquired more UDAG funding for this city than has been received by any other city in the commonwealth, exclusive of Boston."

Besides the UDAG grant, the company received a $5 million Industrial Revenue Bond that was given initial approval by the Fall River Industrial Development Finance Authority on July 2 and given final approval by the Massachusetts Industrial Finance Agency on July 17.

The current project is only the most recent part of an expansion with a much longer history, said Mrs. George.

In 1972 Lightolier, which owns APC, moved the company to the Industrial Park to a building that the Greater Fall River Development Corporation then owned.

"We essentially put the building up for them, took a mortgage out and then leased it to them with an option to buy," said John F. Lucey, counsel and clerk for the development corporation.

To make the move possible, nine local banks raised $3.8 million for the construction of the facility. APC's final purchase price was reduced during the lease agreement. "The company received credit against the final purchase price every year it paid rent," explained Lucey.

Since 1964 the Aluminum Processing Co. has been a division of Lightolier Inc. of New Jersey, a world-wide supplier of lighting fixtures. Today, APC, employing 650, is the second-largest manufacturer of lighting instruments in the world. With the planned addition of 150 employees, the company will become one of the three largest employers in the city.

APC was founded in 1955 by Irving Puhn and was located in the Kerr Mill complex on Martine Street. The company quickly became a chief supplier to Lightolier, which was the reason Lightolier made the acquisition, explained Mrs. George. At the time of the merger, APC manufactured reflectors for the lighting industry, had a workforce of 70 and occupied 50,000 square feet in the Kerr Mill.

Today the company is a vertically-integrated manufacturing facility producing 125,000 quality lighting fixtures per week—more than six million annually. Each fixture has an average of 23 components. For this production, APC purchases, in one year, enough coils of steel that if stacked one upon the other would be as high as the Empire State Building, enough wire to circle the moon at the equator.

APC has provided lighting fixtures for numerous prestigious projects, including the Boston Prudential Center, the Dallas-Fort Worth Airport, the Moscow Trade Center, the Canadian Olympics in Montreal and Federal Reserve Bank buildings.

The current workforce of 650 receives a $14 million payroll annually. "The productivity of the APC workforce has consistently been high and was a critical factor in determining the expansion," said Mrs. George. "In addition to manufacturing a quality product, we reinvest in our company family to ensure that each employee achieves his full potential."

The company provides further education courses for employees including robotics, citizenship, English, General Equivalency Degrees (G.E.D.), safety, hydraulics, pneumatics and management training.

Many of the jobs require a high level of skill, explained Mrs. George. "It takes three years of training before developing an individual into a qualified metal spinner," she noted.

APC is noted for expertise in the metal spinning process. Skilled workmen turn flat discs of aluminum into symmetrical light hoods of different sizes.

A hood is formed with a mandrel on a lathe turning at a speed of 2200 rpm. Other hoods are formed on automatic spinning machines. Both are high-speed operations which, combined with trimming and press equipment, make up an integrated work cell.

The hoods and reflectors of the fixtures can also by formed by hydroforming. In hydroforming, hydraulic pressure is applied to form aluminum discs over a form. The company says it has more hydroforming machines under one roof than any other lighting facility in North America. Continued investment in new equipment ensures APC's continuing position as a leader in its branch, stressed Mrs. George.

SUPPORT FOR JOINT INTERNATIONAL BORDER COMMISSION

HON. ARLAN STANGELAND

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. STANGELAND. Mr. Speaker, the jointly shared international boundary waters between the State of Minnesota and the Province of Ontario has been the scene of constant border conflicts in the past few years. The livelihoods and economic survival of Seventh Congressional District Minnesotans depend on the successful resolution of these constant border problems with Ontario.

Various attempts, so far, to solve these controversial issues have proved fruitless. Now, the best avenue of resolution is the creation of a Joint International Border Commission involving all four governments to review tourism, resource, and access disputes on the border waters.

I am submitting my testimony of August 23, 1985, at International Falls, MN, before the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee's Intergovernmental Relations Subcommittee, chaired by my colleague and fellow Minnesotan, Senator DAVE DURENBERGER, which addresses and outlines my conception of this Joint International Border Commission and its responsibilities:

STATEMENT OF HON. ARLAN STANGELAND

Mr. Chairman, I commend you for the foresight in conducting this field hearing and calling to witness those who desperately need the Commission in place today—Minnesotans residing in and using the jointly shared international boundary waters area.

This Congressional hearing, and House and Senate companion legislation are the catalysts needed for the Minnesota/Ontario Joint International Border Commission to become reality. As the representative from the Seventh Congressional District, working many years to resolve these border problems, I welcome and appreciate this opportunity you have provided me.

The creation of the Joint International Border Commission is not only timely but imperative. In my capacity as one Member of the United States House of Representatives, I attest to the difficulties encountered in negotiating with a foreign country, on one hand, and employing the services of our State Department on the other.

For many months I have been in contact with Canadian officials in Washington requesting their intercession to iron out a compromise and/or moratorium with Ontario on the implementation of its user fee in the border waters. In addition, as you know, you joined with me in coordinating and hosting a conference in Washington, D.C. in late February where Canadian and Ontarian dignitaries, and Minnesota and United States officials participated in an in-depth examination of the controversial issues affecting this border area. The feeling emerged from this Washington summit that a joint international border commission is now necessary to accommodate the difficulties that have arisen in this specific area.

As far back as 1842, Canada and the United States pledged their integrity and cooperation when the two nations signed the Webster-Asburton Treaty providing that "all the water communications on the lakes along the border between the United States and Canada shall be free and open to the use of the citizens and subjects of both countries." Regrettably, Ontario's user fee may be viewed as a reprisal, and certainly violates the spirit if not the letter of the Treaty. Hostile attitudes and regulations in our decade are unnecessary, unwarranted and unlawful.

The established International Joint Commission, United States and Canada has extremely limited responsibility, and then, only at the behest of the two governments.

Too, the State Department is responsible for this area, bound by treaty, and must oversee the execution of the Treaties' tenets. The most recent example of the State Department's prudence is its rejection of the International Joint Commission's consideration of Ontario's imposed user fee and its ramifications.

Assistant Secretary William L. Ball, however, in his response to my request that the IJC intervene, does explain that ". . . it is our view that the user fee on U.S. sport fishermen is not a regulation primarily affecting navigation and, hence does not fall squarely within the language of relevant U.S.-Canadian treaties. Due to its discriminatory nature, however, the regulation can certainly be argued to be inconsistent with the spirit of those treaties which contemplate that necessary regulations will be imposed non-discriminatorily. In any case, we are fully in accord with your views that the problem is an extremely vexing one which calls for creative resolution."

Mr. Chairman, I ask that this letter from Assistant Secretary Ball be inserted in the hearing record.

The more involved I have become in attempting to solve the border controversies, the more I seem to become a prisoner of these same circumstances. Thus, the frustration and futility of all my endeavors prompted me to introduce H.R. 5340 in the 98th Congress and H.R. 1080 in the 99th act Congress. This legislation "authorizes and requests the President to invite the Government of Canada to join with the United States in the creation of a commission to oversee water policy (including environmental, economic, and travel issues related to water policy) on the lakes intersected by the boundary between the State of Minnesota and Canada.

This is not as State claims a "creative resolution," but rather, a strong first step. Mr. Chairman, I also request that H.R. 1080 be included in the hearing record.

My long lasting concern for the boundary waters area is reflected in my bill H.R. 1080. While this measure may not accomplish all the objectives we may wish to address, it is a preliminary initiative establishing the Commission and defining the Commission's jurisdiction. Since the introduction of H.R. 1080, I have revised and enlarged the scope of the Commission.

The Citizens' Council on Voyaguers National Park issued a resolution supporting the principle of this legislation, and constituents in my Seventh Congressional District also endorse this concept.

The Commission's authority will reflect our mutual respect, responsibility and cooperation for the protection of the valuable jointly shared international boundary waters area between the United States and Canada, and Minnesota and Ontario. Furthermore, the JIBC is designed to encourage and enhance the Webster-Ashburton Treaty of 1842 and the Root-Bryce Treaty of 1909.

H.R. 1080 limits the commission to six members, three of whom represent the United States and three of whom represent Canada. Perhaps Members of Congress, whose districts border Canada, should be added as ex officio members.

The voting members of the Commission from the United States should be appointed by the President from nominations submitted by the Governor of the State of Minnesota, and they should be qualified in international affairs, particularly Canadian affairs, and versed in fish, wildlife and tourism issues related to water policy. Individuals representing the same country should not serve consecutive terms as Chairman of the Commission.

The budget for the Commission could be allocated proportionately from the funding of each of the Departments charged with regulatory responsibility on the U.S.-Canadian boundary waters along the border.

A provision could be inserted in the legislation providing for the other logistics of the Commission—staff complement, location—after the Commissioners have been appointed and the Chairman selected.

Resource degradation in the border waters has precipitated much discussion but action that has been at cross purposes. United and cooperative resource management between Ontario and Minnesota by Ontario and Minnesota is an immediate necessity whose short-term neglect may lead to long-term disastrous repercussions for both countries. The Commission will be responsible for developing and overseeing a joint, comprehensive resource management program for these waters.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the establishment of this Joint International Border Commission is the only recourse we now have. Through its joint leadership and authority, we will see the end of constant erupting conflicts leading to retaliatory reactions, and return to the amicable, peaceful relationship with our northern neighbor on these important issues.

JOHN LOFTON AND THE ANNIVERSARY OF THE SAKHALIN MASSACRE OF KAL 007

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, just over a month ago John Lofton, the gifted and often trenchant writer for the Washington Times, wrote about the short memory of many American businessmen. In his article, "Business as Usual After KAL Shootdown," Mr. Lofton examines cable traffic between the U.S. Embassy in Moscow. He notes that just a few weeks following the deliberate massacre by a Soviet Air Force jet of an unarmed Korean airliner, resulting in the deaths of 269 human beings—including our friend and colleague, Congressman Jerry McDonald—more than 100 American businesses participated in an exhibit "Agribusiness U.S.A.," in Moscow. His article raises the question of why they did so, and whether either our Embassy in Moscow or the Department of State even thought of advising the businessmen that there might be excellent reasons for withdrawing from the exhibit. The anniversary of that event has come and gone, once again. I do not think we can comfortably ignore the questions John Lofton raises in his article.

[From the Washington Times, Aug. 5, 1985]

BUSINESS AS USUAL AFTER KAL SHOOTDOWN

(By John Lofton)

Shortly after Mikhail Gorbachev became the Kremlin's newest top thug, a smiling Dwayne Andreas, cochairman of the U.S.-U.S.S.R. Trade and Economic Council, was featured in a CBS News special, saying of Mr. Gorbachev that "he's the kind of fellow we can do business with."

But, of course, American businessmen like Mr. Andreas would gladly do business with the devil if they could turn a profit.

Nearly two years ago, during the week of October 18-25, 1983, more than 100 American companies and their European branches took part in "Agribusiness USA-83" in Moscow.

Among the participants in this exhibit were Dow Chemical, International Harvester Co., John Deere Co., Lockwood Corp., Ralston Purina Co., Stauffer Chemical, Monsanto, Owens Illinois Inc., E.I. du Pont de Nemours and Co., IBM, Occidental Petroleum, Archer Daniels Midland, Philip Morris, Union Carbide, UpJohn Co., Eli Lilly and Control Data Corp.

This is the way the Information Department of the Soviet Embassy in Washington described the fair: "Thirteen hundred Soviet specialists took part in the scientific seminars and symposiums during the exhibition. Several millions dollars' worth of exhibited machines and equipment were sold to the Soviet foreign trade organizations. It was agreed to continue negotiations about the possibility of additional sales of American equipment to the U.S.S.R. The Soviet and American participants practically unanimously evaluated the results of the exhibitions as successful."

Well, terrific. But there was a fly in the ointment. Or, more accurately, there was a civilian airliner in the sea. A month before this exhibit, the Soviets shot down Korean Air Lines Flight 007, murdering 269 men, women and children, including more than 60 Americans—fellow citizens of the businessmen attempting to do business-as-usual with the Soviets.

So, what happened? Did the U.S. companies scheduled to participate in this exhibition withdraw to protest this mid-air mass murder of their countrymen? Certainly you jest. Here is the story as I have been able to piece it together from U.S. Commerce and State department documents obtained under the Freedom of Information Act:

A cable from our embassy in Moscow says that "a few exhibitors" did withdraw. Exactly which ones is not known. The Soviets will not say. And neither will the U.S.-U.S.S.R. Trade and Economic Council.

Another cable from our Moscow embassy reads: "American business representatives resident in Moscow are concerned about the KAL shoot-down, but they have expressed no reservations about their commitments to participate in the Agribusiness-USA Exhibition in October. While all are shocked by the incident and the Soviet response to it, most view the exhibition as an important means of maintaining market presence during a difficult period."

This cable, signed by Ambassador Arthur Hartman, adds his comment: "U.S. firms with experience in the Soviet market tend not to have reservations about participation. This group comprises the large majority of exhibitors. Companies which have not been active in the Soviet market tend to be the ones expressing serious reservations. Most of these companies are represented by trading companies, which have a sufficient number of principals to maintain exhibition partipation commitments."

Another cable from our Moscow embassy says that "well over half of the $10 million value of exhibited equipment was sold." The exhibition included machines and equipment for production, processing, transportation and storage of agricultural products. The exhibition also featured technologies concerning the use of plant pesticides, the artificial pollination of plants and the insemination of cattle and the automation and management of agri-industrial processes.

Another cable from our Moscow embassy says "over 400" American business representatives participated in this exhibition. And Soviet interest in it is characterized as "high."

Another cable from our Moscow embassy notes that eight Soviet officials "spent several hours at the show, frequently engaging American business representatives in lengthy commercial discussions. Several accepted invitations for lunch at the company stands."

This cable also notes that American exhibitors were "impressed not only by the number of ranking Soviet officials who visited their stands, but also by the special Soviet efforts made to arrange for the purchase of exhibited equipment." The "concerted Soviet initiative made to arrange for post-exhibition contract signings" was said to be "extraordinary."

Another cable from our Moscow embassy says: "Two industry sources reported continuing differences between [Soviet] Ministry of Agriculture officials and those from the Ministry of Tractor and Machine Building. Both claimed that tempers flared in their presence—Minister of Agriculture officials roundly criticizing Minister of Tractor officials for supplying shoddy equipment, and Minister of Tractor officials chastising Minister of Agriculture officials for invading Minister of Tractor's turf. . . . Both sources expressed amazement at the heated outbursts, and both claimed to have been forced to separate the antagonists."

Still another embassy cable from Moscow says of Dwayne Andreas, co-chairman of the U.S.-U.S.S.R. Trade and Economic Council. "Andreas [in a speech which he did not show the embassy in advance] gave an upbeat view of the role of trade, saying that embargoes are notoriously unsuccessful and that trade relations are more important to peace than arms control negotiations. The ambassador [Mr. Hartman], after noting that businessmen are traditionally optimists, expressed [U.S. government] support of the exhibition as a means of promoting non-strategic trade with the Soviet Union."

Mr. Andreas is quoted as saying, in a question-and-answer period following his talk: "We are here out of fear—fear of losing the business."

In this cable, Ambassador Hartman notes that the Soviet press chose to highlight Mr. Andreas' remarks at this press conference rather than those of a Soviet official who appeared with him. He reports a Pravda story interpreted Andreas' comments to have "produced convincing evidence that any type of sanction from Washington in relation to trade with the Soviet Union will bring only harm to American companies."

And, says Mr. Hartman, a Tass story "changed a few words and drew from different responses to construct two quotes of Andreas," reporting Mr. Andreas as saying "life itself has proved that all kinds of embargoes and sanctions in foreign trade are absolutely ineffective."

Mr. Hartman concludes with the comment that "other Western officers have reported similar Soviet creative construction of quotations, in which statements are slightly altered and rearranged to remove or add nuances." He refers to Mr. Andreas as "inexperienced" in his role as co-chairman of the exhibit.

Now, when you ask spokesmen for the various businesses participating in "Agribusiness U.S.A-83" why they went to Moscow to conduct business-as-usual with representatives of a government that murdered more than 60 Americans in cold blood, their responses are pathetic.

Robert Charlton, a public affairs manager for Dow Chemical, told me his company went to Moscow because the US.-U.S.S.R. Trade Council encouraged it to do so. And, since the U.S. Embassy said "nothing one way or the other " about the shooting down of KAL Flight 007, his company inferred from this silence that they were to go, he says. Mr. Charlton says his business is not in a position to establish international policy given the view of the U.S. government that this exhibit was a good thing—a view he admits, when I ask, was given before the Soviets shot down KAL Flight 007.

Me: But is it really saying that you should establish international policy to suggest that you and other American businesses—only one month after the Soviet murder of more than 60 of your fellow Americans—should have told the Soviets in no uncertain terms: "No, we're not going to conduct business-as-usual with murderers?!"

Mr. Charlton: "Well, the key point is that we were looking to the federal government for guidance on this matter."

William Greenhill, a spokesman for International Harvester, takes my question and says he will get me an answer. After 10 days of hearing nothing from him, I call him back. He now says that he will not take my question, that I must put it in writing. When I say this is a stalling tactic, he replies: "Sure, it is."

Stephen Littlejohn, director of government affairs and public relations at Monsanto, says his company checked with our State Department and Commerce Department, asked their advice and was urged to participate in the Moscow exhibit. He says he does not know and will not check to find the names of the officials who urged this.

And last, and certainly least, Leo Zanoni, a public relations associate for Upjohn Co., says, presumably with a straight face: "We were all in favor of pulling out after the shootdown, but we couldn't reach our guy in Moscow."

Spokesmen for Union Carbide, E.I. Dupont, Eli Lilly, John Deere, Occidental Petroleum, I.B.M., Philip Morris and Control Data all took my question about why they went to Moscow despite the destruction of KAL Flight 007. But none of them returned my phone calls with answers, as they promised to do.

HUNGER STRIKE FOR SAKHAROVS

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, last Thursday I was privileged to join my colleagues in expressing our support for the exiled Nobel Peace Prize winner and noted scientist, Dr. Andrei Sakharov and his wife, Dr. Yelena Bonner. Across the street from the Soviet Embassy, the stepson of Dr. Sakharov, Alexei Semyonov, has begun a hunger strike on their behalf, which is now in its 11th day. Drs. Sakharov and Bonner have been exiled to the closed Soviet city of Gorky for the past 5 years, and the last 6 months have been most disturbing to many of us because both their postal and telephonic communications have been cut off. Early in the summer, Alexei Semyonov contacted me in an attempt to assess the tampering of a postcard he had recently received from his parents. The Post Office and Civil Service Committee, on which I serve, has conducted an ongoing investigation into the interruption of mail going to the Soviet Union from the United States, as well as the tampering of outgoing mail from that country. Since that time, Alexei and his sister Tanya Yankelevich have only received one other postcard in July of this year. Their parents' apartment in Gorky lies dark and empty, and no convincing evidence has been provided by the Soviet authorities that Drs. Sakharov and Bonner are safe and in good health.

Alexei continues his hunger strike through the heat wave engulfing Washington with stoic determination; he contributed his thoughts and reasons for so doing in an article which appeared in today's Washington Post. I would like to take this opportunity to share this piece with my colleagues, so that they can more fully understand the serious nature of the Sakharov's disappearance. It is imperative that we in Congress continue to insist on the necessity of adhering to international treaties and agreements on human rights. At the same time we are bound by morality to publicize those violations that are committed until such time as they have been satisfactorily resolved. In commending the following thought-provoking article to my colleagues, I urge their support for our congressional efforts in alleviating the plight of these two highly respected exiled Soviet citizens.

A SIMPLE REQUEST: I'D LIKE TO SEE MY PARENTS

Ten days ago I started a hunger strike near the Soviet Embassy to protest the Soviet Union's persecution and mistreatment of my parents, Dr. Andrei Sakharov and Dr. Elena Bonner. My demand: to see my parents, either in the West or in the U.S.S.R. Why have I taken such a step? I do not regard a hunger strike as a weapon of choice—only of desperation. But did I have a choice?

For over half a year nobody has seen my parents. We do not any longer have any communication with them. My parents' health is poor. In the past few years my mother has suffered three heart attacks. She is a disabled World War II veteran, legally blind in one eye. To save her eyesight, she needs surgery; she may also need bypass heart surgery. My stepfather also needs expert care for a number of illnesses. Yet in their exile my parents are treated only by KGB-supplied doctors whose actions are determined by KGB will and not by the needs of their patients.

That in itself is bad enough, but lately their situation has become even worse. We learned (long after the fact) that in April Dr. Sakharov began a hunger strike. Immediately my parents were isolated from each other and the rest of the world. Later in Soviets showed two videotapes made with hidden cameras: in June, to prove that my stepfather had ended the hunger strike, and in July, to claim that the Sakharovs were reunited. Why, then, it there still no word from the Sakharovs themselves?

The silence is threatening. Having achieved the complete isolation of my parents, the KGB is free to do anything to them, even to kill, and count on that never becoming known to the world (remember Raoul Wallenberg? We are yet to learn his fate 40 years after the Soviets removed him from Vienna and into the Gulag.)

I believe human rights should be the underlying principle in the policies of Western countries toward the Soviet Union; thus I believe my parents, who have become symbols of the struggle for human rights in the Soviet Union, should be vigorously defended by Western countries. Unfortunately, I cannot see that happening now in the Sakharovs' critical and tragic situation.

Many Western countries, justly outraged by South Africa's breaking the moral laws of humanity, are right now applying or considering punitive actions against that state. The Soviet Union is disregarding both moral and legal obligations. The U.S.S.R. has signed international treaties (the Helsinki Accords, the U.N. Declaration of Human Rights) in which it obligated itself to respect human rights.

South Africa still allows its Nobel Peace laureate, Bishop Desmond Tutu, to be outspoken and free. In Poland, a winner of the Nobel Peace Prize, Lech Walesa, is under severe restrictions, but at least is at home and with friends. What country, then, can the Soviet Union be compared to in its treatment of my stepfather, the only Russian ever to win the Nobel Peace Prize? Only one example comes to my mind: Carl von Ossietzky, a German journalist and winner of the Nobel Peace Prize, who was imprisoned by the Nazis. But with this qualification: von Ossietzky was released and allowed to leave Germany.

But the Western countries have effectively dropped human rights issues from the agenda of their relations with the Soviet Union, probably believing that this way progress in other areas can be more easily obtained. I think this is self-defeating: sensing a weakness in the Western positions on principles, the Soviets become confident they can bully the Free World to accept the short end of the deal on any other question too.

As the situation of my parents was worsening in the last year, there was also a change in the policy of the National Academy of Sciences, of which my stepfather is a member. Five years ago, when the Soviets forcibly moved Dr. Sakharov from Moscow, the NAS discontinued scientific exchanges with the Soviet Union. This step was in complete accord with the NAS's traditional strong stand in defense of human rights.

Now, however, under the presidency of Dr. Frank Press, the NAS has reversed course. Although no improvements had been made in Soviet human rights policies, and nothing had changed in cases particularly important to the scientific community—such as those of Drs. Orlov and Shcharansky—and although the Sakharovs are still in Gorky and worse off than before, Dr. Press went to Moscow and signed an agreement resuming the exchanges. He did so on the day that was the fifth anniversary of my stepfather's illegal exile. The very choice of the date says to the Soviets that human rights are not important to the NAS anymore. Even in the face of consequent protests from scientific organizations and a number of individual scientists, including some Nobel laureates, the NAS has refused to change its position.

In view of all this, believing my parents to be in mortal danger, I have started this hunger strike. I know that I cannot win alone. But there are many people concerned about my parents, and with their help I hope the situation can be changed. The administration can be moved from a passive position of denouncing the Soviets' treatment of my parents to actively seeking a resolution of the case.

It would, I believe, have lasting negative effects on East-West relations if Mr. Reagan and Mr. Gorbachev had a friendly meeting and afterwards we learned that the Soviets had killed or let die the Sakharovs and kept it a secret. I also believe that now, before the summit, my parents can and should be rescued.

RESEARCH TO NEUTRALIZE TOXIC WASTES

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, several excellent studies have been issued recently concerning the urgent need to develop new technologies for the permanent treatment of toxic wastes. Unless the development of these technologies is encouraged, we will never get off the treadmill of shifting hazardous wastes from one leaking site to another.

My colleague from New Jersey, Representative ROBERT TORRICELLI, recently introduced an excellent piece of legislation which would establish a badly needed research program in this vital area. I strongly support his legislation and commend him for his efforts. The following article from the Bergen Record describes the nature of the problem that faces us and the solutions offered by Representative TORRICELLI.

[From the Bergen Record, July 25, 1985]

EPA CRITICIZED FOR FAILING TO NEUTRALIZE TOXIC WASTES

(By Robert Kravitz)

WASHINGTON, DC.—The Environmental Protection Agency's approach to toxic waste cleanup is not only wrong but dangerous, according to a congressional advisory group and a growing number of federal legislators.

Instead of promoting promising new technologies to destroy wastes or render them nonhazardous, the federal agency mostly allows wastes to be moved to landfills where they may leak again, the critics say.

"We are not getting permanently effective remedies. In many cases, we're just shifting the problem from one location to the other," says Joel Hirschhorn, senior research associate at the Office of Technology Assessment (OTA), a nonpartisan congressional advisory board.

In more than nine out of 10 cases, OTA investigators have found, landfills that have received waste from federal "Superfund" sites that were leaking deadly chemicals are themselves leaking or in danger of leaking.

According to the OTA and some members of Congress, the EPA's approach could lead to health risks and far higher cleanup costs in the future. They say alternative methods of cleanup exist, but they have hardly been developed or used because of red tape and lack of support from the EPA.

"Most industrialized nations are now using new techniques to dispose of toxic wastes, and many of these techniques were originally developed in the United States," says Rep. Robert Torricelli, a Hackensack Democrat who has introduced legislation requiring EPA to test and promote new technologies. "Japan had a worse toxic waste problem than we did 20 years ago, and they've eliminated it, with no land storage."

NEW TECHNIQUES NOT USED

"The problem really is not a lack of innovation," says Hirschhorn, "but obstacles that stand in the way of proving new technologies, developing them, and demonstrating them."

A recent OTA report listed 26 innovative cleanup techniques, ranging from vitrification to destruction by biological organisms to high-temperature incineration, all of which have proven effective in initial tests. But none of them are being used at any of the 786 Superfund sites.

A typical product on the list is K-20, a chemical sealant, or "encapsulator," developed by a small New Jersey firm, Lopat Enterprises. The sealant mixes with toxic chemicals, preventing them from mixing with water and leaking through soil.

Lopat, based in Wanamassa in Monmouth County, has tested the substance on several sites across the country containing several highly toxic contaminants, including polychlorinated biphenyls (PCB's), chlordane, dioxin, and lead. In each case, according to the company and OTA, it has proved effective.

But EPA has never tested the Lopat product, and it has never been tried on any Superfund sites.

"What's lacking is one central office, somewhere to go to at EPA to get a straight answer," says Lincoln Davis, executive vice-president for research and development at Lopat.

"Industry looks for an EPA approval on products, but there is no such animal," adds Lopat President Louis Flax. "EPA needs to be more firm in saying either a product works or it doesn't work."

Representatives of Lopat and several other companies testified at a recent congressional hearing about the futility of trying to get a new product tested or approved by the EPA.

CATCH-22

According to the companies, first they are told by the EPA that their products can't be used on Superfund sites because they haven't been approved, then they are told there is no one to talk to about getting approval or they get different answers from different regional offices. They are also told they can't be approved unless they are proved effective on wastes at specific Superfund sites, but they are barred from getting samples of those wastes, which the EPA controls.

"The whole thing is a Catch-22," says Torricelli.

Hirschhorn adds that when the EPA evaluates alternatives for Superfund sites and compares the cost of new technologies to that of land disposal, it only looks at the short-term costs of landfills, and not their long-term cost and potential safety hazards.

"They're just not evaluating alternatives to land disposal properly," says Hirschhorn. "The game is loaded from the beginning."

Under Torricelli's bill, the EPA would be required to conduct 10 demonstration projects every two years using new treatment technologies, at a cost of up to $25 million. The agency also would be required to make Superfund wastes available to companies interested in testing new products, and to provide a central repository for up-to-date information on cleanup technologies.

By demonstrating the new technologies, Torricelli said, the EPA would build support for alternatives to landfilling, deep-well injection, and other nontreatment techniques. It also would help promote waste treatment as a viable industry.

"This will give people who have been developing new technologies access to the $10 billion Superfund market." said Torricelli. "That's sufficient incentive for anyone to continue in their work.".

The bill has won bipartisan support, and is backed by Rep. James Florio, the New Jersey Democrat who authored the original Superfund legislation, and several environmental groups.

It was approved unanimously Tuesday by the House Subcommittee on Natural Resources and Environment. It goes today to the full House Committee on Science and Technology, where it is also expected to be approved.

About the only opposition to the bill so far has come from the EPA.

Donald J. Ereth, deputy assistant administrator for research and development, told the natural resources subcommittee that the EPA favors development and demonstration of emerging technologies, but doesn't need a new bill to do so. He also said the agency opposes using Superfund cleanup money for longer-term research and development.

Even within the EPA, however, there are officials who support the bill.

Larry Basilico, chief of hazardous waste research in the Office of Environmental Engineering and Technology, said in a telephone interview that he agrees the agency has not done enough to demonstrate new technologies.

"Most of our evaulation has been on existing technology that's already installed," said Basilico. "I think the bill would give a clear-cut, easier pathway for industry to go out there and help solve the problem."

SUPERFUND: A TEST OF LOYALTIES

HON. BOB EDGAR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, last week the Philadelphia Inquirer published an editorial entitled "Superfund: A test of loyalties."

The paper calls on us to pass a Superfund reauthorization that will hold the Environmental Protection Agency [EPA] to a strict timetable for cleanups of toxic waste sites, to seek permanent cleanups wherever possible, and to prohibit the transfer of waste from Superfund cleanups to leaking landfills.

I can't agree more.

That's why I introduced legislation yesterday to do just that.

My bill, H.R. 3245, will provide $10.1 billion for the Superfund over the next 5 years. It requires the EPA to abide by a strict timetable, beginning cleanup at 900 toxic waste sites over that period. H.R. 3245 will apply stringent cleanup standards, and would give citizens the right to sue the EPA if it does not fulfill its statutory mandate to clean up Superfund hazardous waste dumps.

H.R. 3245 also includes strong "right-to-know" language that will require manufacturers and processors of hazardous substances to disclose to surrounding communities the health and environmental risks poses by such chemicals and to devise emergency response plans in case there are accidental releases of toxics.

Furthermore, the bill will allow citizens to petition the Federal Agency for Toxic Substances and Disease Registry [ATSDR] to carry out preliminary health assessments when they are exposed to hazardous wastes from Superfund sites. Finally, my bill includes the text of the Radon Reduction Act, H.R. 3172, which would set up a demonstration project with authorizations from the general fund to attack radon contamination problems in Pennsylvania's Reading Prong and elsewhere.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 3245 is a strong, responsible bill in keeping with the Inquirer's exhortation to develop a Superfund reauthorization that serves the interests of the public. I urge my colleagues to cosponsor the bill and I attach the Philadephia Inquirer editorial for their review:

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer, Sept. 5, 1985]

SUPERFUND: A TEST OF LOYALTIES

A vote to reauthorize the federal Superfund program awaits members of the House of Representatives. Their choice is this: Should the Superfund serve the interests of the public or the interests of the polluters? If they vote for a bill drafted by the House Energy and Commerce Committee, they will be coming down firmly on the side of the polluters.

The bill would give the Environmental Protection Agency a blank check to manage—or mismanage—the Superfund program as it sees fit. There would be no deadlines for action or standards for cleanup. The bill would deprive people of the fullest legal protection from the hazards of toxic substances in the absence of a meaningful federal enforcement effort. As a result, House members who vote for it would be ensuring that the threats posed to communities by abandoned waste sites throughout the United States would increase rather than diminish.

There is no other way to characterize the choice.

The bill is a rejection of everything that has been learned about cleaning up wastes since the Superfund program was established five years ago. The EPA must be held to a strict cleanup timetable. No timetable existed in the 1980 law and the EPA cleaned up only 10 of 800 sites identified as serious hazards while the number of previously uncounted sites soared. The waste sites must actually be cleaned up—not partially contained, not transferred to another leaking landfill where they will contaminate more neighborhoods. Citizens must be guaranteed access to the federal courts so that they can force the EPA to do its job and force polluters to remove wastes that are a current or imminent threat. The bill denies them a strong regulatory program and the right to seek legal redress in federal court.

Superfund reauthorization will stand as the most important environmental decision that Congress makes this session. It also will stand as a true measure of whose interests rank foremost with the House of Representatives.

CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO JOHN J. MATTIMOE

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to John J. Mattimoe who is retiring after an exemplary career as general manager of the Sacramento Municipal Utility District [SMUD].

John's hard work and cheerful manner has earned him the respect and admiration of friends and colleagues throughout the Sacramento area. John's achievements, notably his work on the Upper American River project, his contributions to the development of the Rancho Seco Nuclear Power Plant, and his outstanding record as the director of SMUD, serve as powerful and visible tributes to John's commitment to serving the Sacramento community. In a world of limited energy resources, John has led the way in the development of alternative sources of energy such as geothermal and solar power.

Mr. Speaker, Sacramento is truly fortunate to be the home of such an outstanding and energetic citizen. Our community could never properly acknowledge all of the good that John Mattimoe brought with him and I join with all of his friends in saluting John on a job well done and in wishing him a most enjoyable retirement.

THE CLEVELAND CLINIC FOUNDATION

HON. LOUIS STOKES

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to call to the attention of my colleagues the dedication this week of the opening of the new clinic building and expansion of the hospital wing at the Cleveland Clinic Foundation. One of the largest ambulatory care facilities in the United States, the 12-story facility will help the foundation meet the increasing demand for outpatient services by providing additional space and centrally locating 16 of 28 clinical departments.

The Cleveland Clinic Foundation is located in my congressional district. It has a distinguished 64-year history of providing the highest quality care to patients throughout the region, the Nation, and the world. As a National Referral Center and International Health Resource, the Cleveland Clinic Foundation serves as a medical court of last resort. Extensive clinical experience enables foundation physicians to identify the most complex medical problems and define solutions.

The integration of clinic and hospital care with research and education in a private not-for-profit group practice distinguishes the foundation in American medicine. A staff of 377 physicians and more than 7,400 employees provides care in 39 specialties and 67 subspecialties. Six "centers of excellence" combine the diverse talent of foundation specialists for more efficient diagnosis and comprehensive treatment of patients. Centers of excellence have been established in cardiovascular diseases, cancer, neurosensory disorders, musculoskeletal disorders, digestive diseases, and urogenital and reproductive disorders.

Construction for the foundation's $72.2 million clinic building was started in 1981. The stable-looking pyramid structure was specifically designed for patient/visitor comfort and ease of orientation. Architects were Caesar Pelli (main designer) of Caesar Pelli and Associates of New Haven, CT; and Van Dijk, Johnson, and Partners (overseeing production of working drawings and construction), of Cleveland, OH. The construction manager was Gilbane Building Company of Providence, RI; and the interior design consultants were Interspace Inc. of Philadelphia, PA.

The construction for the foundation's $56.4 million new hospital wing started in August 1982 and is scheduled for completion in late fall. The new wing contains 449 beds, many of which will replace outdated substandard beds built in the late 1920's. It also includes 11 operating rooms and 5 intensive care units. The lower two floors were completed in June and are already serving as patient exam rooms and private offices for cardiology and thoracic and cardiovascular surgery physicians. The basement will serve as expanded outpatient areas for the departments of radiology and nuclear medicine.

A commitment to providing quality and cost-effective care in an environment supportive to patients' physical and emotional needs has led to this program of expansion and renovation of the foundation's facilities. With these new facilities, the Cleveland Clinic Foundation will enter the 21st century able to meet the health needs of today and prepared to meet the challenges of the future.

CRISIS IN THE TEXTILE INDUSTRY

HON. J. ALEX McMILLAN

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. MCMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, shortly before the August break, on July 15, 1985, I had the privilege of testifying before the Senate Finance Committee's Subcommittee on International Trade, regarding the serious situation facing the American textile industry.

Since returning to Washington after being at home among my constituents during the August break, I feel that this is a good time to call attention to my remarks before the Senate Finance Committee. We need to move here in the House on the textile bill as soon as possible. Each day we delay, means that more Americans will have lost their livelihood, casting a dark shadow on their future as well as the future of the United States.

The text of my remarks follows:

TESTIMONY OF THE HONORABLE J. ALEX MCMILLAN

Mr. Chairman, I represent the Ninth District of North Carolina. Charlotte is the center of my district and is basically a financial and service center for the economies of both North and South Carolina.

The textile and apparel industry in the Carolinas employs—at the end of last year—485,000 people, with an annual payroll in excess of $6 billion, despite losing 20,000 jobs to imports last year. That industry has withstood subsidized imports beginning with Japan decades ago, and today faces a renewed crisis from subsidized imports from relatively new entries in the game. It has responded over those years by making the surviving industry, the textile industry, the most modern and productive in the world.

Saturday night I was talking to a young friend of my son whose father is also one of my closest friends. This 22-year-old is a rising senior at North Carolina State University majoring in textile management. His father is Vice President of Sales at the most efficient yarn producer in the United States. His grandparents and great-grandparents were pioneers in the textile industry in America. And he asked me, "are we going to be able to save the textile industry in America? If not, I'd better look for something else".

That answer is in our hands. He and I know that the textile industry employs directly over 2 million Americans, that imports have grown at an average rate of 19 percent a year for the last four years—32 percent last year—and that we are likely to run a trade deficit this year of $150 billion and probably well over $16 billion of that will be in textiles. We also know that textiles play a vital role in the strategic industrial base of America, and that while our trade deficit equals almost 4 percent of gross national product—a year's worth of real growth in GNP—it is not counted as such, and that import-related job losses contribute heavily to high unemployment rates in this country. And textiles do not stand alone as a victim of trade subsidies. Over 100 major U.S. industries are adversely affected.

The fact of the matter is, the textile and apparel industries are so widespread, and rely on so many suppliers that almost every member of Congress has an interest in the industry's survival. In rural areas of West Texas and Montana, wool growers supply plants in North Carolina and New England. Machinery manufacturers in Massachusetts depend on a strong domestic textile industry. Chemicals produced in New Jersey and Illinois form the raw materials, along with cotton from California, Texas, and Mississippi, for mills on the Eastern Seaboard states. This is not a regional problem.

My young friend and most textile people I know emphatically believe in free and fair trade on a level playing field. The fact is, we don't have free or fair trade when our trading partners can subsidize exports to the United States through tax concessions, regulatory ease, low interest loans, direct subsidy, and sheer product targeting. We don't have free or fair trade when our trading partners restrict U.S. imports to their countries while exporting freely to the United States.

S. 680 and its companion bill H.R. 1562 are designed to restore and enforce the principles agreed to under the Multi-Fiber Agreement of 1981, negotiated in accord with the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. They provide ample opportunity for our trading partners to grow with the American market, yet provide a measure of order to the process so vital to our economy, our strategic industrial base and 2 million American jobs.

The Textile and Apparel Trade Enforcement Act of 1985 is an important, but only intermediate, remedy. If Americans truly believe in free and fair trade in the long run, and if our trading partners share their belief, then we had better provide an orderly process to get there. This bill provides one step, as will other legislation directed toward impacted industries. In the long run, in my judgment, we must consider broader legislation that first reaffirms our commitment to free, unrestrained trade but provides a mechanism to offset foreign subsidies. We expect our trading partners to do likewise and are willing to immediately remove such mechanisms when subsidies cease. The burden of proof must be on the exporter.

Moreover, we must insist that our markets be open only to those who will open theirs to our products.

Gentlemen, let's give at least equal weight to the hopes and aspirations of 2 million Americans and my young 22-year-old friend. And I urge you to give this bill your careful and favorable consideration.

H. LEW ZUCKERMAN "MAN OF THE CENTURY"

HON. HENRY A. WAXMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, today, September 10, 1985, one of the outstanding citizens of Los Angeles will be honored on the occasion of his 100th birthday. His name is H. Lew Zuckerman.

Mr. Zuckerman has been a civic, business and philanthropic leader in Los Angeles for more than 70 years. Arriving in the United States from Hungary in 1901 at the age of 15, he became one of the eager, hard-working, idealistic immigrants determined to pursue the American dream to the fullest.

Starting as a grocery boy, in quick succession, Lew tried his hand as an apprentice cigar maker, tailor and entrepreneur. Going west with his brother, Sam, Lew worked his way through St. Louis, Sioux City, and Mitchell, SD. In September 1906, Lew and Sam became U.S. citizens, sworn in by a circuit-riding judge in Nebraska. Finally, in 1907, Lew Zuckerman settled in Los Angeles. Not long after his arrival, he met and married Sadie Belle Goldberg, the daughter of one of the city's most prominent Jewish leaders. The wedding was covered in detail by the Los Angeles Times. The caption on the wedding picture read, "the first photograph of an Orthodox wedding."

Once in Los Angeles, Lew Zuckerman's instinct and talent for seizing the right opportunity became very apparent. The 18th amendment which forced the closure of his liquor business in 1917 was a turning point in Lew Zuckerman's life. He became a real estate developer whose innovative designs were landmarks and paved the way for the evolution of Los Angeles into the metropolis it is today.

As Lew's business prospered and with his experience and special insight into the lives of the people of Los Angeles, he became a civic leader as well. In 1929 he served on a grand jury that exposed corruption in the city. When the Great Depression struck, Lew suffered along with the rest of the country, losing his home and much of his business. Lew realized that homelessness was as great a problem as joblessness and that the ultimate recovery of the Nation would be delayed immeasurably by the loss of homes among the unemployed. In 1931, as a member of the board of realtors, he persuaded the State to impose a moratorium on foreclosures of homes. California became the first of 27 States to enact a moratorium and when Franklin Roosevelt became President, he, too, banned foreclosures in an effort to stimulate the Nation's recovery.

Perhaps H. Lew Zuckerman's most lasting legacy is his role in establishing the Jewish Homes for the Aging. Starting as a 15-room furnished house in the Boyle Heights section of Los Angeles, the Jewish Homes for the Aging, a nonprofit institution, now serves four counties. Over the years, JHA has provided a place of comfort, care, and dignity for more than 10,000 elderly perons. Lew Zuckerman is now one of the residents. On his walls are the plaques and photographs that attest to a lifetime of service and reward, of his constant fund-raising and philanthropic efforts on behalf of the Homes and other charitable organizations—and of his family, his wife, Sadie and sons, Ted and Marvin.

I ask the Members to join me in saluting H. Lew Zuckerman. He epitomizes the spirit of a generation of great Americans who were movers rather than spectators and whose efforts and caring made a difference in the lives of all of us.

BALANCE OF TRADE

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, our country is in the midst of an emergency involving our balance of trade. On September 7, 1985 our colleague JOHN P. MURTHA delivered a radio address on trade in response to President Reagan's weekly radio programs. I commend my colleagues' attention to Congressman MURTHA's excellent remarks.

BALANCE OF TRADE

I'm glad to hear that President Reagan is finally starting to pay attention to trade policies. Every time Congress threatens action we hear rhetoric from the Administration, but the trade deficit gets worse.

Some of the cases on which the President indicates he will act have already been under debate in international trade circles for two years. And as we wait for further details and shifting of the President's policies, we lose more American jobs and more American companies are forced to close down.

Missing from what the Administration has done to this point or what the President said today is the sense of urgency.

During August, the people talked to me about nothing but the budget deficit and America's disastrous trade imbalance. The people are not looking for future plans, or long cases in international commissions, or drawn out negotiations. Since January of this year, the United States has lost 220,000 jobs in manufacturing alone. The people want action.

The numbers telling how the trade and budget deficits have cost Americans jobs are increasingly familiar: we are a debtor trade nation for the first time since Woodrow Wilson was President; we have the largest U.S. trade deficit in history; we face another federal budget deficit of over $150 billion this year. And it's also familiar that Presidents like to blame Congress for these problems. But let's make it clear to America that one-half of the entire budget deficit, and our trade deficit, has resulted from actions of the last four years of the Reagan Administration.

Sometimes we become so used to repeating these numbers and arguments that we forget the misery they indicate. I want to take a moment to tell you what I heard from talking to people in Western Pennsylvania this summer:

Citizens can't understand why we refuse to get tough with our trading partners; they admire America for standing up to the communists with a strong defense—they can't understand why the Reagan Administration refuses to be equally tough on world trade. And neither can I understand it.

I spoke with many veterans of World War II and the Korean Conflict who told me they can't understand why they risked their lives fighting these countries, [returned to take jobs in our steel mills and manufacturing plants], only to see their jobs lost to the very countries they fought against.

Individuals spoke to me about their concerns that our State Department seems to worry more about Japan and Korea and Brazil and Taiwan than it does about Youngstown, Ohio, and Gary, Indiana, and Johnstown, Pennsylvania. They hear the talk about free trade, about respecting our trading partners, about the stability of foreign economies, but they can't understand why they hear nothing about attacking joblessness, or about rebuilding our deteriorating highway system, or about making sure clean drinking water and efficient sewage systems are available to every American.

The President has threatened to veto domestic programs which he says increase the budget deficit—but how about foreign aid which has increased by 69% since 1981. People want to see money spent in America to create jobs for Americans.

The American people are tired of seeing their jobs exported overseas; tired of seeing the Administration pay more attention to foreign governments' economic problems than to protecting American jobs.

It doesn't have to be that way. As Chairman of the House Steel Caucus, I introduced legislation to strictly limit imports of foreign steel. The Administration disagreed. We debated. We talked. In the end, we compromised, and worked together. The results were the voluntary steel import agreements negotiated by the Administration. Possibly, we're just starting to see results from some of those agreements. But behind it all was a spirit of working together for America that the American people understood.

But today most of us don't understand the President's trade policies. Take foreign shoes. They now account for 75% of the shoes sold in America. Since 1968, America has seen 500 shoe factories close and 120,000 American jobs lost. This summer the International Trade Commission—a group no one accuses of being protectionist—looked at those figures and recommended five years of import relief. This import relief would have still kept 50% of shoes sold in America for foreign producers. But the President flatly vetoed it, and said he would veto any trade limit legislation. That action speaks louder than any words on the President's Saturday radio address.

None of the explanations about the strength of the dollar, none of the economic rationale explains these actions. On the trade issue, it's time to stand up for America. It's time to tell our foreign trading partners that we demand fair treatment if they're to continue to have access to our markets.

Let's put Americans back to work.

PAT LAVELLA KEEPS 32-YEAR PROMISE

HON. JOSEPH M. GAYDOS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, when Patrick A. Lavella ran for the office of tax collector in Sewickley Township, PA, he promised to be a full-time official. It was a promise he kept for 32 years.

In all, Mr. Lavella has spent the major part of his 66 years serving the people of his area. As tax collector, of course, but also as an active member of any civic, social, or volunteer activity in the community that needed a helping hand.

It comes as no surprise to anyone, therefore, that 400 of his friends, neighbors, coworkers, and fellow citizens have seen fit to honor Mr. Lavella, who is retiring in December, with a testimonial dinner next month.

Graduated from Sewickley High School, Pat had entered the Army 3 months before World War II erupted. He was to spend the next 4 years and 4 months in uniform, including a 30-month tour of duty with the 28th Infantry Division in Europe. His return home marked the beginning of a new career—service to the community.

Pat helped organize the Herminie VFW Post 8427 and was its first commander. Naturally, he still is active, serving as the post's service officer for the past 20 years.

He was a charter member of the Herminie Lions Club Crabapple Lake project, president of the Sewickley Township Athletic Association, leader of the community's Bicentennial Celebration Committee, the radio voice for the Sewickley football team, an officer in the Herminie Slovenia Lodge, a member of the local Moose Lodge and of the parish council for St. Edward's Catholic Church. He is a life member of the Herminie Volunteer Fire Company and, of course, has held several offices in that organization.

Professionally, Pat has been president of the Westmoreland County Tax Collectors Association for 25 years, chairman of the county's Community College Authority, president of Sewickley Township Business & Civic Association, and auditor for the Son's of Labor Italian Club.

His retirement will give Pat time to spend with his bride of 3 years, Gertrude, and their family. It will, as he has already indicated, give him more time for his community work.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleagues in the Congress of the United States, I offer Pat Lavella our appreciation for his many years of unselfish service to people and our best wishes for a long and happy retirement.

A TRIBUTE TO THE EAST COBB ASTROS

HON. GEORGE (BUDDY) DARDEN

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to commend 14 young men who made it to—and won—a world series without resorting to a strike or demanding the high salaries which today seem to be the most important averages in the baseball world. They're the East Cobb Astros. They are the 1985 Pony League World Series Champions. I am proud to say they are from the Seventh District of Georgia.

These future major leaguers—ages 14 and older—exhibited sportsmanship and endurance in winning four straight games to take the title at Washington, PA, on August 22, 1985. During their climb to the pinnacle of Pony League play, the Astros courageously regrouped after a devastating loss in the Southern Zone Tournament and went on to win three straight games and advance to the world series. They finished with a season record of 56 wins against only 5 losses; in tournament play, they won 15 and lost only that 1 game in the zone tournament.

I note with interest that six of Manager Guerry Baldwin's players, during their younger days, played key roles on another Seventh District championship team—the East Marietta All-Stars, winners of the 1983 Little League World Series. Now, if we can just wait a few more years, maybe they'll be ready to straighten things out at the major league level in Atlanta.

I hope you will join me in congratulating the East Cobb Astros' manager, Guerry Baldwin, Coach John Mullen, Business Manager Tom Polland, Treasurer Ken Olmsted and Team Parents Sharon and Russ Umphenour, but most of all the players—second baseman Adam Olmsted, left fielder Rob Doherty, shortstop Brett Kinard, left fielder John Adkins, right fielder-pitcher Mike Hilton, third baseman-outfielder Joseph Hutchinson, second baseman-pitcher Erik Smith, catcher-outfielder Mike Langley, outfielder-pitcher Billy Harris, first baseman Rusty Umphenour, outfielder-pitcher David Osada, third baseman-pitcher Ted Ward, catcher Steve Kwon and pitcher-outfielder Mark Pisciotta.

INCREASE OF IMPORTED URANIUM DETRIMENTAL TO DOMESTIC INDUSTRY

HON. MANUEL LUJAN, JR.

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Speaker, the uranium mining and milling industry is at its lowest level in history. Employment in the U.S. uranium industry has dropped from more than 20,000 employees in 1980 to less than 2,000 in 1985. Domestic U_3O_8 production has dropped from more than 40 million pounds per year to about 10 million pounds in 1985. The domestic mining industry, which a few years ago produced one-half the free world's uranium requirements, will in 1985 provide less than one-quarter of U.S. needs. Only about 5 of the 26 uranium mills in the United States are currently operating—at reduced capacity—and one of those five mills is scheduled to be put on standby shortly.

In my view, a substantial cause of the distress lies in the increase of imported uranium from foreign countries, particularly South Africa, Australia, and Canada. Something must be done to address this problem and revive the U.S. domestic industry. Accordingly, I am introducing a bill that would preserve the current statutory authority of the NRC to license the importation of uranium, but require as a precondition to any such license that the Commerce Department certify that any individual importation of source material, and specifically nuclear material, will not further damage our domestic industry. My bill would require that the NRC establish procedures to require importers of source material to apply for import licenses, and to give the public notice of any such application. Further, my bill would permit interested parties to comment on any application for import license and would afford an opportunity for interested parties to be heard prior to any determination by the NRC to issue or deny such licenses. Finally, my bill would direct the Commerce Department to establish procedures for conducting an assessment of the effect of any such importation of source material on the viability of the domestic uranium industry on a case-by-case basis.

We have permitted for too long the untrammeled importation of source material into this country to the significant detriment of the domestic industry. I can speak personally to this matter in light of the dramatic impact on the citizens of New Mexico. I would hope and trust that my colleagues would join me in this effort to save an industry vital to our national security.

COMET ENCOUNTER

HON. WYCHE FOWLER, JR.

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, on October 8–10, 1985, the congressional space caucus is sponsoring a conference on the future of space science. Many prominent scientists in the field of space science have accepted the invitation of the caucus to address Members and staff on their various disciplines. I will shortly be sending out a "Dear Colleague" letter advising each of you of the place, times, and subjects for discussion. One topic to be examined is the enigmatic comet, now often in the news due to the return after 76 years of the famed Halley's Comet in 1986.

On September 11, 1985, a full 6 months before the Soviet, Japanese, and European rendevous with Halley's Comet, an American spacecraft will pass through the tail of Comet Giacobini-Zinner for the first space probe/comet encounter in history. The spacecraft was launched in 1978 to study the Sun; it came to rest in an area where the gravitational pull from the Earth and the Sun is equal. It remained suspended in that area, providing data on solar disturbances and phenomena. When the decision was made not to launch a dedicated Halley's Comet mission, NASA turned its attention to the future of the International Sun and Earth Explorer as it was then known. In 1982, the space agency redirected this spacecraft toward Comet Giacobini-Zinner in a series of hair-precision maneuvers using the Moon's gravitational pull as a slingshot, whipping the spacecraft out toward the comet. Giacobini-Zinner, discovered in 1900, is a short period comet of 6.4 years, orbiting the Sun in an elliptical path; since its discovery the comet has appeared 12 times. In January 1984 the spacecraft rounded the Moon and headed out for its comet encounter; since that time the mission has been renamed International Cometary Explorer [ICE]

Why do comets hold such fascination for us; could it be that these celestial primordial bodies hold the secrets to the creation of the universe; that they are the records of the beginning? One of the greatest drives behind our scientific exploration of the solar system is our curiosity about how the whole system came into being. How did a vast whirling cloud of dust and gas give birth to our Sun, the planets around it, and life on Earth?

In order to understand the origin and evolution of our solar system, we have to unravel the relationships between the great variety of objects that orbit around the Sun—planets, moons, asteroids, comets, and tiny bits of cosmic dust. So far, we have only a few incomplete theories. Some of the moons of Mars and Jupiter may be captured asteroids. Some asteroids may be the rocky relics of burned-out comets. Meteorites may be broken pieces of asteroids. Some of the cosmic dust may be finely ground remains of asteroids and meteorites, and some of it may have come from comet tails. The exploration of comets is a search for our very beginnings. Comets are believed to be the most pristine and unaltered samples of the early solar system. Because planets—even ones as small as Earth's Moon—are changed by melting volcanism, meteorite impact, and the formation of planetary crusts and metal cores, we do not think that the earliest records of the solar system can ever be found on them. Even some of the asteroids, small leftover bodies between Mars and Jupiter that never formed into a large planet, show evidence of melting and other changes—although some asteroids may be potential sources of unaltered samples.

While there have been many ground-based observations, we still have more questions than answers about what comets are and where they come from. More than 20 years after the beginning of the space age, space scientists are starting to study these puzzling objects at close range with spacecraft. As already mentioned, in September 1985, the International Cometary Explorer [ICE] will fly through the tail of Comet Giacobini-Zinner to give us our first closeup data about what comets are like. Early in 1986, a fleet of spacecraft—European, Russian, and Japanese—will fly past Comet Halley. Also in 1986, the Galileo spacecraft, on its way to an orbit around Jupiter, may fly past an asteroid named Amphitrite.

All these spacecraft will gather new and important data, even though their speed will carry them past their targets in only a few hours. These quick glimpses may lay the basis for more detailed examinations—actual rendezvous in which the spacecraft can meet the comet and stay with it, making observations for periods of months or perhaps years.

Mark your calendars for October 8–10 to explore with the space caucus the phenomena of comets and other mysteries of the cosmos.

COMMUNITY CHILD WATCH WEEK

HON. PAUL B. HENRY

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to recognize the week of September 22–28 as "Community Child Watch Week" in the State of Michigan.

I am very proud of the work of the residents of Grand Rapids, as well as the State of Michigan, in their efforts of creating and maintaining an excellent and much needed community service, that of a Community Child Watch Program. Children are indeed our Nation's greatest resource and it is our responsibility to ensure they have a safe environment to grow up in.

Community Child Watch began 6 years ago, as a response to the need for increased child protection while children are away from home. Since the program began, police departments, school systems, and community agencies have worked together in training volunteers to watch for and report potentially dangerous situations. This program is now in existence in over 40 communities and 18 counties throughout Michigan. In addition, similar programs operate in six other States as well as in Canada.

I would also like to honor the many individuals who have so willingly served as volunteers. It is through their active involvement and caring that Community Child Watch continues to achieve the high standards it has set for itself.

Any interested person over the age of 18 can be a volunteer. After completing the required training session, each volunteer then receives a poster to be placed in the window of his or her home. The purpose of this window poster is to alert children who they can safely contact should they need emergency care.

This program has made tremendous contributions in the past years to the Grand Rapids community, both in teaching children the importance of taking adequate precautionary measures as well as making great strides in preventing crime.

I would ask that all Members of the House of Representatives join me in thanking the volunteers of Community Child Watch for their dedication and deep commitment to this worthy cause, and wish this important community service much success in its future work.

Thank you.

HEALTH CARE ACT

HON. RICHARD A. GEPHARDT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to introduce today with my colleague HENSON MOORE the National Council on Access to Health Care Act.

In a society characterized by rapid change, the American health-care field is changing especially rapidly. Daily we hear of dramatic advances in procedures and technology. We are making significant changes in the financing and delivery of health-care services. We have worked hard to control health-care costs—and we have made encouraging progress. Our health-care system remains the best in the world. But it can be better; much remains to be done.

We must continue the moderation of health-care costs.

We must continue to expand the options for health-care consumers.

We must at the same time maintain and improve the quality of health care.

Just as important, we must maintain and improve access to health care. We certainly do not want a cost-effective health-care delivery system that delivers mediocre care or that fails to provide care for people who need it.

Finally, we need to take stock of where we are and where we're going in the health-care field. We have to find out what has changed since the introduction of DRG's. There are a lot of good, potentially helpful data out there waiting to be collected and reflected on. For the past few years we in Congress have been reacting to a crisis in health-care costs. I would like to see us stop doing crisis legislation and take a more considered, long-term overview.

The Council that we propose would meet these needs. I leave it to my colleagues to discuss the details of the proposal. I will simply say that it would start a national discussion of the long-term goals, priorities, and problems we face in the health-care field, a discussion that can only strengthen our health-care delivery system and make it one that serves all Americans in the best way possible.

A TRIBUTE TO CONCORD, MA, ON THE 350TH ANNIVERSARY OF ITS FOUNDING

HON. CHESTER G. ATKINS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Speaker, to pay tribute to the town of Concord is no small task. Its contribution to our country and to our world has been extraordinary. Much has been written about Concord's illustrious history, but I should like to mention a few of the qualities which contributed to that greatness, as we mark this 350th birthday.

Concord is known as the home of the Old North Bridge, where on April 19, 1775, "the shot heard 'round the world" roused the colonists to turn back the British soldiers in a battle which began the American Revolution, and eventually led to the founding of America as a new nation. The principles of freedom, justice, and equality run deep in Concord's life to this day. Concordians can be justly proud of that dramatic event.

Concord began 140 years before that famous struggle. We commemorate September 12, 1635 when Simon Willard and the Reverend Peter Bulkely led the way for the settlement of Concord in that place originally known as Musketaquid. The name, Concord, is as much a tribute to the peace treaty which began this first settlement above tidewater, as it is to the area's fields, rivers, and woodlands.

As Concord grew, religion and agriculture were a great part of the community's life. Preserving the right to every citizen to take part in town affairs was also paramount. It is a tribute to participatory democracy that to this day, the open town meeting still governs the town. As population in Concord became more diverse, tensions grew, but Concord has never found its will wanting when it found itself at odds with its basic principles of preserving dignity for all. This climate for freedom, community involvement, and love for the land nurtured all its citizens and became Concord's hallmark. Many famous men and women flourished in this atmosphere.

In the 19th century, the thought-provoking writings of Ralph Waldo Emerson, Henry David Thoreau, Nathaniel Hawthorne, Louisa May Alcott, and Margaret Sidney reached people in all walks of life and every country. Agriculture found a leader in Ephraim Bull who perfected the Concord grape. Bronson Alcott, Elizabeth Peabody, and Frank Sanborn made far-reaching contributions to education. Ebenezer Rockwood Hoar became U.S. Attorney General, and his brother George Frisbee Hoar became a U.S. Senator. While still a young man, Daniel French created the Minute Man Statue which marks the site where colonial minutemen stood their ground at the Old North Bridge. His statue of Abraham Lincoln graces the Lincoln Memorial in Washington, DC. These are but a few of the people who lived in Concord, and through their work, spoke of the world.

In 20th century Concord, there were many leaders, some of whom may leave as indelible a mark on the world as did the 19th century greats.

From the beginning, Concord's strength has been with the people. The 350th anniversary celebration reflects that strength, vitality, and community spirit. Religious observances, citizen breakfasts, luncheons and suppers, a parade with home folks depicting Concord's history, a play, music ceremonies, a ball, flags, and a town gift make everyone feel that they are a part of this special occasion.

The two bustling business centers, civic and religious institutions, and all types of homes speak to the confidence with which people view the present. A walk through the fields and by the streams gives a feeling of quiet appreciation for the land. Attending the numerous forums, events, and meetings gives me the certainty that democracy is thriving in every part of town.

It is with great pleasure that I congratulate Concord at this remarkable time. The 350th anniversary is not only a tribute to longevity, it is a tribute to the spirit of the people.

"Concord is celebrating its 350 years by acknowledging its heritage and anticipating its future," a young Concordian, Trisa Lang, said.

May Concord's future be as illustrious as its past.

MAKING CLOSED CAPTIONED EQUIPMENT MORE AFFORDABLE FOR THE DEAF

HON. C.W. BILL YOUNG

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Speaker, television has become an important source of news, information, and entertainment for the American people, as we can watch events unfold live from anywhere in the world.

For our Nation's 16 million deaf and hearing impaired individuals, however, television is just a picture without sound. With advancing technology, the networks are now able to add words to the pictures the deaf see on television. This process, known as closed captioning, has enabled thousands of Americans to fully experience the immediacy of television.

Through hearings of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Education on which I serve, I have followed the federally funded research to expand and improve closed captioning capability. Major breakthroughs are improving the quality of this service and reducing the cost to those who purchase the equipment.

While the technology exists to open the important medium of television to the deaf, closed captioned equipment is still too expensive for many families of deaf individuals to afford. Medical and educational costs place a serious economic burden on the deaf, and little money is left available for items such as closed captioned decoders.

To enable the deaf to better afford this equipment, I have cosponsored H.R. 2853, legislation which would amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide an income tax credit for expenses incurred by an individual for the purchase of closed captioned equipment.

Although closed captioned technology has been available and in use by the networks for more than 5 years, fewer than 100,000 units are now actively serving only a small proportion of the hard-of-hearing population.

Let's open this important source of communication to the deaf so that they can more easily participate in, enjoy and understand the daily events affecting their lives and the lives of all Americans. Our research and technological advances in this field are of little use if the majority of deaf Americans cannot afford to make use of closed captioned equipment.

CHIEF SOURISSEAU RECEIVES LAW ENFORCEMENT'S HIGHEST AWARD

HON. MATTHEW G. MARTINEZ

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Speaker, on May 17, 1985, Chief Leslie D. Sourisseau of the Montebello Police Department was honored with the Outstanding California Peace Officer's Award. This award is presented to one California peace officer each year for a demonstrated service that has significantly advanced professional law enforcement through overall career achievement. Les Sourisseau has selflessly served the Montebello community for over two decades and his law enforcement career is worthy of the accolades recently afforded it. Les was born, raised, and educated in Los Angeles County. Following 4 years in the U.S. Navy he became a police officer with the city of Montebello in January 1961. He subsequently served in all levels of his department and was appointed chief of police in February 1972.

Les was not content to simply put in his hours: He actively sought to improve the quality of law enforcement in his department and throughout the State of California. His leadership of the law and legislative committee of the California Peace Officer's Association for a number of years and his ability to establish the law and legislative committee of the California Police Chief's Association as a viable voice in Sacramento has placed both organizations in high regard by both State legislators and the executive branch of State government. His commitment to bringing the problem of alcoholism in law enforcement to the attention of the law enforcement community has also been commendable. The last few years he has focused much of his energies on the importance of establishing Employee Assistance Programs to combat the problem of alcoholism, and was responsible for the formation of the California Peace Officers Association's Employee Assistance Programs Committee.

The Outstanding California Peace Officer Award is not a meritorious award given for a few moments of bravery or for any other fleeting contribution: But rather, this award is bestowed on one who has made a major, long-term contribution to professional law enforcement. Such a contribution has been made by Chief Les Sourisseau, his influence on law enforcement in the area I represent will be long felt, and I am pleased to honor him in the U.S. House of Representatives.

TRIBUTE TO WILLIAM KOENEMUND

HON. ROBERT G. TORRICELLI

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. TORRICELLI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to a brave and courageous firefighter, William Koenemund of Secaucus, NJ, who died recently in a tragic fire in Passaic, NJ, on Labor Day.

William Koenemund gave his life so that others, helpless victims of a deadly and costly blaze, could live. In the true spirit of the caring and selfless public servant, William Koenemund disregarded his safety in order to safeguard the lives of other innocent people.

It is sad, in times like these, how little we can truly say or do to pay full tribute to individuals, like William Koenemund and other public servants, who through their sacrifice and selfless deeds protect us, our families, and our communities from harm.

It was once said, "Every one of us is given the gift of life, and what a strange gift it is. If it is preserved jealously and selfishly, it impoverishes and saddens. But if it is spent for others, it enriches and beautifies."

William Koenemund gave his life to protect his community. He, and his courageous actions will not soon be forgotten by those who knew him, those who loved him, and those, today, who live because of him.

I ask my colleagues to join with me today in paying tribute to a brave and selfless man, William Koenemund, and to share in the grief and sorrow of his wonderful family.

MEMORIES OF CAMP KAUFMAN

HON. ROY DYSON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. DYSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call to the attention of my colleagues the end of a Calvert County, MD, institution: Camp Kaufman. Established in 1953 by Cecil and Joel Kaufman, the camp provided a generation of Washington area youngsters with a welcome respite from life in the big city.

Since shortly after its inception, Camp Kaufman had the good fortune of being run by the late Phil Fox and his wife, Sis. Phil and Sis were truly devoted to their 9- to 14-year-old charges, blending just the right mix of compassion and discipline.

Earlier this month, Anne Groer, a proud alumnus of Camp Kaufman who is now a White House correspondent, wrote of her summer sojourns to this peaceful spot along the Chesepeake Bay. Anne artfully recalls pleasures as diverse as roaming the beach between Breezy Point and Scientists Cliff in search of sharks' teeth and mastering lanyard making in a trice.

With the closing of Camp Kaufman, there is of course a sense of sadness, but also fond memories for their dedicated group of former counselors and campers who gave special meaning to being a Kaufmannite. I believe I speak for many of my fellow Marylanders in offering these few words of praise to those who contributed to making Camp Kaufman a wellspring of growth and knowledge for so many.

DANGEROUS MARTIAL ARTS WEAPONS

HON. OLYMPIA J. SNOWE

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill, along with 10 of my colleagues, which would provide the U.S. Postal Service with explicit authority to stop mail order sales of dangerous martial arts weapons to States in which it is illegal to manufacture, sell, carry, or possess such weapons.

In the past few years, Ninja warriors, 16th century Japanese assassins, have been the subject of many motion pictures and television programs. The Ninja warriors used several kinds of dangerous martial arts weapons that were intended to maim and kill. Unfortunately, the current media attention has resulted in the growing popularity of these weapons among school-aged children. According to the Consumer Product Safety Commission, in the last 5 years over 100,000 injuries relating to martial arts weapons have been treated in hospital emergency rooms, with young people between the ages of 5 and 24 accounting for over 60 percent of these injuries.

This bill would add three types of martial arts weapons to the list of dangerous nonmailable items in the United States Code, title 18, section 1716. The specific weapons are nunchuku or kung fu sticks, shuriken or throwing stars, and manrikigusari or fighting chains. Although these weapons are sometimes used in legitimate, supervised martial arts activities, the incidence of criminal and violent use by youth gangs and others has risen dramatically.

Some States have sought to remedy this situation by enacting laws to regulate dangerous martial arts weapons. However, these attempts to control the sale of dangerous martial arts weapons are frustrated by their ready availability through mail order sales, sometimes for as low a price as $10. This legislation would amend existing postal regulations to ban mail order sales to States which outlaw or regulate the use of dangerous martial arts weapons. However, mail order sales to States that do not have any applicable laws would be allowed, as would the mailing of these weapons to the military or other Government agencies. In addition, the bill does not apply to any knife, sword, or ceremonial or collector weapon that is otherwise mailable under this section of the United States Code.

This legislation would involve a modest but important revision of existing law that will reduce the availability of these dangerous weapons to unsupervised children, youth gangs, and criminals, without inhibiting legitimate martial arts or other sports or hobbies. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this measure.

NASA—SPACE INDUSTRIES

HON. MICHAEL A. ANDREWS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, outer space offers tremendous economic opportunities for American enterprise. An outstanding example of such enterprise has just recently begun. I am speaking of the recent agreement between Space Industries, Inc. and NASA for the production and launch of a space minifactory. The factory will be launched in the shuttle, be tended by man, and offer a facility for the pursuit of commercial opportunities in space.

Projected for launch in 1989, this privately developed space factory, called the Industrial Space Facility, represents a significant stride toward the industrial utilization of space and will further accelerate our Nation's drive toward space commercialization. The agreement, vigorously pursued by Space Industries, a Houston company at the cutting edge of space development, will translate into strong economic growth and further diversification for the Houston area. I applaud both Space Industries and NASA for this important agreement.

THE ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF MS. AGNES "GUSH" VALENTA OF NORTHAMPTON, MA

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to share with my colleagues the outstanding accomplishments of one of my constituents. It is always a pleasure for me to honor such a dedicated person. Ms. Agnes "Gush" Valenta has given much of herself to improve girls' athletics in the town of Northampton, MA. On September 15, 1985, Ms. Valenta's devotion will be honored at the dedication of "Gush Park" [Sheldon Field] in her hometown.

Growing up in Northampton, Ms. Valenta and her close friend, Ms. Mary Ellen Godfrey, were not accepted into the boy's athletic league. In 1969, Ms. Valenta and Ms. Godfrey petitioned the city's recreational commission for a girls' softball league. The commission gave them Sheldon Field, a few balls, and its good graces. Since then, the girls' softball league, known as the Lassie League, has provided over 1,000 girls with an athletic outlet. Over the period since its inception, the Lassie League has been divided into three leagues, the Lassiette League for girls 10 to 12, the Lassie League for girls 13 to 15 years of age, and the Senior Lassie League for girls under 18 years old.

Under Ms. Valenta's supervision, the league has flourished more than any other local league. Each player receives a brand-new uniform as well as the honor of playing in a league started by the pioneer of organized women's athletics in Hampton County. In addition to coaching a team every year, Ms. Valenta is responsible for scheduling games, settling disputes, raising money, finding sponsors, and many other jobs that make the league a continued success.

The Senior Lassie League has won national acclaim by participating in national tournaments around the country. The Lassie League all-stars have received statewide fame in the State tournaments in which they have competed in every year since the event began in 1973.

Ms. Valenta has been employed by the city of Northampton in the recreation department for the last 10 years. She is respected by all of her coworkers as the single most important woman in girls' athletics in the town. Since the 1960's, she has been fighting for the acceptance of women's sports. Ms. Valenta is truly a brave woman dedicated to the promotion of equality.

Mr. Speaker, it has been my pleasure to honor Ms. Agnes "Gush" Valenta, a selfless and dedicated citizen.

JERRY FALWELL: CHAMPION OF APARTHEID?

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to express my shock and dismay about the recent defense of apartheid by Rev. Jerry Falwell.

Mr. Falwell visited South Africa on a supposed factfinding mission, and returned convinced more than ever of the need for a strong white-ruled government. His rationale is that Pretoria has made progress in its race relations, and is a bulwark of democracy against Marxist totalitarianism. He is absolutely wrong on both counts.

South Africa has made absolutely no concessions of power, and is not likely to do so, this according to President Pieter Botha. His recent speech, hyped as a turning point in race relations, was a scathing attack against reform. Botha defended racial repression and any endorsement of Botha is an endorsement of that repression. Mr. Falwell claims to support progress in South Africa. What he is in reality supporting is a repugnant dictatorship.

Democracy does not exist in South Africa in any way, shape, or form. The specter of a Communist bogeyman pulling the strings of protest is simply bad propaganda. The thousands who mourn the dead are everyday people, not Marxist cadres. Jerry Falwell and others who buy Pretoria's line are misleading themselves.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the United States will be spared further embarrassment by the good reverend. As a roving ambassador, he is doing more harm than good.

DOUBLE CELEBRATION

HON. SANDER M. LEVIN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, it is a very special event indeed that I share today with our colleagues. Two constituents of mine are celebrating not only their golden wedding anniversary, but 50 years of service to their church and community.

In 1935, the Very Reverend George Nicoloff and his bride, the former Vera Booneff, immigrated to the United States from Yugoslavia. They came in response to the need for a clergyman to serve the many Macedonian and Bulgarian immigrants of the Eastern Orthodox faith who had settled into the Midwest. The Nicoloffs answered the call and for half a century have dedicated their lives to the same principles and beliefs that led them to New York's harbor so many years ago.

On September 29, the Nicoloffs, their four children, seven grandchildren, other family members, parishioners and friends will observe this special, dual anniversary. On behalf of the residents of the 17th District of Michigan who have benefited from their commitment to each other and to their community, I offer our thanks and most sincere best wishes for continued health and happiness.

JOSEPH YOUNG: A PIONEER

HON. DON RITTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, the Lehigh Valley in Pennsylvania has just lost a notable man. Joseph Samuel Young died last month at age 87.

The second generation of his family to serve as president of Lehigh Portland

Cement Co., Mr. Young helped the Allentown-based firm grow from a local concern to a major national industrial force. At one time, Lehigh Portland was the fourth largest cement manufacturer, accounting for 12 percent of U.S. production.

By the time Mr. Young turned the presidency over to his son, William Young, shareholder's equity had grown by about 150 percent through reinvestment of earnings. And the gross plant investment had swelled from $47 million in 1932 to $230 million 31 years later.

Mr. Young, a graduate of Princeton University and Columbia University Law School, also was active in civic affairs. At the outbreak of World War I, he enlisted in the Pennsylvania National Guard where he served as a noncommissioned officer and machinegun instructor at officers' training school. During World War II, he was chairman of the War Production Board for central-eastern Pennsylvania and a member of the Cement Industry Advisory Committee of the War Production Board. He helped organize war loan drives.

He was a member of Allentown's Planning Commission, an adviser to Community Chest, a supporter of the Boy Scouts—who honored him with their Silver Beaver Award—and a pillar at First Presbyterian Church, Allentown. In 1956, he received an honorary doctor of laws degree from Muhlenberg College.

Joseph Young was a pioneer who helped build the Lehigh Valley and America. Yet even with all his achievements, he remained humble and kind. I, like others who knew him, will miss him. He will be remembered in our hearts as well as in our histories.

LONG ISLAND'S UNITED WAY CELEBRATES 20 YEARS OF HELP AND CARING

HON. THOMAS J. DOWNEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. DOWNEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, on September 19, 1985, the United Way of Long Island will celebrate its 20th anniversary. I would like to take this opportunity to personally congratulate the entire Long Island United Way staff, and reflect for a moment on what the United Way has meant to the Long Island community over the last 20 years.

In 1965, when the United Way first came to Long Island, its funds were provided to 44 volunteer agencies and hospitals. Today, the number of community groups and hospitals that benefit from United Way assistance has almost tripled. In the last 4 years alone, the number of Long Islanders who actually receive help through United Way affiliated agencies has risen by 220,000. In 1985, almost 900,000 needy people were helped by the United Way. I know what that kind of help has meant to the Second Congressional District which I represent, and I want to express my deepest thanks.

I could not speak of the United Way of Long Island without also mentioning its massive network of volunteers. On Long Island alone, there are almost 300,000 volunteers working with or through the United Way. These people, too, deserve our greatest admiration and thanks.

In closing, let me once again offer my congratulations and gratitude. The United Way of Long Island has truly helped to make the Long Island community a caring community.

TRIBUTE TO FRANK MOLINARE

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, on September 23, friends, relatives, and coworkers will come together to honor Frank Molinare of Malden, MA. Frank is retiring from a distinguished career of over 37 years with the U.S. Postal Service. I am pleased to be able to bring to the attention of the U.S. Congress the accomplishments of this exemplary gentleman.

Mr. Molinare began working for the Postal Service as a clerk and was eventually promoted to manager. Over the years he was responsible for the operation of post offices, in South Boston, Malden/Melrose, and Arlington. For a period of time, he was acting area manager of a postal region encompassing 50 offices.

I commend Frank for his years of commitment to so many communities. His numerous awards and letters of commendation can attest to his dedication to the Postal Service. In 1984, Frank received an award from the U.S. Treasury for selling the most U.S. savings bonds in the Boston area. He also served as Boston area coordinator for the Savings Bond Program.

I know that my colleagues join with me in extending my warmest wishes to Frank Molinare and his family on the occasion of his retirement from Government service. His record of accomplishment serves as an example for all us.

A DESERVING HERO IS AWARDED

HON. ROY DYSON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. DYSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Mr. Henry F. Comegys, Sr. of Centerville, MD. Almost a year ago to the day, Mr. Comegys risked his life while rescuing another from a burning truck. In recognition of this act of bravery, Mr. Comegys was awarded a medal by the Carnegie Hero Fund Commission.

I believe it is altogether fitting to retell this heroic story. Following a fiery highway accident involving another truck and a car, the driver of the pickup, Carl Vaughn, was pinned inside the cab of his dump truck. Having witnessed the accident, Henry Comegys ran into the narrow space between the vehicles, both of which were burning, and climbed into the truck's cab, dislodging Vaughn and dragging him to safety. Mr. Vaughn recovered from first- and second-degree burns and other serious injuries, and Mr. Comegys from lesser burns.

It is a rare individual who risks his own life for that of another. Mr. Comegys' courageous and swift conduct in the face of crisis is a source of great pride for many in Maryland's First Congressional District. It is with honor and I extend my sincere congratulations to this most exemplary individual, Mr. Henry F. Comegy's, Sr.

RAILROAD SAFETY

HON. TOMMY ROBINSON

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I support H.R. 2372 because this spending is both within budget and clearly cost effective.

In 1984, there were 74 derailments in Arkansas and 12 of these involved hazardous materials. Fortunately only one of these dozen accidents resulted in the release of hazardous material.

What is important to note in these figures is that they are typical of the accident records of the country as a whole. Rail safety must be coordinated by a central organization and H.R. 2372 does this in a fiscally responsible way. Arkansas relies completely on Federal inspectors and there is just one assigned to my State on a full-time basis and two additional inspectors are shared with Louisiana.

I want to salute the work of the Energy and Commerce Committee and the Subcommittee on Transportation and Tourism. They have done an excellent job in an area vital to the economic development of my district and the country.

CONGRATULATIONS OF EAGLE SCOUT DANIEL J. JANUSESKI

HON. BERNARD J. DWYER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1985

Mr. DWYER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to bring to your attention the elevation of Daniel J. Januseski of my district to the rank of Eagle Scout.

Less than 1 percent of all boys in America achieve the rank of Eagle Scout. This high honor can only be attained if a Scout demonstrates strong leadership abilities. Daniel, a resident of Edison, and a member of Troop 318, has proven that he has the ability to become an Eagle Scout. To complete his Eagle Scout project, Daniel organized 20 of his fellow Scouts to clean up Hi-Wood Park in Edison. The park was in a state of disrepair, with fallen trees, debris covered sewers, and litter covering much of the area. Daniel and his comrades worked 3 days to remove the trees, clean up all the litter, open the sewers, and construct a baseball diamond for neighborhood games and Little League practice.

I ask you to all join me in commending Daniel in the exceptional honor of becoming an Eagle Scout.

SENATE—Wednesday, September 11, 1985

(Legislative day of Monday, September 9, 1985)

The Senate met at 12 noon, on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

God of good news, it is impossible for us, public servants, press and media, and the people to imagine what it would be like to be without any news for a protracted period—no newspapers—no television—no magazines—no news! With all our criticism of press and media, we know we could not long function without them. In light of this crucial dependency, give us a fresh appreciation of the necessity for integrity. Help all of us to realize there is no substitute for truth—that lies destroy—and that half-truths, if anything, are more destructive.

Gracious God, bless the men and women of the press and media. Thank You for their hard work—their courage—their sacrifices—and the risks often taken in the line of duty. Strengthen the relationship between Senate and press. We know the press best serves the Senate by serving the people and would repudiate its purpose if it became propaganda. But may the adversarial relationship be professional and not personal, so that in appreciating each other, Senate and press may best serve the Nation. In His name Who is Truth. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE ACTING MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished acting majority leader is recognized.

THE CHAPLAIN'S PRAYER

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I thank our remarkable Chaplain. He is such an extraordinary person, encapsulating the things that confront us and doing it in a way that is so understandable and so very appropriate. I thank him.

As usual, it was exciting to contemplate there for a minute that we would have no news at all for several days. I was excited about that. Of course, I realize that we do not function, we cannot function, without the news.

I always remember what our good librarian, Daniel Boorstin, the Librarian of the Library of Congress, said to us. He said, "We are surfeited with information in this country. What we lack is knowledge."

I think there is a great deal of truth in that. We are full of information, but sometimes in the glut of information we do not have time to process it and use our good brains and commonsense.

SCHEDULE

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, the two leaders under the standing order have 10 minutes each. There is a special order in favor of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] for not to exceed 15 minutes. Then we will have routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 1 p.m., with statements limited therein to 5 minutes each.

Mr. President, following routine morning business, the Senate will resume the motion to proceed to S. 1200, the immigration bill. Rollcall votes can be expected.

At 2:30 p.m., by unanimous consent, the Senate will vote on cloture on the anti-apartheid conference report, with the live quorum having been waived. Therefore, rollcall votes can be expected throughout today's session.

With that, Mr. President, I would reserve the remainder of my time and yield to the distinguished Democratic leader at this time.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Democratic leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the Chair, the distinguished President pro tempore of the Senate, and also the distinguished majority whip.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, we await the presence of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE]. Until he arrives in the Chamber, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUMPHREY). Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

UNITED STATES SHOULD ACCEPT GORBACHEV CHALLENGE AND NEGOTIATE A COMPREHENSIVE TEST BAN

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, how about the Gorbachev proposal to declare a unilateral 5-month Soviet cessation of nuclear weapons testing, that began last August 6? How about Mr. Gorbachev urging the United States to join the Soviet Union during this moratorium in negotiating an agreement to end all nuclear weapons testing? Was this just a Soviet propaganda ploy? The President turned the invitation down. Most American newspapers ignored it. The few that discussed this Gorbachev initiative dismissed it as Soviet posturing. On August 7, one of the few positive reactions to this Russian initiative appeared in an article written by retired Adm. Eugene Carroll in the New York Times. Admiral Carroll welcomed the Gorbachev proposal profusely. He declared, "Moscow's firm commitment to halt all nuclear tests from August 6, 1985, to January 1, 1986, even if America continues an active nuclear program, is the only significant arms control development since SALT II was signed 6 years ago."

The admiral concludes his article by saying the Gorbachev proposal "may be the most important arms control development of the decade." Admiral Carroll may have overstated the case for Gorbachev's moratorium. On the other hand, what was the most significant arms control development of the 1960's? My nomination is the very similar initiative taken by President John Kennedy when he announced an almost identical unilateral moratorium on nuclear weapons testing in the atmosphere, underwater or in outerspace and challenged the Soviet Union to join the moratorium and negotiate an end to all above-ground nuclear testing. That Kennedy proposal led to the 1963 Limited Test Ban Treaty. That treaty did not stop the arms race but it did end the serious threat to human health from the radioactive fallout that was increasingly polluting the environment as a byproduct of above-ground nuclear weapons testing.

That treaty also pledged—that is, promised—that both superpowers would continue to negotiate to end all nuclear weapons testing. Twenty-two years ago this country made that solemn pledge. Now our adversary is challenging us to keep that promise. The Soviets have announced that they will not test nuclear weapons at all for the rest of this year and they have asked the United States to negotiate a mutual permanent end to all nuclear weapons testing. Is this a serious and significant proposal? If not—why not? Why should we refuse? What do we have to lose?

Mr. President, there are two prime reasons given for refusing. Both of them are wrong. The first and most easily accepted argument is that the Soviets would cheat. This argument charges that the Soviets have violated all of the arms control agreements they have signed. And they would violate the testing ban because we cannot verify it.

So what is the answer? The answer is that we have a Standing Consultative Commission with Soviet and U.S. membership. Both superpowers have brought complaints of cheating before this Commission. In Commission meetings, the Soviets are reported to have corrected violations or allayed our suspicions with respect to SALT I. Why can we not aggressively use the Commission to explore every indication of Soviet violation? And why can we not use our marvelous technology to give the verification process whatever degree of competence is necessary?

Verification is essential and verification capability is precisely what we should negotiate for in comprehensive test ban negotiations. Our seismologists tell us we can detect any militarily significant underground nuclear weapons tests on it now. We should insist on locating whatever number of monitoring stations on Soviet and U.S. soil may be necessary to assure us that we can detect explosions. We should insist on negotiating an acceptance by both sides of follow-up, on-the-spot, unannounced investigations of suspicious explosions.

How about the second argument? The second argument against U.S. agreement to a comprehensive ban on nuclear weapons tests is that the United States has a vastly superior scientific capability.

Mr. President, that is not very often discussed, but it is a fact. I think it is the underlying fact and the controlling fact. The United States leads the Soviet Union in almost every significant nuclear weapon capability. In 40 years, our country has made the breakthroughs. We are way ahead of the Soviet Union in every aspect of nuclear weapons technology.

We got a report from the Under Secretary of Defense for Research assuring us of this only a couple of months ago. We are ahead in 15 of the most important categories. The Soviets are ahead in none; in five, we are just about tied.

Nuclear weapons testing is essential to this technological progress. Without testing, we cannot continue to improve our nuclear weapons. If we stop it, we lose our advantage. Is this true? It is indeed. Then why give up this advantage? The answer is the advantage overlooks the grim fact that while technological advance keeps us ahead in the nuclear arms race, it is a race we cannot win. Why not? Because no one can win.

We cannot win it and President Reagan himself has said we cannot win it, that nobody can win it.

Why not? Because nuclear weapons become increasingly destructive and unstable. By stopping testing, we stop the race, as Frank Gaffney, Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense, has written recently: "Nuclear testing is indispensable to nuclear weapons development." It is indeed. That is precisely why a comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty is so critical.

MYTH OF THE DAY: THAT THE REAGAN ADMINISTRATION CONSISTENTLY OPPOSES COMMUNIST REGIMES IN SOUTHERN AFRICA

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, this administration has forcefully expressed its fears that communism is spreading in the countries of southern Africa. The President has worried out loud that Communists might exploit the turmoil in the country of South Africa. The Defense Department has expressed concern that the horn of South Africa might be turned into a Russian base and threaten U.S. shipping and U.S. warship transit rights.

Is the President really worried about Communists in south African countries or is it one of the biggest myths in official Washington?

I say it is one of our biggest myths. This administration is not worried about Communists in southern African nations. It actively supports Communist and Marxist nations there.

Impossible, you say? Not the anti-Communist Reagan administration. But it is true.

The administration has actively supported the Marxist/Communist regime in Angola. And the administration has proposed giving military aid to the Communist regime in Mozambique.

The Reagan administration supports Angola with extensive Eximbank loans—loans at low interest, courtesy of the U.S. taxpayer. Why would we do such a thing? Maybe, just maybe, because Gulf Oil Co. has a huge investment in Angola as a part owner of the Cabinda Gulf Oil Co. operating out of Angola. This firm provides hundreds of millions of tax dollars in revenue to the Communist leaders of Angola. This revenue goes to support the Cuban troops in Angola and the Soviet and eastern European advisers. It is no exaggeration to say that the Reagan administration indirectly subsidizes the cost of keeping Cuban troops in Angola. That must make Castro smile.

As for Mozambique, here is a Marxist regime opposed by an active pro-Western insurgency. What is the response of the Reagan administration? Give military aid to the Marxist leaders so they can suppress the pro-Western guerrilla fighters. Then invite the leaders of this Marxist and avowedly Communist country to the White House for personal discussions with our President.

Do we oppose the extension of communism in Africa? Hardly. We subsidize it. We praise it. And then we invite them to the White House.

BULGARIA'S PERSECUTION OF ITS ETHNIC TURKS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, two recent reports from the New York Times and the Washington Times report that Bulgaria persecutes its ethnic Turkish minority and is destroying their Turkish identity.

The New York Times article, based on Turkish accounts, states that the Bulgarian Government forces ethnic Turks to change their names, usually of Moslem origin, to Bulgarian names, which are Slavic and often derived from the names of Christian saints.

Bulgarian authorities denegrate Moslem culture and religious practice. Their actions lead outsiders to conclude that Bulgaria is trying to destroy completely its Turkish culture.

According to the New York Times, the Bulgarians have killed at least 1,000 ethnic Turks and incarcerated thousands more who have resisted the campaign. Those who refuse to change their names are arrested or resettled within Bulgaria.

The Washington Times reports that the campaign is suppressing all forms of Turkish culture. Bulgarian authorities have closed mosques, outlawed Moslem funerals, and banned circumcision, a Moslem religious custom.

The article states that Bulgaria has even implemented a total ban on Turkish education, closing 1,199 schools.

According to the Washington Times, Bulgaria is trying to become the most culturally homogeneous country in Europe. The official Bulgarian position is that the ethnic Turks are Bulgarians whose ancestors were forcibly converted to islam during the hundreds of years of Ottoman domination.

Just as the Crusaders once justified their wars for domination in this region with the idea of converting heathens, similarly Bulgaria justifies its violence with chauvinism.

To Bulgarian Polit-Bureau member Stanko Todorov, what they are doing to the ethnic Turks they are doing for their own good. He says, "The restoration of Bulgarian names is a historical deed, freeing our compatriots from a conflict of identity."

Mr. President, Bulgaria may now be committing cultural genocide. There are stories of escalating violence including summary executions and guerrilla warfare.

There is no proof yet that Bulgaria has any intention of annihilating its ethnic Turkish minority. But the hatred that underlies the Government's actions leads one to believe that anything is possible.

Mr. President, these prejudices and actions have no place in civilized society. The Senate ought to make this perfectly clear by ratifying the Genocide Treaty. We must make clear to the world that the United States intends that genocide be punished.

The 96 nations that have already ratified the Genocide Treaty must wonder why we have delayed so long, and why we still refuse to sign the treaty, originated by the United States itself at the United Nations,. It passed the United Nations unanimously, has been pending in the U.S. Senate for 35 years, although every President, including President Reagan, has pleaded with us to ratify it.

It is a black mark on our human rights record that we have not ratified it, and it should be corrected.

When addressing human rights abuses, such as Bulgaria's campaign of forced assimilation, ratification would make our position that much more secure.

I ask unanimous consent that the articles from the New York Times and Washington Times be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TURKS VANISH IN CAMPAIGN OF TERROR BY BULGARIANS

(By Andrew Borowiec)

SOFIA, BULGARIA.—About 1,000 ethnic Turks have been killed and tens of thousands incarcerated this year in a massive and bloody "assimilation campaign" carried out by Bulgaria's Communist authorities.

A Western report made available to The Washington Times in the Bulgarian capital describes "police terror tactics to isolate remote villages and force the inhabitants to change their names." It speaks of "documented cases of summary executions" and refers to the littleknown government effort as a "socio-political fear campaign of truly Orwellian proportions."

The brutal assimilation operation affects close to 1 million ethnic Turks—10.9 percent of the population, most of the rest of which is Slavic—in the country considered a Soviet proxy in the Balkans.

It has triggered resistance and creation of guerrilla groups in the northeastern area of Bulgaria as well as near the Turkish border. Bulgarian officials claim the groups are armed and supplied by Turkey.

The Soviet Union is watching the situation closely, concerned about its own nationality problem. The high birth rate of Soviet citizens of Asian origin is reaching the point where non-Russians will soon overtake the Soviet Union's Slavic population.

Some diplomats feel the Bulgarian "assimilation campaign" was inspired by the Soviet Union as a kind of experiment.

Earlier this year, Bulgarian Interior Minister Dimitar Stoyanov announced that "there are no Turks in Bulgaria. The issue is closed." But, according to other reports, Turkish resistance simmers on in three almost entirely Turkish areas from which foreigners and even diplomats are barred.

The areas were identified as Kardzali in southeastern Bulgaria, Sumen in the northeast and villages around the northeastern town of Razgrad.

The Bulgarian authorities followed up the name-changing operation by a total ban on Turkish education, shutting down 1,199 schools manned by 3,037 teachers, The Washington Times has learned. Circumcision, a Moslem traditional practice, has been banned on "health grounds," as have as Islamic funerals.

Most mosques in the Turkish areas have been shut, except for a handful where a group of Arab diplomats was recently taken on an organized tour.

The official Bulgarian view is that the country's ethnic Turks are Bulgarians forcibly converted to Islam during the rule of the Ottoman empire, which ended here a little over 100 years ago.

According to Bulgarian Communist Party Polit-Bureau member Stanko Todorov, "The restoration of Bulgarian names is a historical deed, freeing our compatriots from a conflict of identity."

Yet the new identity cards with Slavic names still identify their holders as being of Turkish ethnic origin. Bulgarian Turks are not subject to military conscription but instead serve in uniformed "work battalions," most of which are said to be hardly better than chain gangs.

Some diplomatic dispatches from the Bulgarian capital refer to the "statistical disappearance" of the country's ethnic Turks in terms of "efforts to create Europe's most homogenous country."

An estimated 5,000 Turks who resisted the name-changing campaign are imprisoned in the notorious concentration camp on Belene Island on the Danube River. At least twice as many are held in other camps.

In several villages, the male population has reportedly been executed. Such was the case of Yablanovo in northeastern Bulgaria, where the local population opened fire on approaching security forces.

The impact of the campaign on the rest of the country has yet to be determined. The Turks live away from the capital and generally outside the mainstream of Bulgarian life. However, hitherto tranquil Bulgaria was recently plagued by arson, bomb attacks on hotels and restaurants and other sporadic acts of violence.

Little is said officially about this, but the implication is that a "Turkish fifth column" is at work to undermine Bulgaria's Communist regime.

Consequently, security has been tightened, entry visas restricted. Turkish trucks rumbling across Bulgaria put under close surveillance, the predominantly Turkish areas cordoned off by security police.

Diplomats point out that the forced name-changing and ban on the Turkish language are violations of the 1975 Helsinki Final Act signed by Bulgaria. The signatories have pledged to respect their national minorities and assist their development.

The Bulgarian answer is that there are no minorities in Bulgaria and that the whole country is marching in step behind its leadership.

[From the New York Times, Aug. 7, 1985]

AIDES IN ANKARA SAY BULGARIA HAS SLAIN 1,000 ETHNIC TURKS

(By Henry Kamm)

ANKARA, TURKEY, Aug. 4.—Senior Turkish officials assert that Bulgaria has killed at least a thousand ethnic Turks and imprisoned several thousand others in its campaign to force them to adopt Bulgarian names.

Officials said areas inhabited by ethnic Turks, who number about 800,000, or 8.5 percent of Bulgaria's population, remain sealed off.

Bulgaria has rejected Turkish requests for talks on the problem, as well as an offer to accept Bulgaria's ethnic Turks as immigrants. No reply has been received to a letter that President Kenan Evren sent early this year to Todor Zhivkov, the Bulgarian leader.

The Bulgarian actions have provoked a renewal of tension between the two countries. Bulgaria, an ally of the Soviet Union, lived for five centuries under Ottoman rule, which even in casual conversations in Sofia is described as "the Turkish yoke."

DIPLOMATIC BREAK UNLIKELY

"There can be no good-neighborly relations for the foreseeable future," a Turkish Foreign Ministry official said Friday. However, he said, Turkey envisaged no diplomatic rupture.

According to Turkish accounts corroborated by Western embassies in Sofia, Bulgarian policemen and troops forced entire villages at a time to fill out or sign forms requesting that their Turkish names, mainly of Moslem origin, be changed to Bulgarian names, which are Slavic and often drawn from the names of Christian saints.

In many instances the Turks resisted. Although Turkish authorities say they have lists of names of people killed or arrested, they declined to make them public, citing a need to protect prisoners or families of the dead or detained. Belene, a camp on an island in the Danube, is known to be the main detention center.

Last month, Bulgaria implicitly acknowledged that the name changes had been meeting with resistance. Stoyan Stoyanov, the party leader of Khaskovo District, said in a speech that some ethnic Turks had not yet matured sufficiently politically to accept the new names.

ANTISOCIAL MEETINGS

As reported in a Khaskovo newspaper, Mr. Stoyanov said there has been "sporadic instances of antisocial meeting," and apparent allusion to public protests. He said they had been the work of people favoring outdated traditions, such as religious burials, circumcision and attendance at mosques.

Mr. Stoyanov said these people should be subjected to political and atheistic education to strengthen their Bulgarian identity.

Stanko Todorov, chairman of the National Assembly and a member of the Politburo, said in a speech in March, after Turkey had offered to receive ethnic Turks as immigrants, that those who wanted to go to Turkey would be forcibly resettled within Bulgaria. As reported by the newspaper Slivensko Delo of Sliven, Mr. Todorov said:

"Those who want to leave their villages to go to Turkey, we will move them within three or four hours. But they will be moved not to Turkey but to other parts of Bulgaria, where they will live in peace and tranquility."

The Turkish officials said Bulgaria had permitted no ethnic Turks to visit their families in Turkey this year. Thousands of such visitors were allowed to come last year.

Similarly, Turkish truck drivers who cross Bulgaria on their way to Western Europe are no longer permitted to leave the main highway to visit Turkish villages, as they had been allowed to do until the name-changing campaign.

The Turkish minority is a legacy of Ottoman rule. In one of the least publicized mass movements of people, 282,000 ethnic Turks were returned to Turkey between 1950 and 1978. Turkey says it assumes that Bulgaria has closed that door and is intent instead on forced assimilation of its ethnic Turkish citizens.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to exceed 1 p.m., with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

ANTI-APARTHEID ACTION ACT OF 1985

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, it is my understanding that later today we will vote on a second cloture motion to the South African sanctions bill. I expect to vote in favor of cloture, and I hope very much the Senate will invoke cloture. I would like to speak on that briefly now.

Mr. President, in the first place, I think we ought to keep in mind how extraordinary and extreme the apartheid system is. We have not really discussed apartheid and what it means.

There were a whole series of laws passed in 1950 by the minority white primarily, and dominated, I should say, by the Boers, to give the South African blacks, who are the great majority in the country, constituting 71 percent of the country, virtually no say whatever in government. They are not allowed to vote, nor live where they desire. They are confined to a homeland that is very poor, an area where it is very, very hard to farm and get along. They are only allowed to come into the white section, which is the great majority of the country, via passes.

Mr. President, the appalling aspect of this is not that they are not allowed to vote. Some people were not allowed to vote in this country because we had a property qualification, even a sex qualification for a long time. We had property qualifications for years. But the only reason they are not allowed to vote or live where they wish to live is because of the color of their skin. It is absolutely a racist determination, and it is wrong, wrong, wrong. We know it is wrong.

Mr. President, I rise to voice my continued strong support for the Anti-Apartheid Action Act of 1985. On June 5, a powerful, bipartisan coalition in the House passed legislation signaling America's opposition to apartheid by a vote of 295 to 127. On July 11, 1985, the Senate passed its own antiapartheid legislation with overwhelming bipartisan support by a vote of 80 to 12.

Despite the opposition of the administration, House and Senate conferees met on July 31 and worked out a compromise. We strengthened the Senate bill by adding a ban on the importation of Krugerrands—but agreed to leave out the ban on new investment and new bank loans to the private sector found in the House bill. These compromises were made by conferees because of the strong consensus view in both Houses that the United States had to go on record with its condemnation of apartheid. We felt it was time to show by actions as well as rhetoric that our country supported the rights of blacks in South Africa to have a government in whose selection they participated. It was time to show by deed as well as word that the United States utterly condemns the system of apartheid that dehumanizes the majority black population of that country.

After our conference, the House immediately passed on August 1 the conference bill, H.R. 1460, by a smashing margin of 380 to 48. The Senate would likewise have passed the conference bill on the day—but some Members prevented us from acting. It was agreed, however, that we would take up the conference report today. During most of August, this administration has searched frantically for ways to head off action by Congress on this issue. The President has spoken more than once about his opposition to the minimal sanctions being considered by Congress. And now at the last minute, solely in order to split the bipartisan effort by Congress on this action, the President has issued an Executive order in which he adopts a watered-down version of the prohibitions of the conference report.

Mr. President, the Congress should by all means pass the modest South African sanctions bill that has already passed the House. The majority leader has requested the Senate to hold off on the bill. He has further indicated that in view of the willingness of the administration to advance some of the sanctions in this bill, those of us who favored the bill should declare victory and support the President. The majority leader said that in foreign policy matters it is best for the country to speak with a single voice and if at all possible that voice should be the President's.

The majority leader makes a strong case for taking heart in the President's change of position on South Africa. It is good that the President has decided to take some steps, however hesitant, to begin to put a little pressure on South Africa to start dismembering its cruel apartheid system. But why should the President's Executive order forestall immediate action by the Congress on our sanctions legislation? The most critical provision in the bill that is now pending before the Senate and, that has already passed the House overwhelmingly, is the requirement that the President recommend additional sanctions in January 1987 if the South African Government in the meanwhile has not made "significant progress" in repealing its apartheid legislation. Why should not the Congress welcome the President's initiative, no matter how belated, and build on it with the pending bill? Why should we stop our efforts now?

Let's face it, the sanctions in the conference bill are really quite limited. There is no call for disinvestment, nor even a ban on new investment by American corporations in South Africa. There is no embargo on our trade with South Africa. The President now proposes that we accept his even more "watered down" version of sanctions over the already limited ones in our bill. If we do that, what kind of message will we really be sending to both blacks and whites in South Africa about our concern for reform?

Consider how weak the President's proposed sanctions are. First, the most important economic pressure brought by the bill now before the Senate is the provision to ban the purchase of Krugerrands by Americans. The President would not put that ban into effect unless the country receives permission from the member governments of the Central Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, known as the GATT. As Chairman HOWARD WOLPE of the House Subcommittee on Africa has pointed out, the administration opposed the boycott of Krugerrands when it appeared before WOLPE's committee. And why did the administration oppose this mild but specific economic sanction? Because, testified the administration, such a ban on Krugerrands would violate the GATT rules. So here we have a situation that would permit the South Africans to continue their sale of hundreds of millions of dollars of their special gold coins in America for the many months it would take for the GATT organization to make a determination, if they decide, according to the rules that we cannot do it. Furthermore, we would establish a precedent that could haunt us in the future of letting an international organization determine for this country what economic policies we can pursue to achieve our national interests in the world. Would it be a precedent? Of course it would. Did this administration go to GATT before it decided to restrict trade with Nicaragua? In the past, did other administrations go to the GATT for permission to limit our trade with Cuba, Poland, Hungary, or Uganda? We did not and I do not think we should have. Should we be required to go to the GATT if—in response to some international emergency in the future—we decide to further limit our imports of some item? What if Congress this year decides to put a surcharge on imported goods? Should we get the GATT's permission first? In 1971, when President Nixon imposed restrictions on imports from Japan and other GATT members, he acted first and later went to the GATT. Why not do the same now?

The pending bill bans all nuclear exports to South Africa. The President's Executive order provides several exceptions to this ban which were considered and rejected by the Foreign Relations Committee during its markup of this provision in the conference bill. Why should we engage in nuclear trade with that country? It will not even sign the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

The pending bill mandates that United States firms employing more than 25 persons in South Africa adhere to the Sullivan code of fair employment practices in order to ensure they treat their white and black employees alike. It provides for the promulgation of regulations to ensure that American companies carry out this mandate—even providing for fines and prison terms for false statements by our companies. The President's Executive order states only it "is the policy of the United States to encourage strongly all United States firms in South Africa" to follow fair labor practices and does not provide any means for determining whether they are. Why should we not mandate that United States firms treat their black employees in South Africa fairly? Why not provide for enforcement of this mandate?

The pending bill provides for the minting of a U.S. gold coin that is legal tender so our citizens who want to buy gold coins can do so. The President's order provides only for a feasibility study on this matter. If we are going to ban Krugerrand imports why should not our citizens have a chance to buy an American gold coin in its place?

In general, Mr. President, we should keep in mind that the bill pending before the Senate is a very mild bill. It provides no disinvestment. It does not even impose limits on new investment by American industry. It will have only a slight effect on the South African economy. Its prime strength lies in its requirement that—if by January 1, 1987—there has not been significant progress in ending apartheid, then the President will recommend somewhat stiffer sanctions. The President's proposal, on the other hand, is much feebler in what it requires this year. And it completely lacks any real force because it contains no provision that there will be stronger sanctions next year if no progress against apartheid is made.

The United States must, if it is to be true to its traditions and cognizant of its national interests work with both black and white South Africans to help bring about reform in that troubled land. That has always been the purpose of our sanctions proposals—and I am delighted the President has come to accept the view that they can help bring reform. I see no reason why Congress should not pass the conference bill and why the President should not sign it.

100TH ANNIVERSARY OF STANISLAUS ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I wish to call the Senate's attention to the parish of the St. Stanislaus Roman Catholic Church of Erie, PA, which is celebrating its 100th anniversary this year.

The construction of the St. Stanislaus Church was completed in 1885 under the guidance of the Rev. Msgr. Andrew J. Ignasiak who lead the parish until his death in 1934. The Rev. Msgr. Wladislaus J. Stanczak then served St. Stanislaus from 1935 until his death in 1962. Father Joseph J. Radziszewski, the present pastor, was appointed in 1962.

I wish to congratulate the St. Stanislaus Roman Catholic Church on its 100th anniversary and on its record of outstanding service to the Erie, PA, community.

SENATOR BURDICK WOULD VOTE YEA ON VOTE 172

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. President, yesterday, September 10, there was a vote on a motion to table the bill S. 47. I was necessarily absent. Had I been present, I would have voted to table the bill.

SNAP-ON TOOLS

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, in 1919, 25-year-old Joe Johnson, manager of the then Milwaukee-based American Grinder Manufacturing Co'.s socket wrench division, began questioning the feasibility of one-piece socket wrench units. When his idea of interchangeable sockets with different handles failed to convince his superiors, Johnson and a fellow coworker William A. Seidemann set up their own shop to fashion the first set of snap-on tools.

With their slogan "five do the work of fifty," Johnson and Seidemann enlisted the help of two Wisconsin area tire salesmen who generated more than 500 COD orders for their new product in several months. After incorporating, the newly formed Snap-On Wrench Co., began to search for an effective sales outlet for their product. They attracted factory sales representative Stanton Palmer, whose simple method of taking the tools directly to the customer and demonstrating their beneifts, was a great success.

In 1922, 12 additional sales branches opened and new tools were added. From 1925 to 1929, Snap-On went from 17 to 26 sales branches and nearly doubled its salesmen. This tremendous growth required a new site for the headquarters, from Milwaukee to Kenosha.

In 1930, Snap-On Wrench Co. became Snap-On Tools, Inc., and in 1931 Snap-On formed its first international subsidiary with Canada. World War II had a dramatic effect on the company's future success. Snap-On had become the preferred source of hand tools for use by the military.

After the war, Snap-On turned its attention to marketing. Salesmen were made into independent businessmen which proved to be the most significant decision in the company's history.

Through the fifties and sixties, growing customer demands and a large international market forced Snap-On Tools into an era of plant acquisitions and expansion. By 1973, net sales doubled the 1969 level and doubled again by 1977. At the end of the decade, a fivefold leap was seen in sales.

Mr. President, Snap-On Tools Corp., has squarely faced the challenges in the changing marketplace and the recession of the early eighties, and prospered nonetheless. While other major companies wavered under the economic strain, Snap-On emerged in 1983 with record sales and record earnings.

A new, more aggressive marketing approach, and new product development and designs have enhanced the company's operation since 1983. The challenges facing Snap-On during the remainder of the decade are small considering the hurdles that have been cleared in the past. We can only wait with eager anticipation for what the second half of the eighties will bring to Wisconsin and its economy because of the jobs and revenue brought to our State by the Snap-On Tools Corp.

Today, more than 3,700 independent Snap-On dealers and nearly 300 industrial salesmen maintain the same tradition of regularly scheduled, direct service to its customers. The diligence, determination and sensitivity exhibited by the company's founders in those early years survives today in the efforts of 6,000 worldwide employees of Snap-On.

In recognition of the 65th anniversary of the Snap-On Tools Corp., in Kenosha, WI, I ask unanimous consent that a booklet published by the company be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the booklet was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SNAP-ON TOOLS CORPORATION

(Joseph Johnson, pioneer of "Snap-on" interchangeable sockets)

1920'S

It was 1919. The Great War was over. And twenty-five year old Joe Johnson, full of a young man's creative energy, was unknowingly writing the first chapter of an extraordinary story of success.

Joe had just taken over as manager of Milwaukee-based American Grinder Manufacturing Company's new socket wrench division. His exposure to hand tools, at that point, had been fragmentary. So perhaps it was the freshness of his vision, or the raw challenge of something new, that provided him with an idea that would ultimately turn the hand tool industry upside down.

In the early part of the century, mechanics' socket wrenches were one-piece units, with the socket tightly and permanently affixed to the handle. The wrenches, of course, were made in many sizes and handle patterns. It was into the manufacture of these wrenches that Joe's company had just entered.

As Joe began to learn the ways of this new area of business, a nagging question kept entering his mind: Why should a mechanic have to buy a handle in order to have the use of a single socket? In fact, why couldn't a mechanic buy, say, five different handles and ten sockets providing him the flexibility of fifty different combinations?

Being loyal to his employer, Joe offered the idea to the vice president and works manager at American Grinder. As has happened to many others with visionary ideas, he was turned down.

But the practical power of this idea intrigued coworker William A. Seidemann. It wasn't long before the two of them agreed that "interchangeable sockets" had the potential of universal acceptance by professional auto mechanics.

Neither man had the necessary financial resources for implementing their idea. But they were determined.

Using crude bending jigs and muscle power, the partners fashioned their set of five handles with ten interchangeable sockets. The pair enlisted the help of two tire salesmen who covered the Wisconsin area. Using the sample wrench set and the slogan "Five Do the Work of Fifty" the tire salesmen generated more than 500 C.O.D. orders.

Buoyed by their initial success, Johnson and Seidemann decided it was time to legally incorporate.

In 1920, the newly formed Snap-on Wrench Company moved into a rented building in Milwaukee.

In search of an effective sales outlet for their new product, they ran an ad in the Chicago newspapers which attracted Stanton Palmer, a factory sales representative. Palmer's approach was simple. He took the novel tool sets directly to the customer and demonstrated their benefits. He enlisted Newton E. Tarble, a lithography salesman, to share the increasing load. Their sales method proved so successful that in the fall of 1920 they created a formal distribution company.

Motor Tool Specialty Company became the sole sales agent for Snap-on Wrench Company. The arrangement allowed Johnson and Seidemann to concentrate their full efforts on tool production in order to keep up with the demands of the new distribution firm.

In January of 1921, Palmer and Tarble purchased the interest in Snap-on Wrench Company held by two of Johnson and Seidemann's original financial backers. This arrangement meant that the four Snap-on stockholders were now actively involved in either administration, finance, sales, or production. Stanton Palmer was elected President of the young Company.

In the next couple of years, creativity and expansion intensified. In 1922, twelve additional sales branches opened. New tools were being added to the product line. In 1923, the first Snap-on Wrench Company catalog featured nearly 50 items. Even a "special" socket with an oval-shaped opening designed for fitting the spindle nut and adjusting cone on the Model T Ford front bearings appeared in the Company catalog.

Mechanics had also been asking for other kinds of hand tools which led Motor Tool to add a line of open end wrenches and a series of chisels and punches. These tools were first made for Motor Tool by other firms and because of their distinctive blued finish were sold under the name "Blue-Point."

The popularity of these tools spread rapidly, resulting in the formation of the Blue-Point Tool Company, which operated under the same management as Motor Tool Specialty Company.

15¢ For the finest Wrench Built!

By 1925, the five-year-old company boasted 17 branches and 165 salesmen. Continued growth strained the rented Milwaukee facilities. In 1929, Snap-on Wrench Company selected a site in Kenosha, Wisconsin for its new headquarters.

Ideally situated between Milwaukee and Chicago, the Kenosha location meant the Company could put down roots.

(By the time 1929 rolled around, Snap-on Wrench Company boasted 26 sales branches and nearly 300 salesmen. The four founders had put the fledgling company on the map.)

For the Company, the 1930's were a mixture of austerity and creative growth. Snap-on Wrench Company became Snap-on Tools, Inc. to reflect the merger with Blue-Point Tool Company in 1930.

In 1931, a heart attack caused the tragic death of Stanton Palmer. At the time, the Company was anticipating the move to Kenosha and was spread financially thin with bank loans and trade acceptances. When the Depression hit, the principal creditors were Bridge Boulevard Bank and Forged Steel Products Comany.

With the Company's capital structure over-extended, the only solution was to solicit help from the bank and Forged Steel Products. William E. Myers, the owner of Forged Steel, became the new Snap-on Tools, Inc., President. Through the issuance of Snap-on stock to Tarble and to Palmer's estate, Snap-on Tools, Inc. acquired the assets of Motor Tool Specialty Company. Myers, as the new President, insisted on strict austerity measures. He was determined to see the Company regain financial stability.

In 1931, application was accepted by the Canadian Secretary of State for the incorporation of Snap-on Tools of Canada Ltd as a private company. Snap-on Wrench Company had formed its first international subsidiary.

The lean years of the thirties did result in two creative sales policies originally designed as adaptive reactions to the existing financial depression.

One of the salesmen had been writing up "dream orders" with the mechanics in his territory. The salesman would say, "Sure, everybody is in a fix today—no money—but when you do have money again, what tools will you need?"

Rogers Palmer, Stanton's son, who had become Vice President and General Sales Manager in 1935, recognized the positive impact these "dream orders" had on mechanics. The idea quickly developed into a "Needs List" and was accepted throughout the entire work force. In addition to being a record of admitted future needs, it also became a route list, purchase record, and a basis for territorial sales statistics.

A method of extending credit was also designed for coping with the difficulties of the era. This notion was viewed by many as a risky proposition. Nonetheless, "T.P." (time payment) selling, as it came to be known, proved to be a sound sales policy and resulted in lasting goodwill with the mechanic customers.

Branch sales coverage was critically analyzed and a program providing additional sales supervision was initiated. The Boston branch, under Theodore Glenn's guidance, had taken a leading position in national sales. Glenn's branch served as a model for developing additional sales territories.

Qualified salesmen were promoted to field sales managers. They assisted and supervised salesmen in their territories. Dramatically, the number of salesmen increased from 240 to 488 over the next half of the decade.

Also in 1935, Newton Tarble resigned from his position of Vice President and General Sales Manager. He remained on the Board of Directors.

In 1937, the Company name was modified from Snap-on Tools, Inc. to Snap-on Tools Corporation. That same year, a second production facility was built. Capitalizing on a willing labor market and supportive community, a five acre site in Mount Carmel, Illinois was selected.

Europe exploded in the maelstrom of war in 1939 and the U.S. military was forced to shift its production priorities to accommodate the demands of the government.

That same year, President Bill Myers died, necessitating a realignment of administrative functions. Joe Johnson became the President of both Snap-on Tools Corporation and Forged Steel Products. The year 1939 also marked the first dividend payment to Company stockholders. During the previous 19 years, all earnings had been re-invested in the Company's growth and development.

This first dividend payment spearheaded an annual tradition for Snap-on Tools Corporation and underscored the Company's regained stability.

(The combination of President Bill Myers' tight austerity measures and General Sales Manager Rod Palmer's innovative marketing strategies pulled the Company successfully through the depressed and chaotic Thirties.)

1940'S

In 1940, Snap-on Tools Corporation executives were proudly looking back over a spirited five-year stretch which had resulted in a doubling of sales volume and a growth in the sales force from 265 in 1935 to 556 salesmen in 1940.

In addition to their increased numbers, salesmen were now visiting their customers on at least a monthly basis instead of the previous six to eight week average. These ambitious salesmen were creating the cornerstone of the Company's marketing success—frequent and regular service to the customer.

World War II and the buffeting of the following five-year period had a dramatic effect on the Company's production methods. Since Snap-on had become a preferred source of hand tools for military use, these demands necessarily led to a need for increased productive capacity, including the building of a new forge shop in Kenosha in 1942.

In addition, tool shortages in the civilian market due to military requirements resulted in a profound alteration of distribution methods. The Company realized that its existence would depend on serving the nonmilitary market. So, in effort to maintain good customer relations, the branches began releasing excess stock to salesmen as it became available.

By creative necessity, the salesmen's cars and station wagons became their rolling stock of tools. Salesmen with walk-in trucks were adding displays to the usual stock shelving. By 1945, this strategy had become so firmly entrenched that all salesmen began carrying stock and making immediate deliveries.

Over the years, Snap-on sales methods have been influenced by two important factors: what serves customers best and what increases the individual salesman's earnings. Selling directly from walk-in trucks seemed to satisfy both of these requirements.

Since salesmen were now selling to customers from their own stock, the next development was logical. The Company made each Snap-on salesman an independent businessman in an assigned territory. This change was significant. It foreshadowed the dramatic role marketing would now play in the Snap-on success story.

Following World War II, bulldozers, concrete mixers, steel erectors and bricklayers became a familiar sight at Snap-on. Space had become so scarce in the Kenosha plant that in 1946 it became necessary to build an addition to house the automatic screw machines, steel storage and a larger die-sinking department. The Company's expansion of its production facilities during the war years was made possible by a government-granted "Certificate of Necessity."

Heavy demands coupled with an inability to replace equipment during the military years had left much of the Kenosha plant in obsolete or worn-out condition. Snap-on management effected extensive modernization during the last half of the decade.

Those last five years of the 1940's witnessed a fundamental change in the Company's perception of its markets. Expedient, quality production methods were being achieved. The Company was ready to capitalize on its still-young marketing program.

(When the turbulence of the war years eased, Snap-on Tools turned its full attention to its marketing philosophy. The evolution of salesmen into independent dealers quickly followed and proved to be the most significant marketing change in the Company's history.)

"Diversification" is the key word for Snap-on in the 1950's. The Company diversified its markets through international expansion, while the product line saw dramatic new introductions through the acquisitions of other manufacturing firms.

The first few years of the decade were, however, wrought with government regulations. Stringent steel control was a byproduct of the Korean War, making it difficult to obtain raw materials for production and resulting in product shortages.

In 1951, twenty years after its formation, Snap-on Tools of Canada Ltd moved from its rented quarters in Long Branch, Ontario into the subsidiary's own recently-finished plant and administrative offices in Toronto.

The 19,000 square foot facility housed machining, heat treating and plating operations, enabling the Canadian operation to manufacture more of its own products and increase its profitability.

In that same year, Canadian sales moved off the $2 million mark where it had been hovering since 1947. Snap-on Tools of Canada Ltd was patterned after the U.S. operation and had 100 independent dealers and eight sales branches as of 1951.

The acceleration of industrial progress in Central and South America led to the formation of a Mexican subsidiary corporation, Herramientas Snap-on de Mexico, S.A., in 1952. The wholly-owned subsidiary recorded its first sales in June of 1952.

In Kenosha, a new factory wing containing 27,000 square feet of space was operational by 1953. The economic boom of the late 1950's further stimulated domestic expansion.

In 1954, Bill Seidemann retired—34 years after collaborating with Joe Johnson in forming Snap-on Wrench Company.

The design and engineering of the automobile was becoming increasingly complex, stimulating a need for diagnostic tune-up equipment. Lacking the necessary production facilities and engineering experience to enter this profitable new field, Snap-on acquired the plant and patents of the Joseph P. Weidenhoff Company of Algona, Iowa in 1956. The nine-employee firm produced timing and analysis equipment, armature growlers and generator test benches. Later, new equipent was installed in the facility for manufacturing the Company's line of metal storage units previously purchased from outside sources.

Another major manufacturing capability was made possible three years later when Snap-on acquired the Judson Engineering Company of Natick, Massachusetts. The product line now included wheel alignment and wheel balancing equipment.

A new era in the administration of the Company began in 1959. In April of that year, Joe Johnson, the developer of interchangeable socket wrenches, retired from his 20-year presidency and was elected Chairman of the Board.

Victor M. Cain was elected President and Robert L. Grover was elected Vice President/Secretary and directed the division of legal, indutrial and public relations.

(Meeting new customer demands and a growing international market propelled Snap-on Tools into an era of plant acquisitions and expansion. Within ten years, the square footage of the Company's facilities had doubled.)

The 1960's represented a period of significant change for the Company's marketing division. To better handle the forecasted product needs of the dealer, it became inevitable that marketing would establish a closer working relationship with manufacturing. This cooperative bond fostered an environment conducive to economic growth.

In the spring of 1960, Joe Johnson, the last of the founders still active in Snap-on management, retired from his post as Chairman of the Board, while remaining active on the Board. That same year, a three-week strike at the Kenosha plant ended 24 years of uninterrupted labor peace.

In 1962 Ted Glenn, who had become Vice President of Sales the year before, initiated a change in the marketing program which would streamline operations. Field administrative responsibilities were realigned to Eastern, Western and Central Division from the existing 7-region structure. This change helped to consolidate and standardize data reporting and personnel practices. It also led to changes in territory assignments with dealers being assigned smaller territories. By this time, dealers were providing service to their customers on a bi-weekly or even weekly basis.

Also in the 1960's the Company reached an important milestone of independence. The original distribution system had been made up of branches which were independent outlets handling the sale of Snap-on products. The Company's purchase of the St. Louis branch in 1960 completed a strategic program of branch acquisitions which gave Snap-on Tools Corporation total control over its marketing and distribution system.

Glenn's innovative practices and sensitivity to the needs of the sales organization, coupled with Cain's stringent internal controls, proved to be a winning mix for Snap-on during the early half of the 1960's.

In 1964, manufacturing capability was established in Mexico. The newly-formed Snap-on Tools de Mexico, S.A. de C.V. began manufacturing a portion of the tools required by the Mexican distribution operation, Herramientas Snap-on de Mexico, S.A. Due to Mexico's laws, the greatest operating versatility was available to Snap-on by maintaining two separate operations: one for production and the other for distribution.

The Comapny entered the computer era in 1964 when an IBM computer was acquired. The system replaced the existing punch card equipment and substantialily improved the procedures for processing orders and replenishing inventory.

In 1965, a new direct-selling branch opened in the United Kingdom. This development represented the first formal step in transplanting Snap-on marketing methods to the European market. The Company's Canadian counterpart supplied a major portion of the products for this market.

Snap-on wrenches and sockets experienced significant design changes in the 1960's. The U.S. Navy had been experiencing problems in removing small 12-point fasteners from their aircraft. The corners of the fasteners would round off under high torque conditions using conventional wrenches. Responding to their need, Snap-on developed the revolutionary "Flank Drive" design which proved far superior to previous designs. Several years of legal debate concluded with the patenting of the concept in 1965. Flank Drive was first used on special high-performance tools and later adopted as a feature on most of the Company's wrenches and sockets. At the April 22, 1966 organizational meeting of the Board of Directors, Victor M. Cain, President since 1959 and Snap-on employee since 1929, was elected Chairman of the Board and Chief Executive Officer. Robert L. Grover, Executive Vice President for the previous two years and Snap-on employee since 1942, was elected President. Cain continued as Chairman until his retirement in 1968.

During 1966, significant enlargements were made to the Canadian manufacturing facility, considerably increasing production capability. That same year, a centralized distribution center was built in Ottawa, Illinois for improving service to the Company's branches and international operations.

During the decade, the Company began developing the production capacity for electric, hydraulic and pneumatic tools to keep pace with changing technologies. In 1967, the Snap-on plant in Natick, Massachusetts (formerly the Judson Engineering Co.) began producing a line of pneumatic tools.

The 1960's saw the retirement of two other individuals who played a very important part in the Corporation's growth up until that time. Rod Palmer and Ted Glenn both were pivotal to the Company's growth in marketig and sales.

With the marketing groundwork firmly established, the Company was confidently entering its most significant period since the 1920's. Snap-on Tools Corporation was about to experience a decade of mind-boggling growth and success.

(The cooperative bond developed between manufacturing and marketing in the 60's provided the impetus for the future growth explosion.)

1970'S

As Snap-on Tools Corporation moved into the Seventies, it entered a decade in which all previous measurements of success would be rewritten. There is no better indication of this than what is reflected in sales.

By 1973, net sales were double the 1969 level. Sales doubled again by 1977 and by decade's end, the Company recorded net sales of $373.6 million—a five-fold leap from ten years earlier when sales were at $66.2 million. The Company's profitability followed suit. The decade saw 1969's net earnings of $6 million parlayed into a remarkable $42.6 million by 1979.

Norman E. Lutz, who had been with the Company in various accounting and top management positions since 1945, became President in 1974.

Bob Grover became Chairman of the Board.

In 1975, Norm Lutz announced a corporate goal of doubling sales in five years. Snap-on surpassed that mark more than a year ahead of schedule.

During the decade, national and regional distribution methods were perfected with the construction of product distribution centers in Robesonia, Pennsylvania; Carson City, Nevada; and a national parts distribution center in Kenosha, Wisconsin. A 90,000 square foot office addition was completed at the Kenosha headquarters.

The Company's marketing efforts were greatly strengthened and refined with the addition of 20 sales branches, with the total now reaching 50, and a growth in the worldwide sales force from 1,800 to over 3,000.

In order to keep pace with the growing demand for our products, two plants were purchased in Tennessee; new major plant construction began in Milwaukee; and a research and development center was established in Bensenville, Illinois.

International growth kept up with the rest of the Corporation. By the end of the decade, the U.K. operation in its 15th year of existence was recording sales of $30 million—the same figure reported for total corporate net sales in 1962.

In 1977, Willsbach, West Germany became the site for the Company's newest overseas branch.

A year later, Edwin C. Schindler, formerly Executive Vice President, was elected President of the Corporation. He continued as Chief Operating Officer, while Norm Lutz, previously Chairman and President, continued as Chairman and Chief Executive Officer.

In 1978, in an effort to further broaden an already strong interest in the Corporation, Snap-on Tools was listed on the New York Stork Exchange.

On paper, the growth of the Seventies seemed explosive. To an extent it was. Yet the sprouting of the Company was a result not of the times as much as it was of careful and methodical planning. The record-shattering financial figures were accompanied by a steady, even-handed expansion and refinement in every operation.

The Company was well-prepared for the Eighties.

(The 1970's saw a steady, even-handed expansion and refinement in every operation. By decade's end, the Company recorded net sales of $373.6 million—a five-fold leap in ten years.)

1980'S

The beginning of the Eighties challenged the basic mettle of the Company. But as it had for its entire sixty-year history, Snap-on Tools Corporation faced those challenges and prospered while other major companies wavered under the economic strain.

The Corporation successfully navigated the turbulent waters of both a changing marketplace and a prolonged recession, emerging in 1983 with record sals of $454.7 million and record earnings of $43.0 million. In addition, 1983 marked the second consecutive year in which Snap-on Tools Corporation attained Fortune 500 status.

Edwin C. Schindler became Chief Executive Officer in 1980 when Norman E. Lutz, Chairman of the Board, retired as CEO. That year also saw operations begin at the newly-constructed Milwaukee manufacturing plant. This venture, in tandem with the new research and development operation in Bensenville, Illinois, symbolized the Company's commitment to maintaining processes and manufacturing efficiencies at a state-of-the-art level.

In 1982, Norm Lutz retired as Chairman of the Board and Edwin Schindler as elected to that position. William B. Rayburn became President and Chief Operating Officer.

In the first three years of the decade, the Company took tough but necessary measures to be assured of a profitable existence during those difficult times. These measures created a lean, effective business operation that prepared the Company for a rejuvenated marketplace in the second half of 1983.

A new and more aggressive marketing approach set the tone for all phases of the Company's operation in 1983. New-product development and design were significantly enhanced by the introduction of color computer-assisted engineering design equipment, further reinforcing the Company's position of leadership in the industry.

In 1984, a new branch warehouse/sales office opened in Tampa, Florida, bringing the U.S. branch total to 53. A 148,000 square-foot building, purchased in late 1983, became operational as the Olive Branch, Mississippi, distribution center. Edwin Schindler retired as CEO, and remained Chairman of the Board. William Rayburn assumed the responsibilites of CEO.

Only weeks after Edwin Schindler had retired as CEO, the Corporation was shocked by the news of his unexpected death. The Company lost a great corporate leader, and the Kenosha community lost one of its most visible and hardworking citizens. William Rayburn was elected Chairman of the Board.

The expansion and refinement of the Seventies truly prepared the Corporation for the challenges of the first half of the Eighties. Those challenges worked to further streamline an already well-tuned Corporation. The second half of the Eighties could only be viewed with eager anticipation.

The Company successfully navigated the turbulent waters of both a changing marketplace and a prolonged recession, emerging with record highs in sales and earnings.

THE COMMITMENT

Our history, as chronicled in these pages, is dramatic evidence of innovation and hard work, and illustrates our unwavering commitment to quality and service.

From the beginning, Snap-on Tools Corporation has maintained the highest standards of excellence. Our 65-year history of success proves that professional mechanics around the world insist on top quality products and rely on superior service that only our dealers, industrial salesmen and international representatives can provide.

Back in the 1920's, the Company's founders—Joe Johnson, Bill Seidemann, Stanton Palmer and Newton Tarble—could not forsee that the novel and practical concept of interchangeable socket wrenches pioneered by Johnson would ultimately set the standard for the entire hand tool industry.

Our founders understood that their unique product demanded a direct and personal marketing approach. Serving the mechanic at his place of business not only proved to be a successful strategy, but it also become the essential ingredient of our marketing success. Today, more than 3,700 independent Snap-on dealers and nearly 300 industrial salesmen maintain this tradition of regularly scheduled, direct service to our customers.

The diligence, determination and sensitivity to the professional mechanic exhibited by our founders in those early years survives in the efforts of 6,000 worldwide employees of Snap-on. We are facing the balance of the 1980's with the same rigorous standards of excellence and an unwavering commitment to continue our 65-year relationship of trust with our customers.

Our unparalleled success in the hand tool industry proves that the demand for quality products and conscientious service will never change.

W.B. RAYBURN,
Chairman, President and Chief Executive Officer.

A TRIBUTE TO DEAN K. PHILLIPS

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I rise today to salute the memory of a genuine American hero, Dean K. Phillips.

Born in Youngstown, OH, Mr. Phillips attended Boardman High School and Ohio University, graduating in 1967. Despite having been granted a student deferment to attend law school, Dean Phillips enlisted in the U.S. Army as a concrete demonstration of his sincere belief that the draft law, particularly the student deferment, was inequitable. Declining the option of a commission, Dean Phillips chose to serve in the ranks as a private first class. He served with great distinction in Vietnam, volunteering for an assignment with the 101st Airborne's 3d Brigade, the Phantom Force, which undertook dangerous long-range reconnaissance patrols. His exceptional bravery was recognized by the award of Silver and Bronze Stars and the Purple Heart, as well as several other decorations.

After completing his military service, Dean Phillips returned to Ohio University where he earned a master's degree and then a law degree from the University of Denver. Thereafter, Mr. Phillips devoted his considerable talents to the welfare of his fellow Vietnam veterans. In Colorado, he served on the jobs for veterans task force and the Colorado Board of Veterans Affairs. He drafted and lobbied successfully for the passage of Colorado's Veterans Re-employment Rights Act, the Vietnam-Era Veterans Tuition Waiver Act, and the Paraplegic and Blind Veterans Tax Credit Act.

In 1977 Dean Phillips came to Washington where he served as special assistant to the VA's general counsel from 1977-79, and special assistant to the Administrator of the Veterans' Administration from 1979-81. He also served as an attorney-adviser to the Board of Veterans Appeals, as a member of the National Advisory Council of the U.S. Senate Committee on Veterans' Affairs, and most recently as an attorney for the Military Order of the Purple Heart.

Dean Phillips was a passionate advocate of veterans' rights and a tireless champion of the enlisted man. His life is an inspiration, a sterling example of dedication to cause and conscience. His death at the young age of 42 is a tragic loss to his family and to the Nation. He is gone now but not forgotten. His life's work on behalf of Vietnam veterans will be his legacy; let us ensure that it will long endure.

TAXING MOTHERS AT HOME

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, President Reagan has said:

In Washington, everyone looks out for special interest groups. Well, I think families are pretty special.

That is the reason he has proposed a major revision of the Federal Income Tax Code, increasing the personal exemption, for taxpayers and their dependents, to $2,000. As he put it in a radio address of December 3, 1983:

Families stand at the center of society. So building our future must begin by preserving family values. Tragically, too many in Washington have been asking us to swallow a whopper, namely that bigger government is the greatest force for fairness and progress. But this so-called solution has given most of us a bad case of financial indigestion. How can families survive when big government's powers to tax, inflate and regulate absorb their wealth, usurp their rights and crush their spirit? Was there compassion for a working family in 21½ percent interest rates, 12½ percent inflation and taxes soaring out of sight? Consider the cost of child rearing: It now takes $85,000 to raise a child to age 18, and family incomes haven't kept up. During the 1970s real wages actually declined over two percent. Consider taxes: In 1948, the tax on the average two-child family was just $9. Today, it is $2,900.

Sharing the President's concern, in testimony before the House Ways and Means Committee on June 26, was Mrs. Helen Coyne, representing Mothers At Home. This nonpartisan group does not advocate any particular role for women in the economy; it does insist that women should be able to choose either a career as a homemaker or careers outside the home, without being economically penalized by the Federal tax system. As Mrs. Coyne puts it:

We judge that a majority of mothers in this country want to feel free to decide whether to develop a career inside or outside the home without fear of government-imposed economic penalty. Tax policy should not inhibit a woman's choice to progress, to achieve, to nurture.

I emphatically agree. And that is why I have introduced legislation that would treat families more equitably for tax purposes. It is why I have worked with the administration in forging the President's tax proposal. It is why I remain determined that, to be a true reform, any overhaul of the tax system must address the need to reestablish fairness for the family in general and, in particular, for those women who, for all or part of their careers, are homemakers: quite literally, makers of the homes that form the foundation of our society, our economy, our future.

I ask unanimous consent, that the testimony from Mothers At Home be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TESTIMONY BY MRS. HELEN M. COYNE, PRESIDENT, MOTHERS AT HOME, INC.

Good morning, Mr. chairman and distinguished members of the Committee. My name is Holly Coyne, and I am grateful for this opportunity to discuss the proposals to reform the U.S. Tax Code which are now before this Committee.

First, I would like to explain who I represent and why my testimony should be of interest to this Committee. I am the president of an organization called Mothers At Home, a group which provides support through a monthly publication for mothers who choose to stay home to nurture their families. Founded less than two years ago, our organization quickly gained a national reputation such that thousands of women from across the country and abroad have written to us about their experiences raising families in the 1980's.

Because the letters from these women were unsolicited, we feel they are especially candid descriptions of how today's families are functioning and how the mothers in these families are feeling. We also feel that these letters are a particularly accurate reflection of the opinions of today's mothers because the writers of the letters cross all political, religious, and socio-economic lines: We have heard from mothers in urban areas and mothers in rural areas, from mothers who call themselves conservative, from mothers who are financially well off and mothers who have little economic freedom. And, in spite of the fact that our publication and projects are directed to mothers who are at home, we have heard from a surprising number of working mothers, including many who are the single source of income for their families.

Throughout our correspondence, one common thread prevails—concern for children and family and how their needs should best be met. We are convinced that the opinions expressed in the mail we receive are those of a majority of mothers, and therefore of a majority of families in this nation. Yet, these views seem consistently underrepresented both in the general media and in the policies set forth by the government of this nation. For this reason, we felt compelled to pass along to this Committee our assessment of how the proposed tax reforms will affect families. However, we wish to point out that we appear here today in a strictly educational capacity. Our organization, Mothers At Home, is neither partisan nor political, and does not lobby on behalf of any political party or group.

We recognize that the subject before the Committee is so complex that relatively little light can be shed in just a few minutes. Therefore, we have limited our testimony to three issues which we feel relate directly to what we are hearing from families across the nation.

OUR NATION'S TAX POLICY SHOULD BE CAREER NEUTRAL

First and foremost, we feel that America's families want a tax code which is career neutral—that is, a code which does not create an unfair economic advantage for either two-career families or families choosing to have one spouse stay home. Yet, our mail indicates that mothers whose families are struggling financially feel rewarded for taking a job outside the home and penalized for making the decision to remain home full-time with their children. Letters from both mothers now at home and mothers working full-time portray strong feelings that a financial burden is placed on women who choose to spend more time at home.

It appears to us that some of the proposed changes in the tax code—specifically the increased personal deduction and the equal IRA benefits for non-working spouses—would be a first step in relieving this economic pressure to send both spouses into the paid workforce. We are concerned, however, that much of the discussion of these proposals in the media concludes that if families with one spouse at home will benefit from the tax changes, then families with two wage earners will be hurt by the changes. Rather, we have found that in many cases, families where both spouses work and families with one spouse at home are not two distinct groups with conflicting interests.

Our letters show that a large group of mothers on the economic borderline float in and out of the workforce—sometime struggling financially while staying at home and sometimes struggling emotionally while working full-time. There are also mothers who desperately need more money but have never taken full-time positions outside the home, and women working full-time who desperately want to spend more time with their children but are afraid of the economic consequences of quitting their jobs. All three groups of mothers resent the fact that they feel forced to choose between time with their children and economic security for their families. (See Appendix "Sampling of Letters From Women Under Economic Pressure.")

Greater equity in the tax code could make enough difference in many family budgets to help all three groups mentioned above. As members of this Committee try to discern what impact these tax proposals will have on families, we hope they will keep this fact in mind.

THE REAL VALUE OF PERSONAL EXEMPTIONS MUST BE RESTORED

Perhaps the element of the Administration's proposal which will have the most obvious impact on families is the restoration of real economic value to the personal exemption. Many of us remember the days when a middle class family could pay the monthly mortgage, raise a family, and save for college, retirement, and a rainy day—all on the modest take-home pay of the fifties. Since then, high inflation, double-digit interest rates, bracket creep, and higher weekly payroll deductions have made it increasingly difficult for families to make ends meet on one income. These same factors have reduced the value of the personal exemption. Restoring the personal exemption to a meaningful level, and indexing it, will give parents an honest economic deduction for the benefits that they, in return, provide society.

While the $2000 personal exemption will remove some of the economic pressure on families to have both parents leave the home for the job market, it will also benefit all other families. Therefore, we urge this Committee to look favorably on this aspect of the tax proposal.

RETIREMENT ACCOUNTS SHOULD BE EQUAL FOR ALL INDIVIDUALS

IRA's have been an important tax innovation of recent years, an incentive for individuals to increase savings and prepare financially for their own retirement. It is difficult to understand why some women cannot participate fully in this benefit. To limit the non-income-earning woman at home to only $250 as an IRA contribution implies that our government considers the out-of-the-home working mother as eight times (with a $2000 IRA allowance) as valuable as her sister at home. We recognize the unique importance of a woman's role as mother and educator at home and therefore support the full extension of the IRA program to all women.

We encourage the Committee to consider these long overdue aspects of tax reform which hopefully begin to correct past inequities.

In conclusion, we would like to note that the suggestions made above not only involve a redistribution of taxes, but reflect the broader issue of freedom of choice. The choice to be a full-time mother today has become economically more and more difficult. We judge that a majority of mothers in this country want to feel free to decide whether to develop a career inside or outside the home without fear of government-imposed economic penalty. Tax policy should not inhibit a woman's choice to progress, to achieve, to nurture.

APPENDIX—LETTERS

I'm a working mother, albeit a very, very reluctant one. My daughter will be six months old tomorrow and not a day goes by without me grieving over losing these precious days with her. I have to work, but my husband and I are doing everything possible to get ourselves on our feet financially so I can work part time by autumn.

I have always strongly supported the women's movement and consequently was totally unprepared for the depth and strength of emotional commitment I felt for my daughter. I never even considered not returning to work so I wasn't prepared financially when I didn't want to resume my job. I am angry and frustrated and hurt. The five months I spent home with my daughter were the most loving, growing and exciting of my life.

I would like very much to receive your newsletter and work in any way I can to promote a more favorable economic alternative for women who want to remain home with their children.—K.R., Allentown, PA.

I work as a bank secretary, and am very grateful to have a job in such a good environment. I work out of economic necessity, however, and have always longed to be at home. Do you perhaps have a pamphlet suggesting ways a family can get along on one income and/or how I could stay at home and still earn money?—A.B., Bryan, OH.

I am writing in response to a recent Phil Donohue show I saw on mothers who stay at home. . . . The comment was made about hoping to provide an economical way for mothers who are forced to work to be able to stay home more with their children. I was very interested in this because I am in that situation. I have been living with my parents along with my two small children since August 1983 and my husband has recently filed for divorce. He has never provided or taken responsibility for us and I will get very little from the divorce.

My desire, of course, is to be able to market some kind of skill from home so I can be with my children more. . . . I do not want to leave my children any more than I have to, but I do have to provide for them.—N.N., Grand Rapids, MI.

I am recently a new mother of a beautiful baby boy. I do not want to go back to work because I feel there is no one that could give my baby the love and teachings I can give him. . . . I am hoping you are able to guide me in the right direction. Even though I want to raise my child at home, my husband and I can not afford it unless I find work I can do in my own home. I am an Electronic Assembler and have seven years of experience. I heard that some companies let you do work at home, but I do not know where to find the information. . . . I am also willing to do other work in my home. If you have any suggestions, please let me know.—E.V., Gloucester, NJ.

I'm hoping your group may have some suggestions for the situation my husband and I find ourselves in. We are hoping to soon buy a house, and have noted the luxury items in our budget that can be eliminated allowing more money for necessities—oil, mortgage, etc. Even with this cutting back we find that when we have children it will be necessary for me to work part time. We both feel strongly that it is so important to stay at home with children when they're young, but have found that I will be unable to do this on a full-time basis.

Does your group have any suggestions for . . . mothers who find themselves in this predicament? Are you aware of any jobs that allow mothers to work part time out of the home? . . . Any information you have would be greatly appreciated.—M.L.B., Roanoke, VA.

I am an older woman (fifty-one) . . . and a mother of seven children. I would dearly love to stay home and take care of things that need taking care of but because my husband is on disability I am unable to do so. I do housework for other people so you know what I do is not exciting, but it does help pay the bills.

I would really like to quit work and be home with my husband as he really should not be left alone, but I have no other choice. If you could help me to be at home and still earn money I would appreciate it very much.—B.J.D., Slippery Rock, PA.

THE 12TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE MILITARY RULE IN CHILE

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, today we take note of a sad and tragic anniversary. Another year of oppression and suffering in Chile has gone by. Another year of military rule has passed, and the situation in Chile is worse now than ever before.

The outcome of this repression is all too predictable. Just last week, anti-government riots left 10 people dead and scores more injured or arrested. Unless the government changes course, the country will be thrown into an unending cycle of increased violence, death, and repression.

Two weeks ago, the opposition, in a rare instance of unity and compromise, issued an 11-party accord, the National Accord for the Transition to Full Democracy. This responsible and reasonable proposal calls for a restoration of political rights and general elections at a date to be negotiated. It includes the extraordinary concession which allows the continuation of the Pinochet regime until such negotiations are completed. These accords go much farther than half way in efforts to reach an accord with the Chilean Government.

But it is becoming increasingly evident that the Pinochet regime's sole interest is in maintaining its own power. Despite the fact that virtually no one in Chile wants the military to stay on, they hold fast to the reins of government. The junta's only response to date to the National Accord has been to announce yesterday a renewal of its emergency powers. These powers enable Pinochet to restrict fundamental civil liberties. The armed forces are routinely engaged in predawn security sweeps, and they have detained some 40,000 suspected "subversives;" 600 political activists have been exiled to remote parts of the country and six opposition publications have been closed down. Instead of negotiating with the democratic opposition for a return to democracy, the Pinochet regime is intent on crushing it.

Last spring, I introduced along with Senators CRANSTON, HARKIN, and KERRY, and Representative WEISS a resolution calling for the restoration of democracy in Chile. It provides that until such a restoration of democracy, the United States should continue to deny all military and economic assistance to the Pinochet government and should vote against multilateral development bank loans and grants to the Government of Chile, except for humanitarian aid which aids the basic needs of the Chilean people.

Just this past summer, the United States reversed its policy of abstaining on loans to Chile—a policy the administration had adopted to protest the state of siege in Chile. While in theory, the state of seige has since been lifted, in practice, the most basic civil rights continue to be denied the Chilean population.

The people of Chile desire and deserve democracy. They are the heirs to one of the longest and most distinguished democratic traditions in Latin America. We can show our support for the restoration of democracy in Chile by opposing all loans to Chile until the government enters into a meaningful dialog with the opposition on returning Chile promptly to democracy.

Let me, at this time, call attention to an op-ed piece in today's New York Times by a former U.S. Representative from Massachusetts, Robert F. Drinan.

Father Drinan recently returned from a trip to Chile during which he saw a "deep frustration among the 11.8 million people who are humiliated by the torture, murder, harassment and the exiling of citizens."

As Father Drinan points out, the upcoming arrival of a new U.S. Ambassador to Chile presents an opportunity for the administration to change its policy and to press for civilian rule. In the poignant words to Father Drinan of a Chilean who was waiting in line to visit his imprisoned sons, "what happens to my sons depends on decisions to be made by the President of your country."

We must send a clear signal to the Government of Chile that the United States is committed to supporting freedom for the Chilean people. The United States should oppose future loans to that country until it is committed to restoring democracy. I urge the administration to uphold the democratic values of our country and to use our full influence to promote prompt restoration of democracy in Chile.

I ask unanimous consent that the full text of Father Drinan's article may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Sept. 11, 1985]

12 YEARS OF NIGHT IN CHILE

(By Robert F. Drinan)

WASHINGTON.—What will opposition forces in Chile do today, the 12th anniversary of the coup that brought Gen. Augusto Pinochet to power? I found no clear answers to that question during a visit last month. But I saw water cannons waiting to quell demonstrators. I saw, too, deep frustration among the 11.8 million people, who are humiliated by the torture, murders, harassment and the exiling of citizens who are heirs to one of the richest democratic traditions in Latin America.

I do know the United States has an important role in Chile's future. The arrival shortly of a new ambassador offers the Administration an opportunity to change its policy, in which pieties about a democratic transition are coupled with acts that bolster General Pinochet. We must now press unmistakably for civilian rule.

President Reagan owes Chilean citizens no less. The disintegration of freedom in the last dozen years has been appalling. In 1973, more than 50 percent of all workers belonged to labor unions; today, only 8 percent. In 1973, the external debt was $4 billion; today, $22 billion. The media are censored. Torture touches hundreds each year but intimidates millions. Political parties are suspended.

Aside from the United States, about the only source of hope in Chile is the Roman Catholic Church. At a dinner in the home of Raúl Silva Henríquez, the 78-year-old retired Archbishop of Santiago, this venerable figure reviewed his efforts to deter terror from 1973 to 1983 and concluded by saying that the Government's oppression of the church is as bad as persecution of the church in the Roman Empire in the early centuries of Christianity. Chile is harassing the church because, almost alone among social institutions, it represents the tortured, the exiled, the unemployed and the poor.

Nearly everyone in Chile wonders when the dark night will end. Now 68 years old, General Pinochet will not go voluntarily because he has no place to go. If he remains in Chile, he could be tried for countless crimes just as generals and admirals of Argentina have been tried. If he wants to go abroad, there is no place to go except possibly Paraguay.

I have hundreds of memories of the people I talked with. But the one I shall never be able to forget is a man I met in a line outside a jail in Valparaiso while waiting to visit 42 political prisoners.

He told me he was waiting to visit his two sons, both imprisoned on unspecified charges of subversion. After two years, no trial date had been set. Torture had been used, but he obviously did not want to talk about it. As I moved out of the line into the prison, he ended our conversation by stating, "What happens to my sons depends on decisions to be made by the President of your country."

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is closed.

IMMIGRATION REFORM AND CONTROL ACT OF 1985

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I understand they are checking on the Democratic side to see if there is any objection to proceeding to S. 1200. In the meantime, I think there would be no objection to the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee indicating that he intends, when the bill is before the Senate, to turn the managment over to the distinguished Senator from Wyoming. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, when the immigration bill comes up, and it appears it will come up in the next hour, as chairman of the Judiciary Committee I wish to designate the chairman of the Immigration Subcommittee, the assistant majority leader, Senator ALAN SIMPSON, as manager of this bill with entire control of it, including allotment of time and such other matters upon which a decision may have to be made.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished President pro tempore, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Senator THURMOND. We hope to have the bill before the Senate momentarily. We need to complete action on the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1985 hopefully by tomorrow evening, if not by Friday evening.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. DOLE. There will be, as advertised, a cloture vote at 2:30 p.m. on the Anti-Apartheid Act. It is my hope that cloture will not be invoked.

Late last evening another cloture petition was filed on a motion to proceed to the conference report. That vote will occur tomorrow. I am not certain what time, but it will be at approximately 2 o'clock p.m. We can work that time out.

I would hope if cloture is not invoked today, that on tomorrow, there would be a clear understanding that it will be the prerogative of the leadership to determine what is before the Senate. I would suggest that tomorrow's procedural vote will have the net effect of determining who will set the agenda of the Senate. As I recall, that is vested in the majority party. I hope tomorrow's vote will reflect the majority view.

Then we can move on to other matters that will be coming before the Senate.

I indicated there would be no rollcall votes on Monday, but we do hope to take up Superfund next week. We know there is administration opposition to the way the Superfund is funded in the legislation. I happen to share that view. In any event, since we have not been able to work out any compromise—I know Senators PACKWOOD, STAFFORD, and others on both sides have made that effort—and since the law expires at the end of this month, it seems to me we should move ahead and go to conference with the House as soon as they take action, and see if we cannot resolve the funding issue—without going to the higher level the House proposes in conference. That will be before us next week. It is my hope that we will then start taking up some of the appropriations bills. I will be meeting with Senators DOMENICI and HATFIELD on that issue, that general matter, sometime this week.

The Republican leadership of the House and Senate met with the President this morning. The President was pleased with the action taken by the Senate on Monday with reference to South Africa.

Mr. McFarlane clarified for some of us that on the Krugerrand issue, it is not necessary to get agreement from the other GATT countries, though they do feel it is necessary to consult with other GATT countries. I think those who thought this might be a device for delay will be pleased to have that information.

So what we have, in essence, is more than the bill that passed the Senate on an 80 to 12 vote. In addition, we have the President of the United States, who I understand is the only one in this Chamber who was elected to that office, speaking for the Nation rather than Senators from either side of the aisle. We are now clearly speaking with one voice in strong opposition to apartheid policies in place in South Africa.

In the view of this Senator, that is much superior to what the Congress might do without the President on board.

I would say to my colleagues, and I hope they would understand—it seems to me the best strategy is to postpone consideration of the conference report and agree that at some future date, if certain matters are not implemented as set out in the Executive order, we will recall the conference report. That, to me, would be a strategy that should have strong bipartisan support, as did the original Senate action.

Again, at 2:30, the cloture vote will occur.

TRADE LEGISLATION

We also discussed trade legislation with the President. I think most of this has been reported for the RECORD by the distinguished assistant majority leader [Mr. SIMPSON]. I am confident that we can work out some responsible, nonprotectionist trade measure with the administration. Hopefully it will be a measure that will enjoy bipartisan support, but if not, at least with Republican initiative and the House Members and the President going in the same direction.

TAX REFORM

The President is also very eager for tax reform. I would indicate in that area, though I have not discussed this with the chairman of the Finance Committee, that if we are expected to produce a tax bill in the Senate before sine die adjournment, we must ask the House to speed up consideration of the bill. We cannot be left in the position of not receiving the House-passed bill until sometime in November and be expected to have a markup in the Senate Finance Committee, 3 or 4 weeks of debate on the Senate floor, a Thanksgiving Day recess, a conference committee meeting, and a bill sent to the President by the end of the year. It does not take a genius to calculate the days involved.

We certainly want to support the President's efforts, as I think the majority of the American people do. So I urge my colleagues in the House, Democrats and Republicans, to speed up the process, not to just drop it in our lap in mid-November and say, "Well, now, if you want tax reform, go talk to the Senate leadership." We are prepared to move, but we cannot be asked to move if we do not have any time to complete action.

In addition to that, I think the President still believes that we should have done more on Federal spending reduction and he is eager, if necessary, to take issue with Congress on spending matters, including the line item veto, the rate of spending, and a balanced budget amendment which hopefully, we will have time to consider in October.

We indicated briefly that the debt ceiling would be a matter of some difficulty in the Senate. It is my understanding that as of maybe October 8 or 9, we are in real difficulty from the Government standpoint. The cash reserves could be as low as a couple of billion dollars, which is not very much for the Government, so it may necessary to call up the debt ceiling extension even sooner than we had anticipated. We could expect a number of amendments from both sides of the aisle. At best, it is always very difficult to pass, and I would guess that there will be a reluctance from Members on my left to vote to extend the debt ceiling unless a substantial majority of Members on my right vote to extend the debt ceiling. That is always a factor that could be important.

(Mrs. KASSEBAUM assumed the chair.)

Mr. DOLE. Madam President, again, I hope we are in a position to proceed to the Immigration Reform and Control Act, S. 1200.

ANTI-APARTHEID ACTION ACT OF 1985, H.R. 1460—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at this time the Senate lay aside the pending immigration bill and turn to the conference report on anti-apartheid, H.R. 1460, and that the time between the present time and 2:30 p.m. be equally divided for debate only.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COHEN). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Who yields time?

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I am voting against cloture because I believe that the most effective way to oppose apartheid in South Africa is through a unified approach by the U.S. Government as the leader of the free world. Immediate implementation of President Reagan's Executive order, without congressional dissent, is the best way to achieve that objective.

No one in the 97th, 98th, or 99th Congresses has been more active or vocal in opposition to racial injustice and supportive of civil rights than I. I cosponsored the Kennedy-Weicker anti-apartheid bill, joined the drive to improve the Voting Rights Act in 1982, led the fight to revive the Civil Rights Commission in 1983, and was active earlier this year in the battle to invigorate Justice Department enforcement of civil rights laws as embodied in the controversy over the nomination of Mr. William Bradford Reynolds.

President Reagan's Executive order constitutes a significant change in U.S. policy against apartheid. The President has more than met the Kennedy-Weicker bill halfway. The President's Executive order embodies about 85 percent of the bill which emerged from the conference committee. The major difference is the omission of provisions on delayed sanctions which can always be enacted at a later date if they are necessary when that time arises.

The fight against apartheid would be significantly weakened if the Senate involves cloture and pursues a scenario where the conference report is passed, vetoed by the President and that veto is sustained. At this moment, in advance of the cloture vote, it is problematic as to whether cloture will or will not be invoked. It is plain, however, that there are insufficient votes in the Senate to override a Presidential veto.

This issue is too important for politics-as-usual or for the frequent Washington approach to look for "winners" and "losers." I strongly disagree with Senator KENNEDY's statement that—

The Republican Party is at a crossroads on this issue, It must decide whether to be the party of Lincoln or the party of apartheid.

The real issue is: What U.S. policy would best work against apartheid? President Reagan spoke for Democrats and Republicans alike on Monday when he said:

America's view of apartheid is simple and straightforward: We believe it is wrong. We condemn it.

U.S. Ambassador Herman Nickel, returning to Johannesburg on Tuesday, was equally emphatic on calling on the white minority government there to move beyond "mere statements" and begin dismantling "key featues" of its apartheid system of racial segregation. He continued:

The injustices committed in the name of this system have gone on too long and they must stop.

Nothing is lost by deferring action on prospective sanctions—that is, sanctions to be implemented within a year from now, which is the biggest difference between the President's Executive order and the conference report which is before the Senate today. If those future sanctions are necessary, they can be enacted at any time in the coming months during this 99th Congess by bringing the issue back before the Senate, by imposing cloture, by adopting the conference report, and by overriding the Presidential veto should that be required.

I would be among the first to press for that action if and when it becomes necessary. At this time the most effective action against apartheid is to stand behind the President, the Chief Executive, who heads the only branch of Government which can get that job done on a day-in and day-out basis.

That is, after all, why the President, as Chief Executive, is principally in charge of foreign affairs. There should not now be a Presidential-congressional confrontation which tells the world that the U.S. Government cannot agree on a policy against apartheid.

I thank the Chair and I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, as I understand, the time has been equally divided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. KENNEDY. Does Senator WEICKER have 10 minutes remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eleven minutes.

Mr. KENNEDY. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, in just a very few moments, the Senate of the United States has a historic opportunity on a truly historic issue. I believe it will be recorded that this is a momentous time of extraordinary importance and challenge. Our votes this afternoon will live on far beyond today or tomorrow; they will live far into the future. I doubt, Mr. President, whether there will be any vote that will be cast in this Congress that will be more important, certainly for us as individuals or for us as Members of this body and for this body itself.

The basic question is whether we will bring a halt to a filibuster on this issue that deals with the kind of society that we are and the kind of policies that we want to reflect this Nation.

The Declaration of Independence talks about all men being equal. I think those of us in this body at this time would like to think of our Founding Fathers writing that phrase and saying "All persons are created equal." We personally, as Members of the Senate, should be able to cast our vote to reflect that concept and not be prevented from casting our vote because of a filibuster. Those who are involved in the filibuster at this time may be able to defer that vote for today and may be able to defer it for tomorrow. But this body is going to have to face up to this issue, if not this afternoon—and I hope it will be this afternoon—then it will face up to this issue before the end of this particular session of Congress.

We are reminded, Mr. President, that the President's actions were well-intentioned and I have not questioned his motivation. But they are ill suited to the challenge that this Nation faces with its policy toward South Africa.

We should be able to continue the work on this conference report that has been fashioned in a bipartisan way through the committees of the Senate that have been chaired by Republicans—in the Foreign Relations Committe with Senator LUGAR, and in the Banking Committee as well.

We have been able to fashion a bipartisan effort here with a vote to 80 to 8 to halt a filibuster and 80 to 12 in support of the legislation. The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, Mr. LUGAR, just last Friday pointed out that the Senate-House conference report is a carefully crafted bill developed by a bipartisan consensus of both Houses of Congress that has not been displayed since Vietnam. The legislation is designed to encourage reform in South Africa. It is intended to use its leverage in South Africa to bring about a less racist system of government.

Nothing has changed, Mr. President, since last Friday and we should have a chance to pass this bill. Otherwise, we are denying the opportunity for the Senate of the United States to put in a statute what our fundamental values and fundamental beliefs are, which I believe have been enshrined well in the Declaration of Independence, in the Emancipation Proclamation, and some other declarations which have stated our basic and more fundamental values.

Mr. President, I hope the Senate will vote in favor of cloture and that we shall move toward consideration of the conference report.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Mr. President, how much time remains to those speaking against cloture?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Five minutes, fifty-one seconds.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I support the President's belated decision to redirect American policy along the lines that the Congress has proposed.

There are several reasons why I believe this is the best course, but the most important reason is the effect in South Africa. If we are really concerned with practical results in that country, there is no question but that a unified position on the part of the President and the Congress has the best chance of success.

I have always felt that what was really needed in our South Africa policy was a change in the administration's thinking, and that our legislative actions were a second best alternative. For Congress to try to set a different course from the Executive was always doomed to have problems.

The greatest of these is the difficulty of communicating our purpose and intent to South Africa. No matter how well-concieved our legislation was—and I believe that it was well-conceived—no good can be accomplished if the relevant audiences in South Africa misunderstand our purposes. The potential for such misunderstanding is great, because of the differences in point of view in the two societies. For example, even today President Botha has chosen to see the pressure from America as a partisan political issue between Democrats and Republicans.

The message that we are trying to convey will have a better chance of getting through if it is delivered by a coordinated effort of the Congress and the Executive. It is essential that a new direction in American policy be reflected in the day-to-day actions and statements of the White House and State Department in Washington and our Embassy in South Africa. Without this, congressional actions will simply not produce the desired results.

I am aware that many Members are skeptical about the sincerity of the administration's change of position. I don't believe that to be the case. The President has not tried to undercut Congress' actions, but has aligned himself with them.

The other complaint is that the President's Executive order differs from the legislation in regard to various details of implementation. But I believe that the specifics of various penalties are much less important than the general direction of policy that is set, and the political will and commitment that lie behind it. Our purpose all along was to send a political message to South Africa, not to impose specific penalties for their own sakes. That purpose will be best accomplished by a united executive-legislative front.

If some have doubts about the administration's commitment to a new course, it should be remembered that Congress will not be surrendering its policy leverage. Many Senators will be watching the administration's implementation of its policy. Senator LUGAR, the majority leader, and many others in both parties will not let our agreed, bipartisan purposes be pushed aside. If at any point it is judged that the administration is not acting in good faith, there will be 80 votes waiting to support legislative action, on the current bill or another.

There is no question that there have been serious differences of opinion in the past between Congress and the administration over South Africa policy. The President has now responded to our concerns and offered us a chance to pursue a unified and coherent policy. I believe that this represents the best possible outcome, combining congressional sentiment with the capabilities of the executive branch. I believe that we should support the President's initiative, and devote our attention to ensuring that its promises are fulfilled.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I hope that this body would vote cloture this afternoon. I think the delay on this matter by our Nation has been sufficient so that we do not need any more days or weeks or months to make certain that the American message is heard clearly both in South Africa and throughout the world. For whatever concerns I have that were partisan in nature, for whatever concerns I might have insofar as a Presidential veto or that veto being overridden, they cannot come close to the sadness which each one of us feels as we witness the tragedy that goes on day after day in South Africa. It might inconvenience some Senators or some Congressmen or some Presidents insofar as how they react to this issue but others are losing their lives. That is their inconvenience. Schoolchildren are jailed every day, families torn apart, lives lost. And so really our jockeying for whatever position anyone seeks to achieve within a political sense is small potatoes indeed when compared to that human tragedy.

And it is a human tragedy, I might add, that we were willing to fight and die for some 40 years ago, only this time the participants are different and the color of the skin is different, but it is the same story. So it seems to me that the action of invoking cloture is the least that this great Nation can do in pursuit of its ideals. And the issue is not going to go away. It, obviously, is not going to go away by virtue of the actions of those who live in South Africa but just as important it will not go away on the floor of the Senate or in the House of Representatives. If this vote fails today, there will be another vote, and the measure itself will be up for a vote by the Senate in some other form on some other bill. It is my very deeply held feeling that the sooner we act the less lives are lost, the sooner we act the sooner the voices of moderation can speak. So do it today, do it tomorrow, but it is going to be done. I hope that we would have a pride as a body and as a Nation in having helped with the final result rather than having stood on the sidelines and watched others fight that lonely battle.

This is no way is meant to denigrate the efforts or words of our President, but he has not been in the forefront of this issue. And even what was achieved yesterday or spoken by him was done begrudgingly. It is with enthusiasm that each one of us should vote for cloture, and not for political advantage but to enhance the possibility of life in that nation so far away. I yield the floor.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I strongly urge all Senators and the majority leader to allow the Senate an opportunity to complete action on the anti-apartheid bill. The shameful events that have taken place in that tortured country since we last considered this issue in July have only served to reinforce the need for this legislation.

Since July, unrest has spread. Since July, many more black South Africans have died and many others have been detained without charge under the state of emergency. Since July, we have been confronted with daily reports of police beating of peaceful demonstrators with whips and dispersing them with tear gas. And since July, Mr. President, the South African Government has even banned funeral processions that mourn the victims of apartheid. Can you think of anything that would inflame passions more than that.

I acknowledge that the President, recognizing reality, has implemented by Executive order much of what is contained in the conference report. Yet this is the same President Ronald Reagan who just a few days ago in a radio interview credited the Botha regime with having eliminated segregation in South Africa. This is the same President Reagan whose administration has incredibly refused to renounce its discredited policy of "constructive engagement." I submit that perhaps we are contributing to destructive engagement. This is the same President who up until a few days ago so strongly opposed this legislation that he had vowed to veto it. I believe that this important step deserves the force of law. For let us not forget that just as quickly as this Executive order was issued, it could just as quickly be revoked.

The reality in South Africa commands our attention and demands our condemnation. The fact is that apartheid is segregation, and apartheid is still fully in place in South Africa. At birth all South Africans are classified according to the color of their skin, and that classification controls every aspect of their lives thereafter. It determines where they may live, where they may go to school, whether they must carry internal passes, whether they have any voice in government, and finally, whether they are even considered citizens in the land of their birth. If they are white, they are citizens. If they are black, they are not. With few exceptions, resorts, restaurants, buses, and parks all remain segregated. So despite whatever minor changes may have occurred in that system, let there be no misunderstanding about the fundamental nature of apartheid: it is racist—and it is wrong.

Now some have argued that we should not impose sanctions on South Africa when we have implemented no such sanctions on other countries with abominable human rights records—such as the Soviet Union. But that argument is wrong on two counts. First, we have imposed a wide variety of economic and diplomatic sanctions against the Soviet Union, and we have done so on a number of occasions over the years. But second, and even more important, South Africa is the only nation on the face of the Earth where the entire nature of one's existence is wholly and solely determined by the color of one's skin. And let's not forget that South Africa, as distinct from the Soviet Union and other nations whose human rights records are deplorable, lays claim to being part of the Western community of nations. But how can it be accepted as such when its social system is repugnant to Western principles and values?

I trust that every single Member of this body will agree that the South African scheme of apartheid is appalling, inhumane, and unjust. but simply agreeing with that assessment is no longer sufficient. We must demonstrate that our protest is more than a rhetorical exercise. I urge my colleagues to bring this debate to a close and to join the House in cause and conscience by overwhelmingly approving the conference report before us.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we may proceed for 2 additional minutes, and 1 minute be given to the Senator from California.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I appreciate that very much from the majority leader.

Mr. President, there are a number of important issues at stake in our vote today.

First, there is the substance of the sanctions measure. The conference report provides a carefully balanced package with clear procedures, minus the gaping loopholes of the President's Executive order. This measure is far more likely than the flawed Executive order to yield the results President Reagan has belatedly endorsed. Make no mistake about it; the President's action falls far, far short of the compromise congressional measure on the Krugerrand ban, on the minting of a U.S. gold coin to compete with that symbol of apartheid, on the application of mandatory "Sullivan" fair labor standards, on the banning of nuclear exports, and on the certain application of additional sanctions 12 months hence. Anyone who doubts this fact would do well to consider the sweeping endorsement of the President's action by Jerry Falwell, an apologist for the racist South African regime.

Second, there is a fundamental issue of how our laws are made. We are, indeed, a Nation of laws not men. We should not abandon the product of 3 year's labor in Congress out of deference to an 11th-hour effort to impose government by Executive fiat.

Finally, I would like to comment on the public assertion of my friend Senator DOLE that those of us who are pressing for completion of action on this bipartisan legislation are somehow guilty of partisanship. I would suggest that if those Senators who have already voted to adopt this legislation in the Senate, but whom are now trying to filibuster the conference report, are guilty of endangering the very strong bipartisan consensus we have built on this measure. I urge these colleagues to defend the bipartisan product of this institution rather than abandon this measure out of blind allegiance to the leader of their political party. The principles at stake and the substance of the legislation is simply too important to do otherwise.

Before concluding, I would like to indicate to my colleagues that as the floor manager for this side of the original legislation, it is my intention to press again and yet again for a vote on this conference report. Clearly, a majority of the Senate supports this bill. And clearly, we will adopt the conference report when the filibuster is finally broken. Senators who are considering a vote against this bill today—a bad vote in my estimation—would do well to consider this fact. We will call this vote up again on measures where we can ill-afford a filibuster such as the debt ceiling measure and the continuing resolution for certain appropriations.

We will not abandon this issue. And ultimately, we will prevail. I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to join together to hasten the day when this bill becomes the law of the land.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point a chart summarizing the major differences between the congressional legislation and the Executive orders.

There being no objection, the chart was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HON PRESIDENT'S EXECUTIVE ORDER ON SOUTH AFRICA IS SIGNIFICANTLY WEAKER THAN THE HOUSE-SENATE CONFERENCE REPORT

Conference report	Executive order
1. Immediate ban on krugerrand imports.	1. Vague, potentially time-consuming consultation of GATT trading partners (up to 90) re krugerrand ban, with no real assurance that ban will actually be implemented.
2. Ban on loans to public sector except for nondiscriminatory education, health and housing facilities in areas open to all.	2. Allows Secretary of Tresury to waive conference report ban if he determines loans "improve the welfare or expand the economic opportunities" of blacks (even by strengthening apartheid structures like segregated towns, bantustants, facilities).
3. Bans computers to security and apartheid-enforcing agencies including local and homeland governments, and to any government agencies not benefitting blacks.	3. Omits conference report ban on computer exports to agencies not benefiting blacks.
4. Bans nuclear exports.	4. Includes exception to conference report ban for nuclear exports that "protect the public health and safety", reduce proliferation risks or implement IAEA programs.

HON PRESIDENT'S EXECUTIVE ORDER ON SOUTH AFRICA IS SIGNIFICANTLY WEAKER THAN THE HOUSE-SENATE CONFERENCE REPORT—CONTINUED

Conference report	Executive order
5. President to recommend which of 4 sanctions (includng no new investment, ban on coal and uranium imports, ending of MFN status) to be enacted if South Africa doesn't make "significant progress" in 12 mo toward 8 conditions for dismantling of apartheid.	5. No comparable provision. Secretary of State appoints advisory commission to report in 12 mo on measures to promote peaceful change.
6. U.S. firms in South Africa to implement code of fair employment and antiapartheid practices. State Department monitors and publicly reports on performance, using onsite monitoring and consultation with black representatives.	6. U.S. firms only asked to "register" that they "adhere" to fair employment and antiapartheid principles. Omission of principle that businesses should lobby for repeal of apartheid laws. No official monitoring system to check on companies.
7. Earmarks $350,000 for direct legal and other aid to political prisoners and their families, investigations of political killings, and aid to black-led, nonviolent antiapartheid community groups.	7. Earmarks ⅓ of funds to be provided for human rights activities for "legal assistance" which could include research, infrastructure and other less "controversial" aid to blacks.
8. Allocates at least half of funds for education training and scholarships in South Africa for antiapartheid community group programs.	8. No earmark in scholarship aid for community groups.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. HART. President Reagan's announcement today of measures for South Africa may be a welcome departure from the failed policy of "constructive engagement" but it is not enough. Nor is it by any means sufficient reason to abandon the more comprehensive actions proposed by the Congress.

The Reagan administration's effort to derail legislation for broader, effective sanctions against the repressive minority regime in South Africa is cynical and self-defeating. Until now, the President opposed any moves by the Congress to put pressure on the South African Government. He still threatens to veto the bill before us today, a bill which has elicited broad bipartisan support. Only under the greatest pressure from American public opinion and the South African Government's absolute intransigence has the White House grudgingly agreed to take action. One has to be at least skipteical about the President's motives and ask why his proposals are suddenly being regarded by some as better than those which the Congress spent months deliberating.

In fact, the President is once more trying to dilute efforts to present a strong and resolute American posture in opposition to the archaic and dangerous policies being pursued by the Botha regime. At a time when unity and thoughness are urgently required, the President is trying to circumvent the carefully crafted, fully bipartisan measures agreed to by both Houses of Congress.

President Reagan's measures at best weaken the Congress' already modest intentions.

Our proposed law mandates additional sanctions against South Africa within a year if the Government fails to take adequate steps to end the monstrous injustices of apartheid. Under the President's plan, no additional sanctions are envisioned if South Africa's Government ignores the imperative for reform. Given the obvious tendency of this Botha regime to dismiss past efforts at U.S. pressure, this is a glaring weakness. It is accommodation and concession, not resolute action. Moreover, we can expect the south African Government to be unresponsive to these more limited pressures when it knows that Congress' tougher position has been circumvented by the President.

Mr. President, under the President's plan the single step that would have the greatest impact on the South Africa regime—the ban on Krugerrand sales—is inexplicably postponed. The President says he will take the issue before the GATT international group. How will this policy be received by other countries and by the black South African majority? They know that the United States did not consult GATT when the administration embargoed all trade with Nicaragua, a sanction far more severe than what anyone has contemplated for South Africa. Can this be anything other than a technique for killing this measure?

President Reagan has argued that more stringent economic measures would harm the South African majority. I submit that the President and his advisors would be well advised to ask the people of South Africa—those who stand to be affected—what they think before making such claims. I would draw his attention to a recent Gallup poll conducted in that country, in which almost 80 percent of blacks polled favored economic sanctions as a way to defeat apartheid. They will endure the sacrifice if necessary—such sacrifice pales into insignificance compared to what is endured today under the current system of oppression and disenfranchisement.

For months, we in the Senate, like thousands of Americans across the country, have struggled with what our response should be to the tragic events in South Africa. Shortly before the recent congressional recess, we voted to impose a set of reasonable and moderate economic sanctions to express our condemnation of apartheid. Our colleagues in the House of Representatives have done the same.

Mr. President, we have come too far not to take a strong and unequivocal stand against the dangers and evils of apartheid. I urge us to reject the President's half-hearted efforts at compromise and cast a substantive vote for freedom, for justice and for equality.

It has been suggested that the President's action eliminates the need for us to act. It has been suggested that South Africa is on the road to reform and that we must be patient and allow change to come about gradually.

Mr. President, none of us can set the timetable and agenda for another country's political change. But the majority of South Africans have made their stand. They have decided it is better to die for freedom than to live as slaves. It is a principle with which the Senate should identify, for it is one of the principles upon which this Nation was founded.

South Africa is undergoing an upheaval out of which apartheid must be destroyed and a new political order and social reality created. Apartheid cannot be reformed. One cannot reform a system that denies every basic right of citizenship to three-fourths of its people.

The Botha regime has already displayed its cynical disregard for the views and policies of the administration, revealing the essential bankruptcy and failure of President Reagan's policy of constructive engagement or—"constructive action" as the President is now calling his policy.

We must pressure the Pretoria regime—not to bring it to its knees but to bring it to its senses. Critics of the congressional sanctions charge that we will further destabilize South Africa. In fact, the inflexible and brutal policies of the white minority regime are provoking revolution and violence. For the United States to be irresolute at this point would be the greatest contribution we could make to instability in the country and Africa as a whole.

Why should there be any question today about proceeding with this bill? Why are some arguing that the President's proposals should substitute for those of the Congress? Surely those who argue this do not believe American interests are best served by the continuation of apartheid. Any they cannot truly be indifferent to the civil rights of black people. It is perhaps because the administration and its supporters genuinely do not understand that shoring up the white minority regime is no longer an option.

Even if South Africa does not yet face a full, armed revolution capable of overthrowing the Government, that day will certainly come if widespread, comprehensive reforms are not quickly enacted. If South Africa's Government through its blindness continues to set the country on a road where the only alternative to change is violent revolution, the turmoil that engulfs the region will not further U.S. interests. The longer violence continues, the more radical will be the process of change and the final outcome. Every day that we delay, compromise, and exhibit caution in place of courage, we diminish the chances for the emergence of a moderate pro-Western government that is truly representative.

Mr. President, the entire world is watching our actions today. Many of our friends and allies—as well as our adversaries—have come to see the Pretoria regime as the protected ally of the United States. No country in Africa, pro-Western or not, will have any regard for U.S. objectives or do anything but ridicule our pretensions to democracy, free enterprise, and support for human rights if we continue to sanction tyranny.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I intent to vote against cloture of debate on the conference report. I consider this to be a vote in support of the administration's new, more activist South Africa policy.

A week ago I was prepared to vote in favor of the conference report. I felt, as did many of my colleagues, that the President had not offered a reasonable alternative for moving the United States from passive observer to active participant in the effort to end South Africa's racist apartheid policy. We now have that alternative, albeit not identical to our own proposal, and I believe it is offered in good faith.

Therefore, I urge all of my colleagues to join me in this vote—those who are in favor of the conference report, as well as those who are opposed. We must not lose sight of the ultimate objectives we all seek in South Africa.

My predecessor, the late Senator Hubert Humphrey, told the Democratic National Convention in 1948 that the time had come to—

> Get out of the shadow of state's rights and walk forthrightly into the sunshine of human rights. People, all kinds and sorts of people, look to America for leadership—for help—for guidance.

Let us not forget, then, what is at stake in this national policy debate: 25 million human beings, 25 million nonwhites in South Africa who are denied by a white minority the human rights that we have the luxury of taking for granted.

Our goals—shared by the President and those of us on both sides of the issue—are to fulfill our global commitment to human rights, and at the same time to preserve South Africa as an economically stable government. In a very real sense South Africa's human rights victories will be our own.

The President's Executive order alone is not going to achieve these goals. Neither would Congress' proposal. To assume otherwise would be either egotistical or naive. But our President has taken a very distinct position against apartheid, and I have to believe that he is committed to changing the internal policy of the South African Government. We have had a disagreement with the President over how to go about doing it. I feel that we should give him a chance to see if his way works. If it does not, both he and we can consider further action.

Mr. President, our effort to protect South Africa is sensible. South Africa's strategic location, its contribution to the economic stability of the region, and its mineral wealth are all of great importance to the United States and our allies. We cannot, however, hope to preserve a nation which seems committed to an internal policy which carries the seeds of its own destruction. The rulers of South Africa cannot continue to govern successfully in the face of organized opposition by people denied their human rights through an institutionalized policy of apartheid—people who produce the minerals and provide the means for a stable economy.

Therefore, the administration's new antiapartheid policy is not anti-South Africa. It is not prorevolution. It seeks to preserve South Africa by promoting stability through elimination of the source of instability. In South Africa, our goals of national security and human rights are inseparable—and this new policy finally recognizes that fact.

Throughout the summer, the administration viewed such a policy as harmful to U.S. national security objectives—to the extent that the President would veto it if necessary. Until this week, the administration felt that it was necessary. Until this week, the administration felt that it was following a course of action which would preserve our policy objectives in South Africa by moving the South African Government away from its condemnable domestic practices.

This policy followed a two-track approach. On the one hand, it provided aid and assistance to the majority in order to improve their education and their economic position thereby preparing them for a wider and more responsible role in the affairs of the country. At the same time, it sent signals to the South African minority that they must provide the opportunity for majority participation in the Government. In short, eventual elimination of apartheid.

But the signals the policy sent were not to be so strong as to caused an overreaction by the rulers in South Africa which might cause them to cease the liberalization process—and not so strong as to upset the economy. The theory was that a weak economy would work mostly to the disadvantage of the blacks, the very people whose economic lot we were most interested in improving. The administration maintained that this policy was working, that the economic and educational posture of the blacks was better than it had ever been and that the Afrikaans had taken steps to bring the minority into full citizenship beyond those it had ever taken. The administration saw great hope in this. Enough hope to wait and see.

But the administration, and the South African Government, miscalculated. Progress may have been relatively comforting to the administration and the Afrikaans, but it was insufficient to meet the rising expectation of the blacks. Our policy failed completely to send a strong enough signal to the blacks. A signal of hope, a signal of strong support for their aspiration—their expectations. Though the administration had sufficient faith in the South African Government to wait and see, the majority of South Africans had not such delusions—and no such patience. The miscalculation that oppressed peoples have the same patient approach to reform as the oppressors—that the underprivileged will accept the proportion of wealth determined by the privileged has been repeated throughout history. Blacks in the United States would not accept integration at a "deliberate speed" determined by the whites. And blacks in South Africa won't either.

We in Congress recognized that there was an impending crisis in South Africa when we drafted the antiapartheid bill. We saw that the South African Government was not moving quickly or meaningfully to answer the rising cry for freedom. This sense of crisis was sharpened by the speech of "no concessions" made by President Botha in Duban on August 15. His "let them eat cake" call for division of Government into "own affairs"—irrelevant issues which blacks can decide—and "general affairs"—all the important decisions reserved for the whites—failed to recognize that the majority of the people of South Africa want to decide what affairs are or are not their business.

We were right. Now the crisis has broken full force. The South African economy, which we were so careful not to upset, is in shambles. The South African rulers moving toward reform—at a snail's pace—have imposed a state of emergency which eliminates virtually every civil right. Those who we hoped to move peacefully into the process of Government are in open rebellion. Deaths on both sides mount, and lines become more sharply drawn.

The President has recognized that the circumstances in September are vastly different than those in June or July. He has acted to implement the majority of the very measures we proposed. Now is not the time for cynical accusations or speculations of intent or motives. The fact is that we now have the substance of a policy—a policy built on the same assumptions and assessments we made when drafting the provisions of the conference report. We in Congress must also recognize that the circumstances are different. Those in Congress who sided with the administration's position that sanctions were counterproductive must now side with the President in his recognition that sanctions are in our vital national interest. Those in Congress who supported a legislated foreign policy last week when there was none, must now recognize that, this week, we have most of what we sought. Legislation is no longer relevant as a tool to force the issue.

As I have said, I personally supported broader, more stringent sanctions to bring the South African Government in line with reality. Some of my colleagues favored even harsher ones, still others favor no sanctions. There are as many opinions of the right combination as there are Members. It is clear we cannot draft or execute a coherent foreign policy from the Hill. We must only attempt to do it when we are in extremis. We were and we did. That is no longer the case. The President has now taken a position—he is now out ahead.

It is time to permit him to exercise his responsibility and allow him the flexibility to respond to day-to-day events. We must seize the opportunity to speak in one voice, administration and Congress, against the destructive racist policies of the South African Government. If we are genuine in our desire to serve the objectives of human rights and national security and not exploit the issue for partisan politics, we will vote no on cloture and thereby vote yes for the new antiapartheid foreign policy of the President.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I hope that cloture will not be invoked. I want to set the record straight on what this bill will accomplish. There have been all kinds of statements made to the effect that somehow if we just pass this bill, we will stop all the problems of South Africa—all the killings, kidnapings, and violence. That is simply not the truth. There is nothing we can do in this Congress—no legislation has been introduced—that would stop the bloodshed or immediately and apartheid in South Africa.

I would also say this: I think it is worth a great deal that the President is on board. But some of those who were willing to treat this as a bipartisan issue before, want to treat it as a partisan issue now that the President is on board.

I am willing to stack my civil rights record along with those of anyone else in this Chamber. But this is a foreign policy issue. I do not care when the President was converted. It could have been 1 minute ago. The President speaks for the Nation on foreign policy. Only once since the Kennedy Presidency has a foreign policy veto been overridden and that was on the War Powers Act, vetoed by President Nixon.

I think we ought to be declaring victory as I have said earlier. We ought to be saying to the President, "OK, we take your word for it," as my distinguished colleague from Kansas indicated. "But if you do not comply with the Executive order, if you are stalling on the Krugerrand, if there are not certain other actions taken as outlined in the Executive order within 90 or 120 days, then we are going to bring up the conference report."

Unfortunately, this is no longer an issue of what is good for South Africa. It has become a raw political issue. South Africa is secondary. I hope that my Republican colleagues who have good records in this area, as I believe the majority leader has, will understand that.

I am very proud the President is on board. I was one of those who was on the outside sort of pushing, and I was criticized for it by some. But he made the announcement himself and he made a powerful statement, not withstanding criticism by certain leaders in South Africa. I believe we are on the right track.

So let us give the President the credit he deserves and a chance to follow through. And let me say to those who may still have doubts: I give my word. If there is any slippage, if there is any turning back on the part of the White House or the President, then this Senator will call up the conference report and will support it and will do it when I first have good evidence that that is the case. Until then, we ought to be pleased the President is on board.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote.

CLOTURE MOTION

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has expired. Under the previous order, the hour of 2:30 p.m. having arrived, the clerk will state the motion to invoke cloture.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

CLOTURE MOTION

We, the undersigned Senators, in accordance with the provisions of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, hereby move to bring to a close debate on the conference report on H.R. 1460, the Anti-Apartheid Act of 1985.

Edward M. Kennedy, Lowell Weicker, Charles McC. Mathias, Alan Cranston, Claiborne Pell, Paul Simon, Howard Metzenbaum, Patrick Leahy, Jim Sasser, John D. Rockefeller, Dale Bumpers, Paul Sarbanes, Spark Matsunaga, George J. Mitchell, Albert Gore, Jr., Jeff Bingaman, J. Bennett Johnston, Bill Bradley, John Glenn, Max Baucus, J. James Exon, and Daniel P. Moynihan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent the quorum call has been waived. The question is, Is it the sense of the Senate that debate on the conference report on H.R. 1460 shall be brought to a close?

The yeas and nays are mandatory under the rule. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. EAST] and the Senator from California [Mr. WILSON] are necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SYMMS). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who wish to vote?

The yeas and nays resulted: yeas 57, nays 41, as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SYMMS). On this vote, there are 57 yeas and 41 nays. Three-fifths of the Senators duly chosen and sworn not having voted in the affirmative, the motion is rejected.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote and ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has moved to reconsider the vote and has asked for the yeas and nays. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to table the motion to reconsider and ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote. The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. EAST] and the Senator from California [Mr. WILSON] are necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber desiring to vote?

NOT VOTING—2

East	Wilson

So the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

(Note: The following proceedings occurred earlier and are printed at this point in the RECORD by unanimous consent:)

BUDGET ACT WAIVER

Mr. DOLE. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate turn to the consideration of Senate Resolution 218, the budget waiver to accompany S. 1200, the immigration bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mrs. KASSEBAUM). Is there objection? Hearing none, it is so ordered.

The clerk will state the budget waiver.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A Senate resolution (S. Res. 218) waiving section 303(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 with respect to S. 1200 as reported to the Senate Committee on the Judiciary.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution. Is there any objection?

The resolution (S. Res. 218) was agreed to, as follows:

S. RES. 218

Resolved, That, pursuant to section 303(c) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, section 303(a) of that Act be waived with respect to S. 1200 as reported the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1985, authorizes the payment of entitlement benefits commencing during fiscal year 1989 to cover the full estimated costs to the States for public assistance to the legalized aliens, and for imprisonment costs; and Senate consideration of S. 1200 at the present time would violate section 303(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, in that the bill would provide new spending authority described in section 401(c)(2)(C) of that Act to become effective during fiscal year 1989, before the first concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1989 has been adopted. A waiver of section 303(a) of that Act is necessary to provide for the timely consideration of S. 1200.

Mr. DOLE. I move to reconsider the vote.

Mr. SIMPSON. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

IMMIGRATION REFORM AND CONTROL ACT OF 1985

Mr. DOLE. Madam President, I understand the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts has no objection to moving to consideration of the bill itself.

Mr. KENNEDY. Madam President, the majority leader is correct.

Mr. DOLE. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now turn to consideration of S. 1200, the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1985.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will state the bill.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1200) to amend the Immigration and Nationality Act to effectively control the unauthorized immigration to the United States, and for other purposes.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

(The parts of the bill intended to be stricken are shown in boldface brackets, and the parts of the bill intended to be inserted are shown in italics.)

S. 1200

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE; REFERENCES IN ACT.

(a) SHORT TITLE.—This Act may be cited as the "Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1985".

(b) AMENDMENTS TO IMMIGRATION AND NATIONALITY ACT.—Except as otherwise specifically provided in this Act, whenever in this Act an amendment or repeal is expressed as an amendment to, or repeal of, a provision, the reference shall be deemed to be made to the Immigration and Nationality Act.

TITLE I—CONTROL OF ILLEGAL IMMIGRATION

PART A—FUNDING FOR IMPROVED ENFORCEMENT

SEC. 101. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR ENFORCEMENT AND SERVICE ACTIVITIES OF THE IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE AND WAGE AND HOUR ENFORCEMENT.

(a) TWO ESSENTIAL ELEMENTS.—It is the sense of Congress that two essential elements of the program of immigration control established by this Act are—

(1) an increase in the border patrol and other inspection and enforcement activities of the Immigration and Naturalization Service and of other appropriate Federal agencies in order to prevent and deter the illegal entry of aliens into the United States and the violation of the terms of their entry, and

(2) an increase in examinations and other service activities of the Immigration and Naturalization Service and other appropriate Federal agencies in order to ensure prompt and efficient adjudication of petitions and applications provided for under the Immigration and Nationality Act.

(b) INCREASED AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR INS.—Section 404 (8 U.S.C. 1101 note) is amended to read as follows:

"AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

"SEC. 404. (a) There are authorized to be appropriated to the Department of Justice for the Immigration and Naturalization Service—

"(1) for fiscal year [1986,] 1987, $840,000,000, and

"(2) for fiscal year [1987,] 1988, $830,000,000.".

(c) SENSE OF CONGRESS REGARDING ENFORCEMENT OF THE IMMIGRATION LAWS.—It is the sense of the Congress that—

(1) the immigration laws of the United States should be enforced vigorously and uniformly, and

(2) in the enforcement of such laws, the Attorney General should take due and deliberate actions necessary to safeguard the constitutional rights, personal safety, and human dignity of United States citizens and aliens.

(d) SUPPLEMENTAL AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR WAGE AND HOUR ENFORCEMENT.—There are authorized to be appropriated, in addition to such sums as may be available for such purposes, such sums as may be necessary to the Department of Labor for enforcement activities of the Wage and Hour Division and the Office of Federal Contract Compliance Programs within the Employment Standards Administration of the Department in order to deter the employment of unauthorized aliens and remove the economic incentive for employers to exploit and use such aliens.

SEC. 102. USER FEES.

(a) AUTHORIZATION OF CERTAIN USER FEES.—Section 281 (8 U.S.C. 1351) is amended—

(1) by amending the heading to read as follows:

"NONIMMIGRANT VISA FEES AND ALIEN USER FEES";

(2) by inserting "(a) NONIMMIGRANT VISA FEES.—" after "SEC. 281."; and

(3) by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(b) ALIEN USER FEES.—The Attorney General, in consultation with the Secretary of State, may impose fees on aliens with respect to their use of border facilities or services of the Service in such amounts as may reasonably reflect the portion of costs of maintenance and operation of such facilities and provision of such services attributable to aliens' use of such facilities and services.".

(b) CONFORMING AMENDMENT TO TABLE OF CONTENTS.—The item in the table of contents relating to section 281 is amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 281. Nonimmigrant visa fees and alien user fees.".

PART B—INCREASED PENALTIES FOR IMMIGRATION-RELATED VIOLATIONS

SEC. 111. UNLAWFUL TRANSPORTATION OF ALIENS TO THE UNITED STATES.

(a) CRIMINAL PENALTIES.—Subsection (a) of section 274 (8 U.S.C. 1324) is amended to read as follows:

"(a) CRIMINAL [PENALTIES.—(1) Any person who—] PENALTIES.—

"(1) Any person who—

"(A) knowing or in reckless disregard of the fact that a person is an alien, brings to or attempts to bring to the United States in any manner whatsoever such person at a place other than a designated port of entry or place other than as designated by the Commissioner, regardless of whether such alien has received prior official authorization to come to, enter, or reside in the United States and regardless of any future official action which may be taken with respect to such alien;

"(B) [knowingly] knowing or in reckless disregard of the fact that an alien has come to, entered, or remains in the United States in violation of law, transports, or moves or attempts to transport or move such alien within the United States by means of transportation or otherwise, in furtherance of such violation of law; or

"(C) [knowingly] knowing or in reckless disregard of the fact that an alien has come to, entered, or remains in the United States in violation of law, conceals, harbors, or shields from [detection] detection, or attempts to conceal, harbor, or shield from detection, such alien in any place, including any building or any means of [transportation,] transportation; or

"(D) encourages or induces an alien to come to, enter, or reside in the United States, knowing or in reckless disregard of the fact that such coming to, entry, or residence is or will be in violation of law, shall be fined, imprisoned not more than five years, or both, for each alien in respect to whom any violation of this subsection occurs. For the purposes of subparagraph (C) of this paragraph, employment (including the usual and normal practices incident to employment) by itself does not constitute harboring.

"(2) Any person who, [knowingly] knowing or in reckless disregard of the fact that an alien has not received prior official authorization to come to, enter, or reside in the United States, brings to or attempts to bring to the United States in any manner whatsoever, such alien, regardless of any official action which may later be taken with respect to such alien, shall, for each transaction constituting a violation of this subsection, regardless of the number of aliens involved—

"(A) be fined, or imprisoned not more than one year, or both; or

"(B) in the case of—

"(i) a second or subsequent offense,

"(ii) an offense done for the purpose of commercial advantage or private financial gain,

"(iii) an offense in which the alien is not upon arrival immediately brought and presented to an appropriate immigration officer at a designated port of entry,

"(iv) an offense during which either the offender or the alien with the knowledge of the offender makes any false or misleading statement or engages in any act or conduct intended to mislead any officer, agent or employer of the United States, be fined, or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.".

(b) MISCELLANEOUS AMENDMENTS TO SEIZURE AND FORFEITURE PROCEDURES.—Subsection (b) of such section is amended—

(1) in paragraph (1) before subparagraph (A) by striking out "is used" and inserting in lieu thereof "has been or is being used",

(2) by striking out "subject to seizure and" in paragraph (1) and inserting in lieu thereof "seized and subject to",

(3) by inserting "or is being" after "has been" in paragraph (2),

(4) by striking out "conveyances" in paragraph (3) and inserting in lieu thereof "property",

(5) by inserting ", or the Federal Maritime Commission if appropriate under section 203(i) of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949," in paragraph (4)(C) after "General Services Administration",

(6) in paragraph (4)—

(A) by striking out "or" at the end of subparagraph (B),

(B) by striking out the period at the end of subparagraph (C) and inserting in lieu thereof "; or", and

(C) by inserting after such subparagraph the following new subparagraph:

"(D) dispose of the conveyance in accordance with the terms and conditions of any petition of remission or mitigation of forfeiture granted by the Attorney General.";

(7) by striking out ": Provided, That" in paragraph (5) and inserting in lieu thereof ", except that",

(8) by striking out "was not lawfully entitled to enter, or reside within, the United States" in paragraph (5) and inserting in lieu thereof "had not received prior official authorization to come to, enter, or reside in the United States or that such alien had come to, entered, or remained in the United States in violation of law" each place it appears, and

(9) by inserting "or of the Department of State" in paragraph (5)(B) after "Service".

SEC. 112. FRAUD AND MISUSE OF CERTAIN IMMIGRATION-RELATED DOCUMENTS.

(a) APPLICATION TO ADDITIONAL DOCUMENTS.—Section 1546 of title 18, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by amending the heading to read as follows:

"§ 1546. Fraud and misuse of visas, permits, and other documents";

(2) by striking out "or other document required for entry into the United States" in the first paragraph and inserting in lieu thereof "border crossing card, alien registration receipt card, or other document prescribed by statute or regulation for entry into or as evidence of authorized stay or authorized employment in the United States";

(3) by striking out "or document" in the first paragraph and inserting in lieu thereof "border crossing card, alien registration receipt card, or other document prescribed by statute or regulation for entry into or as evidence of authorized stay or authorized employment in the United States";

(4) by inserting "(a)" before "Whoever" the first place it appears; and

(5) by adding at the end the following new subsections:

"(b) Whoever uses—

"(1) an identification document, knowing (or having reason to know) that the document was not issued lawfully for the use of the possessor,

"(2) a identification document knowing (or having reason to know) that the document is false, or

"(3) a false attestation, for the purpose of satisfying a requirement of section 274A(b) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, shall be fined, or imprisoned not more than two years, or both.

"(c) This section does not prohibit any lawfully authorized investigative, protective, or intelligence activity of a law enforcement agency of the United States, a State, or a subdivision of a State, or of an intelligence agency of the United States, or any activity authorized under title V of the Organized Crime Control Act of 1970 (18 U.S.C. note prec. 3481).".

(b) CONFORMING AMENDMENT TO TABLE OF SECTIONS.—The item relating to section 1546 in the table of sections of chapter 75 of such title is amended to read as follows:

"1546. Fraud and misuse of visas, permits, and other documents.".

SEC. 113. RESTRICTIONS ON ADJUSTMENT OF STATUS.

(a) REQUIRING LEGAL STATUS AT TIME OF APPLICATION.—Subsection (c) of section 245 (8 U.S.C. 1255), relating to nonimmigrants who may not adjust to immigrant status while in the United States, is amended to read as follows:

"(c) ALIENS FOR WHOM THIS SECTION DOES NOT APPLY.—Subsection (a) shall not apply to the following aliens:

"(1) An alien crewman.

"(2)(A) Except as provided in subparagraph (B), an alien who—

"(i) continues in or accepts unauthorized employment before the date of filing an application for adjustment of status,

"(ii) is not in legal immigration status on the date of filing the application for adjustment of status, or

"(iii) has failed to maintain continuously a legal status since the date of entry into the United States.

"(B) Subparagraph (A) shall not apply to an alien who is—

"(i) an immediate relative, described in section 201(b), or

"(ii) a special immigrant described in section 101(a)(27)(H).

"(3) An alien admitted in transit without a visa under section 212(d)(4)(C).".

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply to applications for adjustment of status filed before, on, or after the date of the enactment of this Act.

PART C—CONTROL OF UNAUTHORIZED EMPLOYMENT OF ALIENS

SEC. 121. MAKING EMPLOYMENT OF UNAUTHORIZED ALIENS UNLAWFUL.

(a) IN GENERAL.—(1) Chapter 8 of title II is amended by inserting after section 274 (8 U.S.C. 1324) the following new section:

"UNLAWFUL EMPLOYMENT OF ALIENS

"SEC. 274A. (a) MAKING EMPLOYMENT OF UNAUTHORIZED ALIENS UNLAWFUL.—

"(1) HIRING, RECRUITING, OR REFERRING.—It is unlawful for a person or other entity to hire, or to recruit or refer for a fee or other consideration, for employment in the United States an alien knowing the alien is an unauthorized alien (as defined in subsection (h)(2)) with respect to such employment.

"(2) CONTINUING EMPLOYMENT.—It is unlawful for a person or other entity, after hiring an alien for [employment] employment, to continue to employ the alien in the United States knowing the alien is (or has become) an unauthorized alien with respect to such employment.

"(3) DEFENSES.—

"(A) COMPLIANCE WITH EMPLOYMENT VERIFICATION SYSTEM.—A person or entity that establishes that it has complied in good faith with the requirements of subsection (b) with respect to the hiring, recruiting, or referral for employment of an alien in the United States has established an affirmative defense that the person or entity has not violated paragraph (1) with respect to such hiring, recruiting, or referral.

"(B) PRESUMPTION FOR EMPLOYERS OF 4 OR MORE EMPLOYEES.[—If] Except for purposes of subparagraph (2)(E) of subsection (d), if a person or entity is employing four or more employees and hires (or recruits or refers for a fee or other consideration) for employment in the United States an unauthorized alien, for purposes of paragraph (1) the person or entity shall be presumed to have known that the alien was an unauthorized alien unless the person or entity has complied with the requirements of subsection [(b) with respect to the hiring (or recruiting or referral) of that alien.] (b).

"(C) PRESUMPTION FOR LARGE RECRUITERS OR REFERRERS.—If a person or entity recruits or refers for a fee or other consideration more than four individuals in any 12-month period and recruits or refers for a fee or other consideration for employment in the United States an unauthorized alien, for purposes of paragraph (1) the person or entity shall be considered to have known that the alien was an unauthorized alien unless the person or entity has complied with the requirements of subsection [(b) with respect to recruiting or referral of that alien.] (b).

"(D) REBUTTAL OF PRESUMPTION.—The presumption established by subparagraph (B) or (C) may be rebutted through the presentation of clear and convincing evidence which contradicts the presumption.

"(4) VIOLATORS SUBJECT TO ORDER.—A person or entity that violates paragraph (1) or (2) is subject to an order under subsection (d).

"(b) EMPLOYMENT VERIFICATION SYSTEM.—Except as provided in subsection (c), the requirements referred to in subsections (a)(3) and (d)(2)(C)(i) are, in the case of a person or other entity hiring, recruiting, or referring an individual for employment in the United States, the requirements specified in the following four paragraphs:

"(1) ATTESTATION AFTER EXAMINATION OF DOCUMENTATION.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—The person or entity must attest, under penalty of perjury and on a form designated or established by the Attorney General by regulation, that it has verified that the individual is not an unauthorized alien by examining—

"(i) a document described in subparagraph (B), or

"(ii) a document described in subparagraph (C) and a document described in subparagraph (D).

A person or entity has complied with the requirement of this paragraph with respect to examination of a document if the document reasonably appears on its face to be genuine.

"(B) DOCUMENTS ESTABLISHING BOTH EMPLOYMENT AUTHORIZATION AND IDENTITY.—A document described in this subparagraph is an individual's—

"(i) United States passport;

"(ii) [certification] certificate of United States citizenship;

"(iii) certificate of naturalization;

"(iv) unexpired foreign passport, if the passport has an appropriate, unexpired endorsement of the Attorney General authorizing the individual's employment in the United States; or

"(v) resident alien card or other alien registration card, if the card—

"(I) contains a photograph of the individual or such other personal identifying information relating to the individual as the Attorney General finds, by regulation, sufficient for purposes of this subsection, and

"(II) is evidence of authorization of employment in the United States.

"(C) DOCUMENTS EVIDENCING EMPLOYMENT AUTHORIZATION.—A document described in this subparagraph is an individual's—

"(i) social security account number card (other than such a card which specifies on the face that the issuance of the card does not authorize employment in the United States);

"(ii) certificate of birth in the United States or establishing United States nationality at birth, which certificate the Attorney General finds, by regulation, to be acceptable for purposes of this section; or

"(iii) other documentation evidencing authorization of employment in the United States which the Attorney General finds, by regulation, to be acceptable for purposes of this section.

"(D) DOCUMENTS ESTABLISHING IDENTITY OF INDIVIDUAL.—A document described in this subparagraph is an individual's—

["(i) border crossing card or similar alien identification document issued by the Attorney General to aliens and designated for use for this purpose;]

["(ii)] "(i) driver's license or similar document issued for the purpose of identification by a State, if it contains a photograph of the individual or such other personal identifying information relating to the individual as the Attorney General finds, by regulation, sufficient for purposes of this section; or

["(iii)] "(ii) in the case of individuals under 16 years of age or in a State which does not provide for issuance of an identification document (other than a driver's license) referred to in clause (ii), documentation of personal identity of such other type as the Attorney General finds, by regulation, provides a reliable means of identification.

"(2) INDIVIDUAL ATTESTATION OF EMPLOYMENT AUTHORIZATION.—The individual must attest, under penalty of perjury on the form designated or established for purposes of paragraph (1), that the individual is a citizen or national of the United States, an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence, or an alien who is authorized under this Act or by the Attorney General to be hired, recruited, or referred for such employment.

"(3) RETENTION OF VERIFICATION FORM.—After completion of such form in accordance with paragraphs (1) and (2), the person or entity must retain the form and make it available for inspection by officers of the Service or the Department of Labor during a period beginning on the date of the hiring, recruiting, or referral of the individual and ending—

"(A) in the case of the recruiting or referral for a fee or other consideration (without hiring) of an individual, three years after the date of the recruiting or referral, and

"(B) in the case of the hiring of an individual—

"(i) three years after the date of such hiring, or

"(ii) one year after the date the individual's employment is terminated, whichever is later.

"(4) UNIFORM VERIFICATION POLICY.—The person or entity must apply the requirements of the previous three paragraphs uniformly to all individuals hired (or recruited or referred for a fee or other consideration).

"(5) COPYING OF DOCUMENTATION PERMITTED.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the person or entity may copy a document presented by an individual pursuant to this subsection and may retain the copy, but only (except as otherwise permitted under law) for the purpose of complying with the requirements of this subsection.

"(6) LIMITATION ON USE OF ATTESTATION FORM.—A form designated or established by the Attorney General under this subsection and any information contained in or appended to such form, may not be used for purposes other than for enforcement of this Act and sections 1001, 1028, 1546, and 1621 of title 18, United States Code.

"(c) EVALUATION AND CHANGES IN EMPLOYMENT VERIFICATION SYSTEM.—

"(1) PRESIDENTIAL MONITORING AND IMPROVEMENTS IN SYSTEM.—

"(A) MONITORING.—The President shall provide for the monitoring and evaluation of the degree to which the employment verification system established under subsection (b) provides a secure system to determine employment eligibility in the United States and shall examine the suitability of existing Federal and State identification systems for use for this purpose.

"(B) IMPROVEMENTS TO ESTABLISH SECURE SYSTEM.—To the extent that the system established under subsection (b) is found not to be a secure system to determine employment eligibility in the United States, the President shall, subject to paragraph (3) and taking into account the results of any demonstration projects conducted under paragraph (4), implement such changes in (including additions to) the requirements of subsection (b) as may be necessary to establish a secure system to determine employment eligibility in the United States. [Such] Except as provided in subparagraph (C), such changes in the system may be implemented only if the changes conform to the requirements of paragraph (2).

"(C) REQUIRING USE OF COUNTERFEIT-RESISTANT SOCIAL SECURITY CARDS.—The President may require, without regard to paragraph (2), that the only social security account number cards which may be presented in order to comply with subsection (b)(1)(C)(i) are such cards as are in a counterfeit-resistant form consistent with the second sentence of section 205(c)(2)(D) of the Social Security Act.

"(2) RESTRICTIONS ON CHANGES IN SYSTEM.—Except as provided in paragraph (1)(C), any change the President proposes to implement under paragraph (1) in the verification system must be designed in a manner so the verification system, as so changed, meets the following requirements:

"(A) RELIABLE DETERMINATION OF IDENTITY.—The system must be capable of reliably determining whether—

"(i) a person with the identity claimed by an employee or prospective employee is eligible to work, and

"(ii) the employee or prospective employee is claiming the identity of another individual.

"(B) USING OF COUNTERFEIT-RESISTANT DOCUMENTS.—If the system requires that a document be presented to or examined by an employer, the document must be in a form which is resistant to counterfeiting and tampering.

"(C) LIMITED USE OF SYSTEM.—Any personal information utilized by the system may not be made available to Government agencies, employers, and other persons except to the extent necessary to verify that an individual is not an unauthorized alien.

"(D) PRIVACY OF INFORMATION.—The system must protect the privacy and security of personal information and identifiers utilized in the system.

"(E) LIMITED DENIAL OF VERIFICATION.—A verification that an employee or prospective employee is eligible to be employed in the United States may not be withheld or revoked under the system for any reason other than that the employee or prospective employee is an unauthorized alien.

"(F) LIMITED USE FOR LAW ENFORCEMENT PURPOSES.—The system may not be used for law enforcement purposes, other than for enforcement of this Act or sections 1001, 1028, 1546, and 1621 of title 18, United States Code.

"(G) RESTRICTION ON USE OF NEW DOCUMENTS.—If the system requires individuals to present a new card or other document (designed specifically for use for this purpose) at the time of hiring, recruitment, or referral, then such document may not be required to be presented for any purpose other than under this Act (or enforcement of sections 1001, 1028, 1546, and 1621 of title 18, United States Code) nor to be carried on one's person.

"(3) NOTICE TO CONGRESS BEFORE IMPLEMENTING CHANGES.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—The President may not implement any change under paragraph (1) unless at least—

"(i) 60 days, or

"(ii) in the case of a major change described in subparagraph (D), two years, before the date of implementation of the change, the President has prepared and transmitted to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives and to the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate a written report setting forth the proposed change. The President promptly shall cause to have printed in the Federal Register the substance of any major change (described in subparagraph (D)) proposed and reported to Congress.

"(B) CONTENTS OF REPORT.—In any report under subparagraph (A) the President shall include recommendations for the establishment of civil and criminal sanctions for unauthorized use or disclosure of the information or identifiers contained in such system.

"(C) CONGRESSIONAL REVIEW OF MAJOR CHANGES.—

"(i) HEARINGS AND REVIEW.—The Committees on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives and of the Senate shall cause to have printed in the Congressional Record the substance of any major change described in subparagraph (D), shall hold hearings respecting the feasibility and desirability of implementing such a change, and, within the two year period before implementation, shall report to their respective Houses findings on whether or not such a change should be implemented.

"(ii) CONGRESSIONAL ACTION.—No major change may be implemented unless the Congress specifically provides, in an appropriations or other Act, for funds for implementation of the change.

"(D) MAJOR CHANGES REQUIRING TWO YEARS NOTICE AND CONGRESSIONAL REVIEW.—As used in this paragraph, the term 'major change' means a change which would—

"(i) require an individual to present a new card or other document (designed specifically for use for this purpose) at the time of hiring, recruitment, or referral, or [“(ii) provide for a telephone verification system similar to that described under paragraph (4)(B)(ii);]

"(ii) provide for a telephone verification system under which an employer, recruiter, or referrer must transmit to a Federal official information concerning the immigration status of prospective employees and the official transmits to the person, and the person must record, a verification code; but does not include a change in any card used for accounting purposes under the Social Security Act.

"(4) DEMONSTRATION PROJECTS.—

"(A) AUTHORITY.—The President may undertake demonstration projects (consistent with paragraph (2)) of different changes in the requirements of subsection (b). No such project may extend over a period of longer than three years.

"(B) REPORTS ON PROJECTS.—The President shall report to the Congress on the results of demonstration projects conducted under this paragraph.

"(d) COMPLIANCE.—

"(1) COMPLAINTS AND INVESTIGATIONS.—The Attorney General shall establish procedures—

"(A) for individuals and entities to file written, signed complaints respecting potential violations of subsection (a),

"(B) for the investigation of those complaints which, on their face, have a substantial probability of validity,

"(C) for the investigation of such other violations of subsection (a) as the Attorney General determines to be appropriate, and

"(D) for the designation in the Service of a unit which has, as its primary duty, the prosecution of cases of violations of subsection (a) under this subsection.

"(2) ORDER FOR VIOLATIONS.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—If, after notice and opportunity to request a hearing respecting a violation of subsection (a), the immigration judge determines, upon the preponderance of the evidence received, that a person or entity named in the complaint has violated subsection (a), the judge shall state his findings of fact and issue and cause to be served on such person or entity an order.

"(B) CIVIL PENALTY AS PART OF ORDER.—An order under subparagraph (A) shall require the person or entity to cease and desist from such violations and to pay a civil penalty in an amount of—

"(i) not less than $100 and not more than $2,000 for each unauthorized alien with respect to whom a violation of subsection (a) occurred,

"(ii) not less than $2,000 and not more than $5,000 for each such alien in the case of a person or entity previously subject to an order under this subsection, or

"(iii) not less than $3,000 and not more than $10,000 for each such alien in the case of a person or entity which has engaged or is engaging in a pattern or practice of such violations.

"(C) ADDITIONAL REMEDIES AS PART OF ORDER.—An order under subparagraph (A) may require the person or entity—

"(i) to comply with the requirements of subsection (b) (or subsection (c) if applicable) with respect to individuals hired (or recruited or referred for employment for a fee or other consideration) during a period of up to three years, and

"(ii) to take such other remedial action as is appropriate.

"(D) DISMISSAL OF COMPLAINTS.—If upon the preponderance of the evidence taken, the judge is of the opinion that the person or entity named in the complaint has not violated subsection (a), the judge shall state his findings of fact and shall issue an order dismissing the complaint.

"(E) CRIMINAL PENALTY.—Any person or entity which, after having been previously required to pay a civil penalty under subparagraph (B)(iii) for a pattern or practice of violations of subsection (a), again engages in such a pattern or practice shall be fined not more than $3,000 for each unauthorized alien with respect to whom a violation of subsection (a) occurred, imprisoned for not more than six months for the entire pattern or practice, or both, notwithstanding the provisions of any other Federal law relating to fine levels.

"(3) AUTHORITY IN INVESTIGATIONS.—In conducting investigations and hearings under this subsection—

"(A) immigration officers and immigration judges shall have reasonable access to examine evidence of any person or entity being investigated, and

"(B) immigration judges, by subpoena, may compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of evidence at any designated place or hearing.

In case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpoena lawfully issued under this paragraph and upon application of the Attorney General, an appropriate district court of the United States may issue an order requiring compliance with such subpoena and any failure to obey such order may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof.

"(4) TREATMENT OF CERTAIN SUBDIVISIONS.—In applying this subsection in the case of a person or entity composed of distinct, physically separate subdivisions each of which provides separately for the hiring, recruiting, or referring for [employment] employment, without reference to the practices of, [or] and not under the control [of,] of or common control with, another subdivision, each such subdivision shall be considered a separate person or entity.

"(5) ADMINISTRATIVE APPELLATE REVIEW.—The Attorney General may provide for the administrative appellate review of the determination of an immigration judge under this subsection by an appropriate administrative appellate body.

"(e) JUDICIAL REVIEW OF ORDERS.—Judicial review of orders under this subsection shall be exclusively under the procedures provided in chapter 158 of title 28, United States Code, except as follows:

"(1) FILING DEADLINE.—Petitions for review may be filed not later than 45 days after the date of the final order.

"(2) VENUE.—The venue of any petition for review under this subsection shall be in the judicial circuit in which the administrative proceedings before an [immigrant] immigration judge were conducted in whole or in part, or in the judicial circuit wherein is the residence of the petitioner, but not in more than one circuit.

"(3) SERVICE.—In the case of review sought by an entity other than the Service, the action shall be brought against the Immigration and Naturalization Service as respondent and service of the petition to review shall be made upon the Attorney General and upon the official of the Service in charge of the Service district in which the office of the clerk of the court is located.

"(4) SUBSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.—The petition shall be determined solely upon the administrative record upon which the order is based and the immigration judge's findings of fact, if supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole, shall be conclusive.

"(5) TYPEWRITTEN BRIEFS.—It shall not be necessary to print the record or any part thereof, or the brief, and the court shall review the proceedings on a typewritten record and on typewritten briefs.

In any judicial review of an immigration judge's order under this subsection, the court may provide for such order of enforcement as may be appropriate. Section 279 shall not apply to causes arising under this section.

"(f) ENFORCEMENT OF ORDERS.—If a person or entity fails to comply with a final order issued under subsection (d) against the person or entity, the Attorney General shall file a suit to seek compliance with the order in any appropriate district court of the United States. In any such suit, the validity and appropriateness of the final order imposing the assessment shall not be subject to review.

"(g) MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS.—

"(1) DOCUMENTATION.—In providing documentation or endorsement of authorization of aliens (other than aliens lawfully admitted for permanent residence) authorized to be employed in the United States, the Attorney General shall provide that any limitations with respect to the period or type of employment or employer shall be conspicuously stated on the documentation or endorsement.

"(2) PREEMPTION.—The provisions of this section preempt any State or local law imposing civil or criminal sanctions (other than through licensing and similar laws) upon those who employ, or recruit or refer for a fee or other consideration for employment, unauthorized aliens.

"(h) DEFINITIONS.—As used in this section—

"(1) IMMIGRATION JUDGE.—The term 'immigration judge' means an immigration officer specially designated to hear cases under this section.

"(2) UNAUTHORIZED ALIEN.—The term 'unauthorized alien' means, with respect to the employment of an alien at a particular time, that the alien is not at that time either (A) an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence, or (B) authorized to be so employed by this Act or by the Attorney General.".

(b) EFFECTIVE DATES.—(1) Except as otherwise provided in this subsection or subsection (c), the amendment made by subsection (a) shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act.

(2) Paragraph (1) of section 274A(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, making unlawful the hiring, recruiting, or referral of unauthorized aliens for employment, shall only apply to the hiring, recruiting, or referral of individuals occurring after the date of the enactment of this Act.

(3) Paragraph (2) of section 274A(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, relating to making unlawful the continuing employment of unauthorized aliens, shall only apply to aliens who are hired after the date of the enactment of this Act.

(4) Section 274A(g)(2) of the Immigration and Nationality Act takes effect on the first day of the seventh month beginning after the date of the enactment of this Act.

(c) PROMULGATION OF REGULATIONS AND EDUCATION AND WARNING PERIOD.—(1) The Attorney General shall, not later than the first day of the seventh month beginning after the date of the enactment of this Act, first issue, on an interim or other basis, such regulations as may be necessary in order to implement section 274A of the Immigration and Nationality Act.

(2) The Attorney General, in cooperation with the Secretaries of Agriculture, Commerce, Health and Human Services, Labor, and the Treasury and the Administrator of the Small Business Administration and with organizations representing or assisting employers, employees, and employment agencies, shall take steps to broadly disseminate forms and information and provide for public education respecting the provisions of section 274A of the Immigration and Nationality Act.

(3) Where the Attorney General has reason to believe that a person or entity may have violated subsection (a) of section 274A of the Immigration and Nationality Act during the six-month period beginning on the first day of the first month beginning after the date of the enactment of this Act, the Attorney General shall notify such person or entity of such belief and shall not conduct any proceeding, nor impose any order, under such section on the basis of such alleged violation or violations.

(4) Where the Attorney General has reason to believe that a person or entity may have violated subsection (a) of section 274A of the Immigration and Nationality Act during the subsequent six-month period, the Attorney General shall, in the first instance of such an alleged violation (or violations) occurring during such period, provide a warning to the person or entity that such a violation or violations may have occurred and shall not conduct any proceeding, nor impose any penalty, under such section on the basis of such alleged violation or violations.

(d) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS TO MIGRANT AND SEASONAL AGRICULTURAL WORKER PROTECTION ACT.—(1) The Migrant and Seasonal Agricultural Worker Protection Act (Public Law 97-470) is amended—

(A) by striking out "101(a)(15)(H)(ii)" in paragraphs (8)(B) and (10)(B) of section 3 (29 U.S.C. 1802) and inserting in lieu thereof "101(a)(15)(N)";

(B) in section 103(a) (29 U.S.C. 1813(a))—

(i) by striking out "or" at the end of paragraph (4),

(ii) by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (5) and inserting in lieu thereof "; or", and

(iii) by adding at the end the following new paragraph:

"(6) has been found to have violated paragraph (1) or (2) of section 274A(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act.";

(C) by striking out section 106 (29 U.S.C. 1816) and the corresponding item in the table of contents; and

(D) by striking out "section 106" in section 501(b) (29 U.S.C. 1851(b)) and by inserting in lieu thereof "paragraph (1) or (2) of section 274A(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act".

(2) The amendments made by paragraph (1) shall apply to the employment, recruitment, referral, or utilization of the services of an individual occurring on or after the first day of the seventh month beginning after the date of the enactment of this Act.

(e) CONFORMING AMENDMENT TO TABLE OF CONTENTS.—The table of contents is amended by inserting after the item relating to section 274 the following new item:

"Sec. 274A. Unlawful employment of aliens.".

(f) REPORTS ON IMPLEMENTATION OF SECTION.—For monitoring and study respecting the enactment of this section (including actions taken on any discrimination in employment which might result from enactment of this section), see section 402 of this Act.

SEC. 122. TEMPORARY AGRICULTURAL WORKER PROGRAM.

(a) PROVIDING NEW "N" NONIMMIGRANT CLASSIFICATION FOR TEMPORARY AGRICULTURAL WORKERS.—Section 101(a)(15) (8 U.S.C. 1101(a)) is amended—

(1) by inserting "other than agricultural services described in section 216(h)(1)" in subparagraph (H)(ii) after "temporary services or labor",

(2) by striking out "or" at the end of subparagraph (L),

(3) by striking out the period at the end of subparagraph (M) and inserting in lieu thereof "; or", and

(4) by adding at the end the following new subparagraph:

"(N) an alien, having a residence in a foreign country which he has no intention of abandoning, who is coming temporarily to the United States under section 216 to perform agricultural services (as defined in section 216(h)(1)) of a temporary or seasonal nature.".

(b) INVOLVEMENT OF DEPARTMENTS OF LABOR AND AGRICULTURE IN TEMPORARY AGRICULTURAL WORKER PROGRAM.—Section 214(c) (8 U.S.C. 1184(c)) is amended—

(1) by striking out "or (L)" in the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof ", (L), or (N)", and

(2) by adding at the end the following: "For purposes of this subsection the term 'appropriate agencies of Government' means the Department of Labor and includes, with respect to nonimmigrants under section 101(a)(15)(N), the Department of Agriculture. The provisions of section 216 shall apply to the question of importing any alien as a nonimmigrant under section 101(a)(15)(N).".

(c) ADMISSION OF TEMPORARY AGRICULTURAL WORKERS.—Chapter 2 of title II is amended by adding after section 215 the following new section:

"ADMISSION OF TEMPORARY AGRICULTURAL WORKERS

"SEC. 216. (a) APPLICATION FOR LABOR CERTIFICATION.—

"(1) REQUIREMENT.—A petition to import an alien as a temporary agricultural worker (as defined in subsection (h)(3)) may not be approved by the Attorney General unless the petitioner has applied to the Secretary of Labor for a certification that—

"(A) there are not sufficient [workers] eligible individuals who are able, willing, and qualified and who will be available at the time and place needed to perform the services involved in the petition, and

"(B) the employment of the alien in such services will not adversely affect the wages and working conditions of [workers] eligible individuals in the United States similarly employed.

"(2) PAYMENT OF REQUIRED FEES.—The Secretary of Labor may require by regulation, as a condition of applying for the certification, the payment of a fee to recover the reasonable costs of processing applications for certification.

"(b) CONDITIONS FOR DENIAL OF LABOR CERTIFICATION.—The Secretary of Labor may not issue a certification under subsection (a) with respect to an employer if the conditions described in [paragraph (1)] that subsection are not met or if any of the following conditions exist:

"(1) LABOR DISPUTE.—There is a strike or lockout in the course of a labor dispute which, under the regulations, precludes such certification.

"(2) VIOLATION OF TERM OF PREVIOUS CERTIFICATION.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—The employer at any time during the previous two-year period employed temporary agricultural workers and the Secretary of Labor has determined, after notice and opportunity for a hearing, that the employer at any time during that period—

"(i) substantially violated an essential term or condition of the labor certification with respect to the employment of domestic or nonimmigrant workers, or

"(ii) has not paid [any] every penalty [for such violations] which [have] has been assessed by the Secretary of [Labor] Labor for a violation of a term or condition of such labor certification.

"(B) DISQUALIFICATION LIMITED TO ONE YEAR.—No employer may be denied certification under subparagraph (A) for more than one year for any violation described in that subparagraph.

"(3) NOT PROVIDING FOR WORKERS' COMPENSATION.—The employer has not provided the Secretary with satisfactory assurances that if the employment for which the certification is sought is not covered by State workers' compensation law, the employer will provide, at no cost to the worker, insurance covering injury and disease arising out of and in the course of the worker's employment which will provide benefits at least equal to those provided under the State workers' compensation law for comparable employment.

"(c) RULES CONCERNING APPLICATIONS FOR LABOR CERTIFICATION.—The following rules shall apply in the case of the filing and consideration of an application for a labor certification for a temporary agricultural worker:

"(1) DEADLINE FOR FILING APPLICATIONS.—The Secretary of Labor may not require that the application be filed more than 65 days before the first date the employer requires the services of the worker.

"(2) NOTICE WITHIN 14 DAYS OF DEFICIENCIES.—

"(A) NOTICE OF DEFICIENCIES.—The application shall be considered to have met the requirements of subsection (a)(1) (other than subparagraph (A) thereof) unless the Secretary of Labor, within 14 days of the date of filing the application, notifies the employer filing the application that the application does not meet the requirements.

"(B) SUBMITTAL OF MODIFIED APPLICATION.—If the application does not meet the requirements, the notice shall include the reasons therefor and the Secretary shall permit the employer an opportunity for the prompt resubmission of a modified application.

"(3) ISSUANCE OF CERTIFICATION.—

"(A) IF CONDITIONS MET.—The Secretary of Labor shall make, not later than 20 days before the date such services are first required to be performed, the certification described in subsection (a)(1) if—

"(i) the employer has complied with the requirements for certification (including the recruitment of eligible individuals as prescribed by regulation), and

"(ii) the employer does not actually have, or has not been provided with referrals of, eligible individuals who have agreed to perform such services on the terms and conditions of a job offer which meet requirements of regulations.

"(B) CONTINUED ACCEPTANCE OF APPLICANTS.—A labor certification under this section remains effective only if the employer continues to accept for employment, until the date the temporary agricultural workers depart for work with the employer, eligible individuals who apply or are referred to the employer.

"(4) PROVIDING HOUSING ALLOWANCE.—In the employer's complying with terms and conditions of employment respecting the furnishing of housing, the employer shall be permitted, at the employer's option and instead of providing for suitable housing accommodations, to substitute payment of a reasonable housing allowance, but only if suitable housing is otherwise available in the proximate area of employment.

"(d) ROLES OF AGRICULTURAL ASSOCIATIONS.—

"(1) PERMITTING FILING BY AGRICULTURAL ASSOCIATIONS.—A petition to import an alien as a temporary agricultural worker, and an application for a labor certification with respect to such a worker, may be filed by an association representing agricultural producers which use agricultural services.

"(2) TREATMENT OF ASSOCIATIONS ACTING AS EMPLOYERS.—If such an association is a joint or sole employer of temporary agricultural workers, the certifications granted under this section to the association may be used for the certified job opportunities of any of its producer members and such workers may be transferred among its member producers to perform agricultural services of a temporary or seasonal nature for which the certifications were granted.

"(3) TREATMENT OF VIOLATIONS.—

"(A) MEMBER'S VIOLATION DOES NOT NECESSARILY DISQUALIFY ASSOCIATION OR OTHER MEMBERS.—If an individual producer member of such an association is determined to have committed an act that under subsection (b)(2) results in the denial of certifications with respect to the member, the denial shall apply only to that member and does not apply to the association or another producer member of the association unless the Secretary determines that the association or other member participated in, or had knowledge of and derived benefit from, the violation.

"(B) ASSOCIATION'S VIOLATION DOES NOT NECESSARILY DISQUALIFY MEMBERS.—If an association representing agricultural producers as [an agent,] a joint employer, or employer is determined to have committed an act that under subsection (b)(2) results in the denial of certification with respect to the association, the denial shall apply only to the association and does not apply to any individual producer member of the association unless the Secretary determines that the member participated in, or had knowledge of and derived benefit from, the violation.

"(e) EXPEDITED ADMINISTRATIVE APPEALS OF CERTAIN DETERMINATIONS.—

"(1) DENIAL OF LABOR CERTIFICATION.—The Secretary of Labor shall provide for an expedited procedure for the review of a denial of certification under subsection (a)(1) or, at the applicant's request, for a de novo administrative hearing respecting the denial. In the case of a request for such a review or hearing with respect to denial of certification for temporary agricultural workers to perform agricultural services in the production of perishable commodities (as defined by the Secretary of Agriculture for purposes of this section), the Secretary of Labor shall provide that the review or hearing take place not later than 72 hours after the time the request is submitted.

"(2) REDETERMINATION WHERE UNQUALIFIED WORKERS REFERRED FOR EMPLOYMENT.—The Secretary of Labor shall expeditiously, but in no case later than 72 hours after the time a new determination is requested, make a new determination on the request for certification in the case of a temporary agricultural worker if the employer asserts that eligible individuals who have been referred are not able, willing, or qualified because of lawful employment-related reasons. If the employer asserts that an eligible individual who has been referred is not able, willing, or qualified, the burden of proof is on the employer to establish that the individual referred is not able, willing, or qualified because of employment-related reasons.

"(3) ATTORNEY GENERAL EXPEDITED REVIEW WHERE WORKERS NOT ACTUALLY AVAILABLE.—To the extent that—

"(A) a certification under subsection (a)(1) was denied solely because of the availability of eligible individuals to perform the agricultural services specified in the petition, and

"(B) eligible individuals who agree to perform the services for which the temporary agricultural workers are sought are not actually available at the time and place such services are required, the Attorney General shall provide by regulation for an expedited review of the petition respecting the workers not later than 72 hours after the time the employer requests expedited review under this paragraph. To the extent that the Attorney General determines that the facts described in the previous sentence exist, the Attorney General may provide for approval of the petition (subject to the other conditions required for the approval of certification under subsection (a)(1)), notwithstanding the denial of the certification by the Secretary of Labor.

"(4) EXPEDITED APPLICATION WHERE [UNFORSEEN] UNFORESEEN NEED FOR WORKERS.—

"(A) PERMITTING AMENDED APPLICATION OR ABBREVIATED RECRUITMENT PERIOD.—If the Secretary of Labor makes the determination described in subparagraph (C), the Secretary—

"(i) shall permit the employer to amend or to make an application for certification under subsection (a)(1), and

"(ii) may waive some or all of the 65-day recruitment period described in subsection (c)(1) as necessary to meet the critical need described in subparagraph (C)(i).

"(B) PROMPT REDETERMINATION.—In the case of an amended or new application under subparagraph (A)—

"(i) USING BEST DATA.—The Secretary shall make the determination on the amendment or application based upon the best available labor market information.

"(ii) DEADLINE FOR DETERMINATION.—Except as provided in clause (iii), the Secretary shall make the determination on the amendment or application not later than 20 days before the date on which the workers are needed.

"(iii) DEADLINE FOR LATE AMENDMENTS AND APPLICATIONS—If an amendment or application is made at any time later than 3 days before such date of need described in clause (ii), the Secretary shall make the determination on the amendment or application within 72 hours after the date the amendment or application is submitted.

"(C) DETERMINATION OF [UNFORSEEN] UNFORESEEN CIRCUMSTANCES.—The determination under subparagraph (A) is that—"(i) in the case of an employer that has filed an application for a certification under subsection (a)(1), the employer—

"(I) has a critical need for workers before the expiration of the 65-day period described in subsection (c)(1), or

"(II) has a critical need for additional workers who had not been requested in the previous application;

"(ii) in the case of an employer that had not previously filed such an application, the employer has a critical need for workers before the expiration of the 65-day period described in subsection (c)(1) and the employer made prompt application for certification under subsection (a)(1) when the employer's need for workers became known; and

"(iii) based on the employer's past experience and on reasonable expectations, the need for such workers at the time required could not have been foreseen.

"(5) PERMITTING PRESENTATION OF COUNTERVAILING EVIDENCE.—If the Secretary of Labor denies a certification under subsection (a)(1) or fails to act on the application, the Attorney General may permit the applicant to present countervailing evidence to the Attorney General that—

"(A) there are not sufficient workers who are able, willing, and qualified and who will be available at the time and place needed to perform the services involved in the petition for which the certification is sought, and

"(B) the employment policies of the Department of Labor have been observed.

"(f) ENTRY AND TRANSFER OF TEMPORARY AGRICULTURAL WORKERS.—

"(1) TIME LIMITATION.—An alien may not be admitted to the United States as a temporary agricultural worker for an aggregate period longer than the period (or periods) determined by regulations of the Attorney General. The regulations may provide for a period of admission of longer than one year in the case of agricultural services which the Secretary of Labor has recognized, for purposes of the admission of certain nonimmigrants under section 101(a)(15)(H)(ii), before the date of the enactment of this section.

"(2) VIOLATORS DISQUALIFIED FOR 5 YEARS.—An alien may not be admitted to the United States as a temporary agricultural worker if the alien was admitted to the United States as such a worker within the previous five-year period and the alien during that period violated a term or condition of such previous admission.

"(3) TRANSFER OF WORKERS AMONG EMPLOYERS PERMITTED.—Nothing in this section shall prohibit an employer which has a petition approved with respect to the importation of temporary agricultural workers from hiring such a worker who has completed a work contract entered into with another employer. The Attorney General shall provide for a procedure to allow temporary agricultural workers, who have completed a work contract under this section and who are not otherwise deportable, to remain in the United States for brief periods in which to seek and accept employment with employers who are authorized to employ the workers.

"(g) MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS.—

"(1) AUTHORITY OF SECRETARY OF LABOR.—The Secretary of Labor is authorized to take such actions, including imposing appropriate penalties and seeking appropriate injunctive relief and specific performance of contractual obligations, as may be necessary to assure employer compliance with terms and conditions of employment under this section.

"(2) APPROPRIATE DOCUMENTATION.—The Attorney General shall provide for such endorsement of entry and exit documents of temporary agricultural workers as may be necessary to carry out this section and to provide notice for purposes of section 274A.

"(3) PREEMPTION.—The provisions of subsections (a) and (c) of section 214 and the provisions of this section preempt any State or local law regulating admissibility of nonimmigrant workers.

"(4) TREATMENT FOR FICA, FUTA, AND SOCIAL SECURITY.—For the administration of the Federal Insurance Contributions Act, the Federal Unemployment Tax Act, and the Social Security Act, a temporary agricultural worker shall be considered to be an alien admitted to the United States to perform agricultural labor pursuant to sections 214(c) and 101(a)(15)(H)(ii) of this Act.

"(h) DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of this section:

"(1) AGRICULTURAL SERVICES.—The term 'agricultural services' has the meaning given such term by the Secretary of Labor in regulations and includes—

"(A) agricultural labor, defined in section 3121(g) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, and

"(B) agriculture, as defined in section 3(f) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938.

"(2) ELIGIBLE INDIVIDUAL.—The term 'eligible individual' means, with respect to employment, an individual who is not an unauthorized alien (as defined in section 274A(h)(2)) with respect to that employment.

"(3) TEMPORARY AGRICULTURAL WORKER.—The term 'temporary agricultural worker' means a nonimmigrant described in section 101(a)(15)(N).".

(d) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—Section 404 (8 U.S.C. 1101 note), as amended by [sections 101(b) and 102(b) of this Act,] section 101(b) is further amended by adding at the end the following new subsections:

["(d)] "(b) AUTHORIZATIONS OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR SECRETARY OF LABOR.—(1) There are authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of Labor for each fiscal year, beginning with fiscal year [1986,] 1987, $10,000,000 for the purposes—

"(A) of recruiting domestic workers for temporary services which might otherwise be performed by temporary agricultural workers described in section 216, and

"(B) of monitoring terms and conditions under which such temporary agricultural workers (and domestic workers employed by the same employers) are employed in the United States.

"(2) There are authorized to be appropriated for each fiscal year, beginning with fiscal year [1986,] 1987, such sums as may be necessary for the purpose of enabling the Secretary of Labor to make determinations and certifications under section 216 and under section 212(a)(14).

["(e)] (c) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE.—There are authorized to be appropriated for each fiscal year, beginning with fiscal year [1986,] 1987, such sums as may be necessary for the purposes of enabling the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out the Secretary's duties and responsibilities under section [216.".] 216.

"(d) Nothing in this bill is intended to authorize funding for fiscal year 1986.".

(e) PROHIBITING ADJUSTMENT OF STATUS OF TEMPORARY AGRICULTURAL WORKERS.—(1) Section 245(c) (8 U.S.C. 1255(c)), as amended by section 113(a) of this Act, is further amended by adding at the end the following new paragraph:

"(4) An alien (other than an immediate relative specified in section 201(b)) who entered the United States classified as a nonimmigrant under section 101(a)(15)(N).".

(2) Section 248(1) (8 U.S.C. 1258(1)) is amended by striking out "or (K)" and inserting in lieu thereof "(K), or (N)".

(f) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by subsections (a), (b), and (c) of this section apply to petitions and applications filed under sections 214(c) and 216 of the Immigration and Nationality Act on or after the first day of the seventh month beginning after the date of the enactment of this Act (hereinafter in this section referred to as the "effective date").

(g) REGULATIONS.—The Attorney General, in consultation with the Secretary of Labor and the Secretary of Agriculture, shall approve all regulations to be issued implementing sections 101(a)(15)(N) and 216 of the Immigration and Nationality Act. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, final regulations to implement such sections shall first be issued, on an interim or other basis, not later than the effective date.

(h) CONFORMING AMENDMENT TO TABLE OF CONTENTS.—The table of contents is amended by inserting after the item relating to section 215 the following new item:

"Sec. 216. Admission of temporary agricultural workers.".

SEC. 123. AGRICULTURAL LABOR TRANSITION PROGRAM.

(a) ESTABLISHMENT OF TRANSITION PROGRAM.—The Attorney General, in consultation with the Secretary of Labor and the Secretary of Agriculture, shall promulgate rules and regulations for the implementation of an agricultural labor transition program. The program shall be effective for a three-year period beginning on the first day of the seventh month beginning after the date of enactment of this Act.

(b) LIMITATION ON NUMBER OF WORKERS UNDER PROGRAM.—During the first year of the transition program, an agricultural employer, except as provided in (c), (d), and (e), may, as provided by regulation, employ up to 100 percent of his nondomestic seasonal agricultural worker need with transitional workers. During the second and third years of the program, the employer may employ up to 67 percent and 33 percent, respectively, of his nondomestic seasonal agricultural worker needs with transitional workers.

(c) CANNOT REPLACE LEGAL WORKERS.—Nothing in this section shall permit transitional workers to replace available United States workers or legal foreign workers admitted under the Immigration and Nationality Act.

(d) COVERAGE UNDER OTHER EMPLOYMENT LAWS.—All workers employed under the provisions of this section shall be fully protected by all Federal and State laws and regulations governing the employment of United States migrant and seasonal agricultural workers.

(e) ELIGIBILITY OF ALIENS.—(1) An undocumented alien in the United States shall be eligible to be a transitional worker under the provisions of this section if the person [is] was employed [or has been employed] on the date of enactment as a seasonal agricultural worker in the United [States] States, or has been employed as such a worker for at least 90 days during a period of time after January 1, [1980.] 1980, and before the date of enactment.

(2) An undocumented worker shall not be eligible to be a transitional worker and may not be registered under this section if the person is deportable for any reason other than those described in paragraphs (2) and (9) of section 241(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, or on the basis, under paragraph (1) of that section, of being excludable at the time of entry under paragraph (19), (20), or (26) of section 212(a) of such Act. Only persons employed as transitional workers and registered as such by the Attorney General during the first year of the program shall be eligible during the second and third years.

(3) A transitional worker under this section is not eligible to apply for adjustment of status under section 245(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, unless the alien is an immediate relative described in section 201(b) of such Act.

(f) REQUIREMENTS FOR EMPLOYERS TO PARTICIPATE.—To employ transitional workers under the provisions of this section, an agricultural employer must—

(1) notify the Attorney General of the employer's intention to participate in the transition program within twelve months of the beginning of the program, and

(2) provide such information relating to the employer's requirements for seasonal agricultural workers in months or other periods in previous and future years as the Attorney General may specify.

(g) REPORTS ON USE OF WORKERS.—After an employer begins participation in the agricultural labor transition program the employer shall provide, upon request, to the Attorney General a numerical count of the number of transitional workers employed and the total number of domestic and foreign seasonal agricultural workers employed by the employer.

(h) APPLICATION OF STANDARDS FOR TEMPORARY AGRICULTURAL WORKERS IN CERTAIN CASES.—Any eligible employer under the transition program who employs nonimmigrant alien agricultural workers under the provisions of section 216 of the Immigration and Nationality Act shall provide wages and working conditions as required by subsection (a)(1)(B) of such section to all similarly employed workers of that employer.

(i) EMPLOYMENT DOES NOT PRECLUDE LEGALIZATION OF A WORKER.—Agreement by an alien to be a transitional worker would not preclude that alien from eligibility under the legalization provisions of title II of this Act.

(j) PAYMENT OF FEES.—The Attorney General may require by regulation, as a condition of participation by an employer in the transition program, the payment of a fee to recover the reasonable costs of processing registrations under the transition program.

(k) TREATMENT OF CERTAIN DOCUMENTATION.—In accordance with regulations of the Attorney General, a work permit or other documentation issued under this section to a transitional worker shall be considered to be documentation evidencing authorization of employment for purposes of section 274A(b)(1)(C)(iii) of the Immigration and Nationality Act and an alien employed by an employer and in possession of a properly endorsed work permit or other such documentation for a period of time shall be considered (for purposes of section 274A(h)(2) of such Act) to be authorized by the Attorney General to be so employed during that period of time. For purposes of section 3121(a)(1) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 and section 210(a) of the Social Security Act, a transitional worker performing seasonal agricultural services for an employer participating under the program shall be considered to be lawfully admitted to the United States on a temporary basis to perform agricultural labor.

(l) MISCELLANEOUS ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS.—(1) Notwithstanding the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 (40 U.S.C. 471 et seq.), the Attorney General is authorized to expend from the appropriation provided for the administration and enforcement of the Immigration and Nationality Act, such amounts as may be necessary for the leasing or acquisition of property in the fulfillment of this section during the period of the transition program.

(2) USE OF RETIRED FEDERAL EMPLOYEES.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the retired or retainer pay of a member or former member of the Armed Forces of the United States or the annuity of a retired employee of the Federal Government shall not be reduced while such individual is temporarily employed by the Service for the period of the transition program to perform duties in connection with the program.

SEC. 124. COMMISSION ON TEMPORARY AGRICULTURAL WORKER PROGRAMS.

(a) ESTABLISHMENT AND COMPOSITION OF COMMISSION.—(1) There is established a commission (hereinafter in this section referred to as the "Commission") to be composed of 12 members—

(A) two to be appointed by the Attorney General,

(B) two to be appointed by the Secretary of Labor,

(C) two to be appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture,

(D) three to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and

(E) three members to be appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

(2) In appointing individuals as members, the Attorney General, the Secretaries of Labor and Agriculture, the Speaker, and the President pro tempore shall assure that members include some individuals who [are representative of] represent labor organizations for agricultural workers and some individuals who [are representative of] represent agricultural employers of nondomestic workers. Appointments to the Commission shall be made in a manner that provides for balanced representation of the various interests in the matters considered by the Commission.

(3) A vacancy in the Commission shall be filled in the same manner in which the original appointment was made.

(4) Appointments to the Commission shall first be made within 30 days after the date of the enactment of this Act.

(5) Members shall be appointed to serve for the life of the Commission.

(b) REVIEW OF AGRICULTURAL LABOR PROGRAMS.—(1) The Commission shall study and review—

(A) the temporary agricultural worker program described in section 216 of the Immigration and Nationality Act, and

(B) the agricultural labor transition program under section 123 of this Act, particularly as such programs impact on the labor needs of agricultural employers in the United States and on the [wages and conditions] wages, working conditions, and job opportunities of United States agricultural workers.

(2) The Commission shall specifically review the following with respect to the temporary agricultural worker program under section 216 of the Immigration and Nationality Act:

(A) The standards described in subsection (a)(1) of that section for the certification respecting temporary agricultural workers.

(B) Whether or not there should be a statutory or other specific limit on the number of such workers who may be imported in any period.

(C) Whether or not payments equivalent to the taxes otherwise imposed under the Federal Insurance Contributions Act and the Federal Unemployment Tax Act should be made by the employers of such workers and what use should be made of these payments.

(D) What is a proper length of time and proper mechanism for the recruitment of domestic workers before importation of such foreign workers.

(E) Whether foreign agricultural workers should be contractually restricted to employment with specific employers.

(F) Whether current labor standards offer adequate protection for domestic and foreign agricultural workers.

(G) Whether certain geographic regions need special programs or provisions to meet their unique needs.

(c) REPORT TO CONGRESS.—(1) The Commission shall report to the Congress not later than two years after the effective date (described in section 122(f)) on its reviews under subsection (b). The Commission shall include in its report recommendations for improvements in the temporary agricultural worker program under section 216 of the Immigration and Nationality Act, including specific legislative recommendations—

(1) on the [matter] matters specifically reviewed under subsection (b)(2),

(2) improving the timeliness of decisions regarding the admission of temporary agricultural workers under the program,

(3) removing any current economic disincentives to hiring United States citizens or permanent resident aliens where temporary agricultural workers have been requested, and

(4) improving the cooperation among government agencies, employers, employer associations, workers, unions, and other worker associations to end the dependence of any industry on a constant supply of temporary foreign agricultural workers.

(d) COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS.—(1) Each member of the Commission who is not an officer or employee of the Federal Government is entitled to receive, subject to such amounts as are provided in advance in appropriations Acts, the daily equivalent of the minimum annual rate of basic pay in effect for grade GS-18 of the General Schedule for each day (including traveltime) during which the member is engaged in the actual performance of duties of the Commission. Each member of the Commission who is such an officer or employee shall serve without additional pay.

(2) While away from their homes or regular places of business in the performance of services for the Commission, members of the Commission shall be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence.

(f) MEETINGS OF COMMISSION.—(1) Seven members of the Commission shall constitute a quorum, but a lesser number may hold hearings.

(2) The Chairman and the Vice Chairman of the Commission shall be elected by the members of the Commission for the life of the Commission.

(3) The Commission shall meet at the call of the Chairman or a majority of its members.

(g) STAFF.—(1) The Chairman, in consultation with the Vice Chairman, may appoint and fix the compensation of a staff director and such other additional personnel as may be necessary to enable the Commission to carry out its functions, without regard to the laws, rules, and regulations governing appointment in the competitive service. Any Federal employee subject to those laws, rules, and regulations may be detailed to the Commission without reimbursement, and such detail shall be without interruption or loss of civil service status or privilege.

(2) The Commission may procure temporary and intermittent services under section 3109(b) of title 5, United States Code, but at rates for individuals not to exceed the daily equivalent of the minimum annual rate of basic pay payable for GS-18 of the General Schedule.
